Such an informant presents a picture entirely different in kind from the comments and criticisms of those who can judge only from Mr. Keble's writings and religious line, or from the rare occasions in which he took a public part. These appearances, to many who willingly acknowledge the charm which has drawn to him the admiration and affection of numbers externally most widely at variance with him, do not always agree together. People delight in his poetry who hate his theology. They cannot say too much of the tenderness, the depth, the truth, the quick and delicate spirit of love and purity, which have made his verses the best interpreters and soothers of modern religious feeling; yet, in the religious system from which his poetry springs, they find nothing but what seems to them dry, harsh, narrow, and antiquated. He attracts and he repels; and the attraction and repulsion are equally strong. They see one side, and he is irresistible in his simplicity, humbleness, unworldliness, and ever considerate charity, combined with so much keenness and freshness of thought, and such sure and unfailing truth of feeling. They see another, and he seems to them full of strange unreality, strained, exaggerated, morbid, bristling with a forced yet inflexible intolerance. At one moment he seems the very ideal of a Christian teacher, made to win the sympathy of all hearts; the next moment a barrier rises in the shape of some unpopular doctrine or some display of zealous severity, seeming to be a strange contrast to all that was before, which utterly astonishes and disappoints. Mr. Keble was very little known to the public in general, less so even than others whose names are associated with his; and it is evident that to the public in general he presented a strange assemblage of incoherent and seemingly irreconcilable qualities. His mind seemed to work and act in different directions; and the results at the end seemed to be with wide breaks and interruptions between them. But a book like this enables us to trace back these diverging lines to the centre from which they spring. What seemed to be in such sharp contradiction at the outside is seen to flow naturally from the perfectly homogeneous and consistent character within. Many people will of course except to the character. It is not the type likely to find favour in an age of activity, doubt, and change. But, as it was realized in Mr. Keble, there it is in Sir John Coleridge's pages, perfectly real, perfectly natural, perfectly whole and uniform, with nothing double or incongruous in it, though it unfolded itself in various and opposite ways. And its ideal was simply that which has been consecrated as the saintly character in the Christian Church since the days of St. John—the deepest and most genuine love of all that was good; the deepest and most genuine hatred of all that was believed to be evil.

The picture which Sir John Coleridge puts before us, though deficient in what is striking and brilliant, is a sufficiently remarkable and uncommon one. It is the picture of a man of high cultivation and intellect, in whom religion was not merely something flavouring and elevating life, not merely a great element and object of spiritual activity, but really and unaffectedly the one absorbing interest, and the spring of every thought and purpose. Whether people like such a character or not, and whether or not they may think the religion wrong or distorted and imperfect, if they would fairly understand the writer of the Christian Year they must start from this point. He was a man who, without a particle of the religious cant of any school, without any self-consciousness or pretension or unnatural strain, literally passed his days under the quick and pervading influence, for restraint and for stimulus, of the will and presence of God. With this his whole soul was possessed; its power over him had not to be invoked and stirred up; it acted spontaneously and unnoticed in him; it was dominant in all his activity; it quenched in him aims, and even, it may be, faculties; it continually hampered the free play of his powers and gifts, and made him often seem, to those who had not the key, awkward, unequal, and unintelligible But for this awful sense of truth and reality unseen which dwarfed to him all personal thoughts and all present things, he might have been a more finished writer, a more attractive preacher, a less indifferent foster-father to his own works. But it seemed to him a shame, in the presence of all that his thoughts habitually dwelt with, to think of the ordinary objects of authorship, of studying anything of this world for its own sake, of perfecting works of art, of cultivating the subtle forces and spells of language to give attractiveness to his writings. Abruptness, inadequacy, and obscurity of expression were light matters, and gave him little concern, compared with the haunting fear of unreal words. This "seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," as he understood it, was the basis of all that he was; it was really and unaffectedly his governing principle, the root of his affections and his antipathies, just as to other men is the passion for scientific discovery or political life. But within these limits, and jealously restrained by these conditions, a strongly marked character exuberant with power and life, and the play of individual qualities, displayed itself. There were two intellectual sides to his mind—one which made him a poet, quickness and delicacy of observation and sympathetic interpretation, the realizing and anticipating power of deep feeling and penetrative imagination; the other, at first sight, little related to poetry, a hardheaded, ingenious, prosaic, shrewdness and directness of common sense, dealing practically with things as they are and on the whole, very little curious about scientific questions and precision, argumentative in a fashion modelled on Bishop Butler, and full of logical resource, good and, often it must be owned, bad. It was a mind which unfolded first under the plain, manly discipline of an old-fashioned English country parsonage, where the unshowy piety and strong morality and modest theology of the middle age of Anglicanism, the school of Pearson, Bull, and Wilson, were supreme. And from this it came under the new influences of bold and independent thought which were beginning to stir at Oxford; influences which were at first represented by such men as Davison, Copleston, and, above all, Whately; influences which repelled Keble by what he saw of hardness, shallowness, and arrogance, and still more of self-sufficiency and intellectual display and conceit in the prevailing tone of speculation, but which nevertheless powerfully affected him, and of which he showed the traces to the last. Sir John Coleridge is disappointing as to the amount of light which he throws on the process which was going on in Keble's mind during the fifteen years or so between his degree and the Christian Year; but there is one touch which refers to this period. Speaking in 1838 of Alexander Knox, and expressing dislike of his position, "as on the top of a high hill, seeing which way different schools tend," and "exercising a royal right of eclecticism over all," he adds:—

I speak the more feelingly because I know I was myself inclined to eclecticism at one time; and if it had not been for my father and my brother, where I should have been now, who can say?

But he was a man who, with a very vigorous and keen intellect, capable of making him a formidable disputant if he had been so minded, may be said not to have cared for his intellect. He used it at need, but he distrusted and undervalued it as an instrument and help. Goodness was to him the one object of desire and reverence; it was really his own measure of what he respected and valued; and where he recognised it, and in whatever shape, grave or gay, he cared not about seeming consistent in somehow or other paying it homage. People who knew him remember how, in this austere judge of heresy, burdened by the ever-pressing conviction of the "decay" of the Church and the distress of a time of change, tenderness, playfulness, considerateness, the restraint of a modesty which could not but judge, yet mistrusted its fitness, marked his ordinary intercourse. Overflowing with affection to his friends, and showing it in all kinds of unconventional and unexpected instances, keeping to the last a kind of youthful freshness as if he had never yet realized that he was not a boy, and shrunk from the formality and donnishness of grown-up life, he was the most refined and thoughtful of gentlemen, and in the midst of the fierce party battles of his day, with all his strong feeling of the tremendous significance of the strife, always a courteous and considerate opponent. Strong words he used, and used deliberately. But those were the days when the weapons of sarcasm and personal attack were freely handled. The leaders of the High Church movement were held up to detestation as the Oxford Malignants, and they certainly showed themselves fully able to give their assailants as good as they brought; yet Mr. Keble, involved in more than one trying personal controversy, feeling as sternly and keenly as any one about public questions, and tried by disappointment and the break up of the strongest ties, never lost his evenness of temper, never appeared in the arena of personal recrimination. In all the prominent part which he took, and in the resolute and sometimes wrathful tone in which he defended what seemed harsh measures, he may have dropped words which to opponents seemed severe ones, but never any which even they could call a scornful one or a sneer.

It was in keeping with all that he was—a mark of imperfection it may be, yet part of his nobleness and love of reality in a man who felt so deeply the weakness and ignorance of man—that he cared so little about the appearances of consistency. Thus, bound as he was by principle to show condemnation when he thought that a sacred cause was invaded, he was always inclining to conciliate his wrath with his affectionateness, and his severity with his consideration of circumstances and his own mistrust of himself. He was, of all men holding strong opinions, one of the most curiously and unexpectedly tolerant, wherever he could contrive to invent an excuse for tolerance, or where long habitual confidence was weighed against disturbing appearances. Sir John Coleridge touches this in the following extract, which is characteristic:—

On questions of this kind especially [University Reform], his principles were uncompromising; if a measure offended against what he thought honest, or violated what he thought sacred, good motives in the framers he would not admit as palliation, nor would he be comforted by an opinion of mine that measures mischievous in their logical consequences were never in the result so mischievous, or beneficial measures so beneficial, as had been foretold. So he writes playfully to me at an earlier time:—

"Hurrell Froude and I took into consideration your opinion that 'there are good men of all parties,' and agreed that it is a bad doctrine for these days; the time being come in which, according to John Miller, 'scoundrels must be called scoundrels'; and, moreover, we have stigmatized the said opinion by the name of the Coleridge Heresy. So hold it any longer at your peril."

I think it fair to set down these which were, in truth, formed opinions, and not random sayings; but it would be most unfair if one concluded from them, written and spoken in the freedom of friendly intercourse, that there was anything sour in his spirit, or harsh and narrow in his practice; when you discussed any of these things with him, the discussion was pretty sure to end, not indeed with any insincere concession of what he thought right and true, but in consideration for individuals and depreciation of himself.

And the same thing comes out in the interesting letter in which the Solicitor-General describes his last recollections of Keble:—

There was, I am sure, no trace of failing then to be discerned in his apprehension, or judgment, or discourse. He was an old man who had been very ill, who was still physically weak, and who needed care; but he was the same Mr. Keble I had always known, and whom, for aught that appeared, I might hope still to know for many years to come. Little bits of his tenderness, flashes of his fun, glimpses of his austerer side, I seem to recall, but I cannot put them upon paper. . . . . Once I remember walking with him just the same short walk, from his house to Sir William's, and our conversation fell upon Charles I., with regard to whose truth and honour I had used some expressions in a review, which had, as I heard, displeased him. I referred to this, and he said it was true. I replied that I was very sorry to displease him by anything I said or thought; but that if the Naseby letters were genuine, I could not think that what I said was at all too strong, and that a man could but do his best to form an honest opinion upon historical evidence, and, if he had to speak, to express that opinion. On this he said, with a tenderness and humility not only most touching, but to me most embarrassing, that "It might be so; what was he to judge of other men; he was old, and things were now looked at very differently; that he knew he had many things to unlearn and learn afresh; and that I must not mind what he had said, for that in truth belief in the heroes of his youth had become part of him." I am afraid these are my words, and not his; and I cannot give his way of speaking, which to any one with a heart, I think, would have been as overcoming as it was to me.

This same carelessness about appearances seems to us to be shown in Keble's theological position in his later years. A more logical, or a more plausible, but a less thoroughly real man might easily have drifted into Romanism. There was much in the circumstances round him, in the admissions which he had made, to lead that way; and his chivalrous readiness to take the beaten or unpopular side would help the tendency. But he was a man who gave great weight to his instinctive perception of what was right and wrong; and he was also a man who, when he felt sure of his duty, did not care a straw about what the world thought of appearances, or required as a satisfaction of seeming consistency. In him was eminently illustrated the characteristic strength and weakness of English religion, which naturally comes out in that form of it which is called Anglicanism; that poor Anglicanism, the butt and laughing-stock of all the clever and high-flying converts to Rome, of all the clever and high-flying Liberals, and of all those poor copyists of the first, far from clever, though very high-flying, who now give themselves out as exclusive heirs of the great name of Catholic; sneered at on all sides as narrow, meagre, shattered, barren; which certainly does not go to the bottom of questions, and is too much given to "hunting-up" passages for catenas of precedents and authorities; but which yet has a strange, obstinate, tenacious moral force in it; which without being successful in formulating theories or in solving fallacies can pierce through pretences and shams; and which in England seems the only shape in which intense religious faith can unfold itself and connect itself with morality and duty, without seeming to wear a peculiar dress of its own, and putting a barrier of self-chosen watchwords and singularities between itself and the rest of the nation.

It seems to us a great advantage to truth to have a character thus exhibited in its unstudied and living completeness, and exhibited directly, as the impression from life was produced on those before whose eyes it drew itself out day by day in word and act, as the occasion presented itself. There is, no doubt, a more vivid and effective way; one in which the Dean of Westminster is a great master, though it is not the method which he followed in what is probably his most perfect work, the Life of Dr. Arnold—the method of singling out points, and placing them, if possible, under a concentrated light, and in strong contrast and relief. Thus in Keble's case it is easy, and doubtless to many observers natural and tempting, to put side by side, with a strange mixture of perplexity and repulsion, the Christian Year, and the treatise on Eucharistical Adoration; to compare even in Keble's poetry, his tone on nature and human life, on the ways of children and the thoughts of death, with that on religious error and ecclesiastical divergences from the Anglican type; and to dwell on the contrast between Keble bearing his great gifts with such sweetness and modesty, and touching with such tenderness and depth the most delicate and the purest of human feelings, and Keble as the editor of Froude's Remains, forward against Dr. Hampden, breaking off a friendship of years with Dr. Arnold, stiff against Liberal change and indulgent to ancient folly and error, the eulogist of patristic mysticism and Bishop Wilson's "discipline," and busy in the ecclesiastical agitations and legal wranglings of our later days, about Jerusalem Bishoprics and Courts of Final Appeal and ritual details, about Gorham judgments, Essays and Reviews prosecutions, and Colenso scandals. The objection to this method of contrast is that it does not give the whole truth. It does not take notice that, in appreciating a man like Keble, the thing to start from is that his ideal and model and rule of character was neither more nor less than the old Christian one. It was simply what was accepted as right and obvious and indisputable, not by Churchmen only, but by all earnest believers up to our own days. Given certain conditions of Christian faith and duty which he took for granted as much as the ordinary laws of morality, then the man's own individual gifts or temper or leanings displayed themselves. But when people talk of Keble being narrow and rigid and harsh and intolerant, they ought first to recollect that he had been brought up with the ideas common to all whom he ever heard of or knew as religious people. All earnest religious conviction must seem narrow to those who do not share it. It was nothing individual or peculiar, either to him or his friends, to have strong notions about defending what they believed that they had received as the truth; and they were people who knew what they were about, too, and did not take things up at random. In this he was not different from Hooker, or Jeremy Taylor, or Bishop Butler, or Baxter, or Wesley, or Dr. Chalmers; it may be added, that he was not different from Dr. Arnold or Archbishop Whately. It must not be forgotten that till of late years there was always supposed, rightly or wrongly, to be such a thing as false doctrine, and that intolerance of it, within the limits of common justice, was always held as much part of the Christian character as devotion and charity. Men differed widely as to what was false doctrine, but they did not differ much as to there being such a thing, and as to what was to be thought of it. Keble, like other people of his time, took up his system, and really, considering that the ideal which he honestly and earnestly aimed at was the complete system of the Catholic Church, it is an abuse of words to call it, whatever else it may be called, a narrow system. There may be a wider system still, in the future; but it is at least premature to say that a man is narrow because he accepts in good faith the great traditional ideas and doctrines of the Christian Church; for of everything that can yet be called a religious system, in the sense commonly understood, as an embodiment of definite historical revelation, it is not easy to conceive a less narrow one. And, accepting it as the truth, it was dearer to him than life. That he was sensitively alive to whatever threatened or opposed it, and was ready to start up like a soldier, ready to do battle against any odds and to risk any unpopularity or misconstruction, was only the sure and natural result of that deep love and loyalty and thorough soundness of heart with which he loved his friends, but what he believed to be truth and God's will better than his friends. But it is idle and shallow to confuse the real narrowness which springs from a harsh temper or a cramped and self-sufficient intellect, and which is quite compatible with the widest theoretical latitude, and the inevitable appearance of narrowness and severity which must always be one side which a man of strong convictions and earnest purpose turns to those whose strong convictions and earnest purpose are opposite to his.

Mr. Keble, saintly as was his character, if ever there was such a character, belonged, as we all do, to his day and generation. The aspect of things and the thoughts of men change; enlarging, we are always apt to think, but perhaps really also contracting in some directions where they once were larger. In Mr. Keble, the service which he rendered to his time consisted, not merely, as it is sometimes thought, in soothing and refining it, but in bracing it. He was the preacher and example of manly hardness, simplicity, purpose in the religious character. It may be that his hatred of evil—of hollowness, impurity, self-will, conceit, ostentation—was greater than was always his perception of various and mingled good, or his comprehension of those middle things and states which are so much before us now. But the service cannot be overrated, to all parties, of the protest which his life and all his words were against dangers which were threatening all parties, and not least the Liberal party—the danger of shallowness and superficial flippancy; the danger of showy sentiment and insincerity, of worldly indifference to high duties and calls. With one great exception—Keble's once sympathetic friend, though afterwards parted from him—the religious Liberals of our time have little reason to look back with satisfaction to the leaders, able and vigorous as some of them were, who represented their cause then. They owe to Keble, as much as do those who are more identified with his theology, the inestimable service of having interpreted religion by a genuine life, corresponding in its thoroughness and unsparing, unpretending devotedness, as well as in its subtle vividness of feeling, to the great object which religion professes to contemplate.

MOON'S BAD ENGLISH.*

MR. WASHINGTON MOON may perhaps be remembered by some of our readers as the writer who some years back had a somewhat wearisome controversy with Dean Alford. The Dean wrote a book with the not particularly wise title of the Queen's English, and Mr. Moon wrote a book with the not particularly civil title of the Dean's English. We took the measure of the disputants in two articles when the dispute was fresh.† Dean Alford showed plenty of weaknesses, but he wrote a great deal that was useful and to the purpose. Mr. Moon could not see any of the real faults in the Dean's book, but he could and did write a snappish and ill-natured attack upon it, which the Dean certainly treated with the most truly Christian forbearance. Since that time we had not thought much about Mr. Washington Moon, but it seems that he has been far from idle. From the latter pages of the present book we gather that he has written a poem upon the Prophet Elijah, which has been highly praised by the British Standard, the Christian News, and the Orb. "Omne ignotum pro magnifico"; we doubt not that these journals, with the Christian Examiner and the Church and School Gazette to boot, are all high authorities in the matter of sacred poetry. Still it strikes us as a little unusual to put laudatory extracts from these or any other periodicals, not only within the cover of a book, but on the same paging as its text. Of the 248 pages of this volume 229 only belong to the book called Bad English; the other nineteen contain only praise of the Dean's English, and the poem on Elijah. The poem, it seems, is in its third edition, and "Her Majesty has graciously been pleased to accept a copy of it." Her subjects are invited to buy it at the price of 3*s.* 6*d.*, and the attraction is held out that, besides the poem itself, they will get an "engraved frontispiece, from an original drawing, of the Translation of Elijah." One is almost tempted to think that the original drawing was made on the spot by Elisha himself. If Mr. Moon can assure us that this is the case, we will at once risk our 3*s.* 6*d.* on the third edition of Elijah.

The other 229 pages are devoted to pointing out the "bad English" of Lindley Murray, Mr. G. P. Marsh, and another American critic, Mr. Gould, who has, it seems, written a book called Good English. Unluckily we know Mr. Gould's "Good" only through Mr. Moon's "Bad." At any rate Mr. Gould, when kicked by Mr. Moon, seems to have kicked back again pretty freely, and a good deal of bad language, in one sense or another, seems to have passed between them. As for Mr. Marsh, he finds a champion in one Mr. S., of Trinity College—we know not what Trinity College, English, Irish, or American; but Mr. Moon is so amused at the fact of Mr. S. belonging to any College, that it is plain that he himself belongs to no College at all. As for poor Lindley Murray, he has nobody to speak for him, and Mr. Moon kicks him in safety. We are wholly at a loss to guess why any man should have taken the trouble, first to write a series of papers, and then to gather them together into a book, the object of which is to point out minute faults of style in these three writers. The process is such a very easy one that we cannot help asking why Mr. Moon, while he was about it, did not fly at higher game. The very best writers of English, or of any other language, could not escape scot free from the kind of microscopic examination to which human speech is subjected by Mr. Moon. Mr. Moon's delight is to point out, not when a barbarous or vulgar word is used, not when a lawful word is used with an incorrect meaning, not to point out real inaccuracy or real affectation, but to show that the sentence would be ideally better if such and such words were transposed. And no doubt it very often would be. Any man who has corrected many proof-sheets of his own writings must, if he has done his work at all carefully, have improved many of his own sentences in the way in which Mr. Moon would improve the sentences of his three victims. We do not mean that all Mr. Moon's criticisms are as paltry as this. Many of them are much to the purpose; he points out many real inaccuracies of language, some of them serious blemishes of style, in the three writers whom he picks to pieces. And had he taken any real masterpiece of English, he could probably have done the same. No book was ever more clearly and forcibly written than Milman's Latin Christianity; but it could endure Mr. Moon's style of criticism just as little as Thucydides could. No wonder then, when he takes these writers, none of whom is of first-rate rank, and of whom one only is of the least mark, that he can fill a little book with their inaccuracies of style. We know Mr. Gould, as we have said, only through Mr. Moon. If it be true that Mr. Gould confesses that he reads his proof-sheets "superficially," and thinks it a defence for inaccuracy that it is only the first edition of his book, then Mr. Gould certainly deserves the drubbing which Mr. Moon gives him. We are certainly not inclined to stand up for a writer who, according to Mr. Moon, has been guilty of the following sentence:—

> His word was spurious originally, and he cannot remove its taint, nor can any subsequent endorsement purify it.

But the question still remains whether it was worth while to give him the drubbing, and still more whether it was worth while to get so very savage about it as Mr. Moon gets. As for Lindley Murray, the fact that Mr. Moon thinks him worth examining in detail opens a new vein of thought to us. It implies that some people look, at any rate that Mr. Moon looks, on Lindley Murray as something or somebody. We remember the book as a school-book some forty years ago, but till Mr. Moon told us as much, we really did not know that anybody ever thought of looking at it now. But we suppose that Lindley Murray still goes on, along with Butter and Mangnall and Maunder and all the rest of them. We even took the trouble to look at the book for ourselves, and the first thing that strikes us is the singular likeness between Lindley Murray and Mr. Moon. To be sure Lindley Murray is not so snappish as Mr. Moon: in writing a grammar he hardly had the chance of being so, but, to judge from the sermon or exhortation with which he winds up his book, we should think that he would not have had the wish. But Lindley Murray and Mr. Moon are singularly alike in the way in which they look at the English language, as something quite isolated, without any reference either to kindred tongues or to the earlier forms of the language itself. We conceive that they both represent what is understood by English Grammar in ladies' schools.

Now, out of the mass of Mr. Moon's small criticisms, some are just and some are unjust. We are inclined to think that a numerical majority might be found to be just, especially in the part devoted to Mr. Gould. But, just and unjust alike, they are all small, and a book full of small criticisms from beginning to end is very wearisome and very dreary. It is specially dreary when Mr. Moon tries to be funny. Here is a specimen of Mr. Moon in his lighter moments:—

> One more question:—On what do Flemish painters live—what is their food? Mr. Marsh is surely joking when he speaks of;—
> "The battered copper vessels, old brooms, cobwebs, appleparings, and the like, which the Flemish painters scatter so freely about their interiors."

Here again is a specimen of Mr. Moon half funny, half indignant. His American opponent very properly objected to the barbarous form "cotemporary." On this Mr. Moon is very great indeed:—

> As for the word "*co*temporaries," which Mr. S. hopes may not take root, and which, he says, Dr. Bentley called "a down-right barbarism," Dr. Ogilvie, one of our best lexicographers, says, in his dictionary:—
>
> "Contemporary, see *Co*temporary, the preferable word."
>
> Mr. S. appears to think that
>
> "The general use in words compounded with the inseparable preposition con is to retain the n before a consonant and to expunge it before a vowel or an h mute."
>
> Indeed? How happens it, then, that we say;—co-bishop, co-herald, co-guardian, co-partner, co-worker, co-surety, co-defendant, co-lessee, co-trustee, co-tenant, co-regent, etc. etc.? Why do we say *co*habit, and not *con*habit? Why do we say *co*vet, and not *con*vet? Why do we say *co*venant, and not *con*venant? The first syllable of each of these words is from the Latin con, and the second syllable begins with a consonant. If Mr. S. should ever be on a jury, he would, doubtless, make his co-jurors conjurors; and, in speaking of the co-founders of the great American Republic, would call them confounders!

* The Bad English of Lindley Murray and other Writers of the English Language, a Series of Criticisms. By G. Washington Moon, F.R.S.L. London: Hatchard & Co. 1868.

† See Saturday Review, August 23, 1863, and January 9, 1864.

We cannot boast of any acquaintance with Dr. Ogilvie, but Mr. Moon seems to attach no meaning to the great name of Bentley. We quote from memory, but were not Bentley's words something like this? "The Examiner's cotemporary is a word of his own coposition, for which the learned world will cogratulate him." Mr. S. is perfectly right in his rule, and Mr. Moon simply shows his ignorance of several tongues at once. "Co-bishop," &c. &c., are not fully formed words. Many of Mr. Moon's examples we never saw before and hope never to see again. In none of them has the preposition been really worked into the noun, so as to make a real compound word. Take "co-founder," which has really got into use. "Confounder" comes from the verb to "confound"; "co-founder" comes from the noun "founder," and from the noun founder used in a special sense. The imperfect union between the component parts of all these words is shown by their being always written with a hyphen. And we do not hesitate to say that all these words are wrongly formed, and that most of them are quite needless. Then as to Mr. Moon's questions, a good answer can be given to each of them. We say "cohabit," and not "conhabit," because h in Latin is not treated as a consonant; "cohabitare" therefore is the correct Latin form. We say "covenant," because the word does not come direct from the Latin but through the French, in which language the n had already been lost. So we used to say "Covent," and we still say "Covent Garden"; for "conventus" came to us through the French "couvent." It is the same process by which the Northern Constantia became Coutance. As for "covet" it is a word of uncertain origin, and most likely it has nothing to do with "co" or "con" at all. After all, to the question why we say "contemporary" rather than "cotemporary," the best answer must be that we say "contemporary," or rather "contemporaneous" which is the better form, because they come straight from the Latin "contemporaneus" and "contemporalis," both of them Latin words and properly formed, though words of not Ciceronian or Augustan date.

Mr. Moon is very great on the indefinite article, and for once gives us a bit of history. "Lindley Murray," he says, "and many other grammarians tell us that 'a' becomes 'an' before a vowel and before a silent 'h'; but the converse of that is what is really the fact." This sentence of Mr. Moon's does not strike us as a model of elegance, but we are bound to say that he does not libel Lindley Murray. The poor man, whoever he was, seriously believed that in "an" an n was stuck on, just like the ν at the end of so many Greek words in and ι where a vowel follows. But Mr. Moon knows better:—

> "An" becomes "a" before a consonant sound; for "an" is the original word, and was formerly used both before consonants and before vowels, and was not abbreviated to "a" until long after the Conquest. Dr. Webster says that in Saxon Chronicles, p. 82, we read;—"And thæs geares wærun ofslegene IX eorlas and an cyning"; i.e.—And this year was slain nine earls and one king.

Mr. Moon seemingly knows "Saxon Chronicles, p. 82," only through Dr. Webster, but it is something to put "Chronicles" in the plural, something to imply that the language of "Saxon Chronicles, page 82," is our own language. And though it is more usual to quote the Chronicles by the year, we are bound to say that the reference is quite correctly given to the old edition of Gibson. We congratulate—perhaps it will please him better if we say, cogratulate—Mr. Moon on his piece of knowledge, and as it has clearly been gained very lately, we do not blame him for being a little proud of it. But we do not understand when Mr. Moon tells us in the next page:—

> It is a curious fact, mentioned in a recent number of the Athenæum, that we English alone of all nations, ancient or modern, have a bonâ fide article which is distinct from "one," though contracted from "one" and meaning "one."

We cannot understand, even on the authority of "a recent number of the Athenæum," how an, or a either, can be said to be "contracted for one." The odd thing is that an has survived at all. One is the regular form which an would take in modern English, just like stone for stán.

It is odd after reading this to turn back to p. 30, where we find:—

> On p. 320 he [Lindley Murray] tells us that it is incorrect to say;—"A house and orchard"; and so it is; because as there is, in the sentence, but one article, it is understood as referring to both nouns; and though we may say;—"A house," we may not say;—"A orchard." The sentence then, should be;—"A house and an orchard."

The reason is the oddest we ever saw. But we maintain that to say "a house and orchard" is right or wrong according to the meaning. "Smith has a house and orchard to sell" implies that the house and orchard are close together, and will be sold in one lot; "Smith has a house and an orchard to sell" would perhaps imply that they are to be sold in two lots, and would certainly imply that they are not close together. Mr. Moon himself allows us to say "a black and white horse," and he admits that the meaning is quite different from that of "a black and a white horse." He is very hard on the few who still cleave to the custom of their forefathers in writing "such an one," "an University," and the like. It is indeed difficult to struggle against usage, but Mr. Moon in one place recommends the study of the English Bible, and it certainly is a great comfort in these cases.

In one place Mr. Moon is very great about what he calls "the sign of the possessive case." By this we conceive him to that useless comma, apostrophe, mark of elision, whatever it is, which printers always stick into every genitive singular. Now there is no more reason for writing "smith's" in the genitive singular than there is for writing "smith's" in the nominative plural. Each form is a lawful contraction, the one of "smiðes," the other of "smiðas," and if one should have a mark of elision, the other should also. But printers print "smith's" because they fancy that it is a contraction of "smith his," and we should not be surprised if Mr. Moon thinks so too. The usage, like most usages of the kind, is quite modern. It came in in the course of the seventeenth century. In Godw Father's," but in Knolles's History of the Turks, printed in 1687, we find "Fathers" again. We once saw a very pleasant little story-book, called Ivo and Verena, printed perhaps thirty years back, in which the form was "Fathers" throughout. The author must have had great struggles with his printers. This is of course one of the points on which the printer is sure to have his own way, but it is funny when professed writers on grammar talk as if this intruding comma was a necessary part of the word.

We have done with Mr. Moon. If he likes to find fault with Mr. Gould, we dare say the fault-finding will be to a great extent just. But both writers had better wash their dirty linen at home.

M. BEULÉ combines the learning of the antiquary with the eloquence of the rhetorician. The materials at his command are full. His treatment has the recommendation of being strictly logical, yet highly imaginative. His literary style is marked by the rapid dash and the proverbial brilliance of the French; and thus, as in Madame de Staël's rhapsodies upon Rome, history reads in the pages of this volume like a romance, and antiquarian dissertations glow with the colour of a picture. M. Beulé has worked hard under rare advantages; he has been a sojourner under the shadow of the Acropolis in Athens; the Greek temples which he describes he has seen. L'Acropole d'Athènes, "published under the auspices of the Minister of Public Instruction," is among the fruits of those original researches in Greece which, conducted under the auspices of the French Government, helped the writer to celebrity. M. Beulé, "Secrétaire perpétuel de l'Académie des Beaux-Arts, Président de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-lettres," and one of the writers in Le Journal des Savans, may be traced through some half-dozen volumes which treat of divers themes in the classic, middle-age, and modern arts, till lastly we come upon the volume before us, which certainly is calculated to sustain if not to augment the writer's well-earned reputation.

M. Beulé naturally commences by an inquiry into the origin of Greek art. He believes, in common with the best authorities, that it took its historic rise in the East, and yet, though thus in its first rudiments borrowed, he holds that it was essentially self-originated. European art at any rate commences with the Greeks. The monuments of India and of China are fantastic, the palaces of Assyria vast and astounding, the temples and tombs of Egypt grandly immobile as its theocracy. These national arts, as the civilizations whence they sprang, became dead letters, and desolate tracts of grand sterility. The Greeks seized upon what they found among other nations to be most artistic and enduring. And thus, in creating or perfecting the Doric and Ionic orders, they set their seal of beauty upon the common patrimony of antiquity. Yet perhaps it will never be possible to solve completely the phenomenon of perfection which Greek art presents:—"Ni la question de race, ni la question de climat, ni la raison politique, ne peuvent expliquer par quel divin privilége les Grecs ont eu cet esprit de clarté," &c. "Les grands peuples," adds M. Beulé, "ne s'expliquent pas plus que les grands hommes."

Architecture is the mother and instructress of the arts, she comes first in order of time, she inspires and she directs. This is the universal law which presides over all great epochs. Hence in Greece, where all the products of the human mind have observed a natural and logical sequence in development, architecture as the parent art gives birth, and affords shelter and sustenance, to her younger scions, sculpture and painting. Thus each art came upon the scene in its appointed century. By the age of Pisistratus architecture had well-nigh attained perfection; in the age of Pericles sculpture advanced to take a station by her side; but not till the reign of Alexander did painting, the latest born and long under tutelage to the Doric and Ionic orders, assert an independent life. Yet construction was nothing higher than a mechanical process while it provided merely for the necessities of the body; it became an art only when it ministered to the desires of the mind. And just in proportion as the arts are removed from service to bodily necessities, into the region of ideas and of the imagination, do they cease to be purely naturalistic or imitative. Sculpture and painting are usually accounted imitative arts; but architecture, like music, is less imitative than creative; and each seems essentially to rest in numeric ratios and geometric proportions. Such ratios and proportions at all events lie apparently at the basis of Greek architecture, and of its associated arts of sculpture, bas relief, and mural painting.

* Histoire de l'Art grec avant Périclès. Par M. Beulé, Secrétaire perpétuel de l'Académie des Beaux-Arts. Paris: Librairie académique. Didier et Cie. 1868.

[It] is this subjection to law which makes Greek art [illegible] [simp]le and beautiful; it is growth permitted only within the [illegible] of law, which secures to Greek art a progression unbroken by lawless overthrow. Absolute truth led to perfect beauty—a truth so abstract as to be without accident, a beauty so ideal as to be without blemish. Truth absolute implies breadth, simplicity, repose; accordingly, in Greek art resides such repose that even in motion there is rest, such serenity that not even passion is permitted to mar supreme beauty. Yet we must not forget that the sculpture galleries of Europe, including the British Museum, the Vatican, the Museums of Naples, Munich, &c., prove that Greek art was many-sided, and that the architects and sculptors of Athens, Ægina, Asia Minor, &c., could do anything and everything, and actually did what pleased them best. Thus of painting it was said there existed three styles—that Dionysius painted men as they were, that Pauson painted them worse than they were, and that Polygnotus painted them better than they were. The first would correspond to a naturalistic, the second to a comic or satirical, the third to an ideal manner, and it is certain that all three are to be found in Greek plastic and fictile art. In the Museo Gregoriano of the Vatican we recall vases with comic incidents painted thereon. In the British Museum we have within more immediate reach the marbles of the Parthenon, as the most perfect examples of the union of a naturalism which was noble with an idealism which was vigorous. Within the limits of our observation, Greek art tends to infinite variety, yet preserves absolute unity.

Greek art maintained a happy mean and enjoyed a wholesome moderation; tradition preserved it in an obedience without servility, and made liberty safe in protection against license. M. Beulé seeks to consolidate tradition into a law—the law of a sure and steadfast progression. The Greeks "took possession of all the patrimony of the past, and profited by the experience of the generations by which they were preceded." Tradition was for them accumulated wisdom and aggregated beauty; it was as an ample river which augments in volume as it flows, and which traverses lands the most diverse without break in its course or change in its identity. It is the want of this wise tradition which leaves modern art in anarchy; modern artists restlessly seek for something new—the last and hopeless state of a mind frivolous and unstable in all its ways. The aim of the Greek artist, on the contrary, was to make his work perfect; he did not strive even at originality; he laboured according to the knowledge gained and the ability given, and if perchance he did better than his predecessors, those who came after profited by his example. Thus art, while always following in the same track, made a step forward, and tradition became, not a law of finality, but a condition of progress. Neither in nature nor in art are there abrupt transitions. The Doric order was not at a single stroke fixed in its symmetry and unity by the effort of any one man; under the law of tradition it had a gradual growth. M. Beulé's teachings hereon, as indicated in the following extract, if not always free from contradiction, have sufficiently sure historic foundation:—

> Grâce à la fermeté de la tradition dans l'architecture grecque, nous pouvons aujourd'hui reconstruire son histoire, malgré le silence des auteurs, malgré la nuit profonde qui environne la plupart des monuments encore debout. L'ordre dorique, en particulier, qui est le type constitutif et dont les autres ordres ne sont qu'une dérivation, l'ordre dorique se raconte lui-même avec une suite qui n'étonnera personne. Pesant d'abord, court de proportions, décoré sobrement et peint de tons austères, il passe, par une progression lente, à sa perfection juste, à une grandeur pleine de fermeté, à une richesse pleine de mesure, à des couleurs éclatantes à la fois et harmonieuses; puis franchissant cette limite, il atteint des proportions plus élancées, recherche la délicatesse, change sa force en élégance et s'achemine vers la décadence. Non-seulement le dorique du siècle de Pisistrate se distingue du dorique du siècle de Périclès et du siècle d'Alexandre, mais dans chaque époque il y a des nuances et comme une transition continue: c'est par là que s'établit l'enchaînement historique, si rares que soient les ruines que nous a léguées l'antiquité.

Concerning polychrome M. Beulé truly states that there have been three distinct theories. The first denies to Greek architecture and sculpture colour altogether; the second accords colour without stint; while the third, as a happy mean between the two extremes, suggests that colour may have been modified and mitigated according to the exigencies of material, climate, and use. We think it can be affirmed that the first and the second of these propositions must be surrendered as untenable. Thus the much debated practice of polychrome is reduced to a question of degree, relation, and circumstance. M. Beulé believes that Greek systems passed through successive stages and were under continuous transformation. Thus he refers the historic origin of polychrome back to primal wood structures. Marble temples took their first types from prior wooden fabrics, and the copying of the form naturally involved the adoption of the colour. Thus the earliest practice of polychrome arose in the obvious utility of preserving a perishable material, and disguising a surface not in itself necessarily ornamental. From this probable conjecture we gladly draw the broad conclusion that this earliest polychrome, transcribed servilely from rude wooden structures, was somewhat crude and barbarous; while in more advanced epochs the tones became refined, delicate, and transparent. One reason, at all events, held equally good for the painting of wood and stone; when the stone was poor and perishable, it needed, no less than wood, protection or decoration. Greek architects, indeed, seem to have done pretty much as the middle-age builders; when the masonry was rotten, they disguised blemishes by a coating of stucco or plaster. The reasoning, of course, tells entirely the other way when the material is in itself lovely, and the lines of construction and masonry good in art; then the more seen the better. It certainly would strike us as as barbarous in taste, and altogether suicidal in art, to hide or disfigure with plaster or opaque paint the clear crystal and the translucent texture of Pentelicus marble. As soon could we believe that a lady of a complexion bright in the bloom of youth would betake herself to Rachel enamel. M. Beulé, however, is evidently of opinion that a suspicion of rouge may heighten the charm of nature. It appears clear that colour was applied in various ways; sometimes on a coat of plaster, and sometimes directly on the surface of the marble. And a distinction must be drawn between a coat of stucco and a thin wash of transparent paint. Thus does M. Beulé with reason conjecture that marble prized for its own sake might be preserved in its beauty by the use of "an encaustic preparation, pale and transparent, which should soften crudity without destroying the loveliness and lustre of the material." Indeed there would seem to be ground for believing that Greek polychromy conformed to the fundamental law of all true decoration—that of ornament of construction, not of construction of ornament; that of adorning material, not destroying it. The system evidently was vital; it had power of adaptation. Thus when, as in the Doric order, the forms were massive, the colour preserved consonant gravity; but when the proportions became, as in the Ionic, elegant, the tones assumed more lightness and cheerfulness. The colour of sculpture we have always deemed to follow as a logical and inevitable necessity on the colour of its surrounding architectural structure. John Gibson was accustomed to talk much on this the favourite topic of his closing years; but though an uncompromising polychromist, we have heard him pronounce as a mistake the colour applied by Mr. Owen Jones to the Elgin Friezes. In the notorious painted Venus, as seen in the International Exhibition of 1862, Gibson gave what he believed to be an accurate reproduction of Greek polychromy. On this not wholly unsuccessful experiment it may be observed in elucidation of preceding principles—1st. That a semi-transparent pigment was so applied as to preserve in some degree the quality of the underlying marble; 2nd. That the colour was intentionally non-naturalistic, the tone being that of ivory, not of flesh; 3rd. That the figure held harmonious relation with the coloured architectural background. Mr. Gibson, when he came to London, expressed his complete satisfaction with the result. Doubtless it was the misfortune of his art to start with the assumption that the Greeks could do no wrong; such assumption not only involves servility, but stands in opposition to the universal experience that error is inseparable from all human work. M. Beulé, like Mr. Gibson, believes in the infallibility of the Greeks. The argument, stripped of circumlocution, reads thus:—All that the Greeks did was right; they coloured architecture and sculpture; therefore to colour architecture and sculpture is right.

We confess that we have become converts to "Greek polychrome" almost against our will. We cannot but feel how unapproachable for beauty is marble fresh from the chisel, and we know in what loveliness the elements have clothed temples in Athens, on the headland of Sunium, and on the plain of Pæstum. We cannot but say that on the spot any proposition for polychrome would have sounded as profanation. Still the historic evidence seems conclusive, and abstract reasoning is certainly not entirely on the side of colourless light and shade. Doubtless it is possible to conceive that a bran-new, brightly painted temple might assume an aspect poetic and imposing when backed by the brilliant sky of Attica or the deep blue of the Ægean Sea. M. Semper, an enthusiast and partisan, presents the imagination with the following picture:—

> The prevailing colour of the temple burned with all the glowing beauty of the setting sun. The colour may be defined of a yellow red, very vapoury, resembling that of the finest terra cottas. In fact, the general appearance of the temple would precisely resemble the appearance of a fine day in an Eastern climate.

This relation between sky and colour, climate and material, involves the true principle for the application of polychrome. And yet the reasoning sometimes cuts both ways. Thus it may be urged that our northern atmosphere, dark, dull, and dense, needs lighting up. On the whole, however, the weight of argument lies on the other side. In our cold and rainy clime the eye, shadowed in grey, is startled and pained by bright positive colour; nature herself puts on sombre drapery, the rain-cloud shadows the mountain. A Greek temple, radiant as a rainbow, would in the hills of Cumberland need, like the cactus or the lotus, acclimatization. But on the shores of the blue Mediterranean, or beneath the clear cloudless skies of Ionia, the Greek pediment, glittering in gold, and glowing with red fire, reflects with ardour the rising and the setting sun. Nature in these climes exults in exuberant life, and the peoples themselves are fiery in impulse and florid in costume. Behold, then, crowning the height of the Acropolis, and looking down upon the gay life of the city beneath, "ces temples brillants de couleurs, toujours jeunes, parce qu'ils sont toujours rajeunis." "Les Grecs voulaient que toutes les branches de l'art, peinture, sculpture, architecture, contribuassent à former les temples des dieux. Dédaigner la polychromie, c'est paraître ne l'avoir ni étudiée ni comprise."

M. Beulé's treatise is far from exhaustive; though a fair record of antiquarian labours in France, it takes little or no account of important researches in England. Thus no mention is made of [the] seated statues from the Sacred Way of Branchidæ, now [in] the British Museum. These archaic works, which probably belong to the sixth century B.C., "are executed," says Mr. C. Newton, "in a style presenting so strong a resemblance to the

..ptian as to suggest the idea that they were the work of Greek artists who had been educated in Egypt." We need not point out how important is the bearing of works which stand on boundary lines in the schools of Egypt and Asia Minor upon the long-mooted question of the historic origin of Greek art. It may further be objected that no critical account is given of the famous Harpy's Tomb (B.C. 500), acquired, with other Lycian remains, for our country, by Sir Charles Fellows. Again, any history of "L'Art grec avant Périclès" must be but fragmentary if it exclude all fictile art that has of late years seen the light. The vases found at Camirus, Rhodes, Athens, Corinth, Sicily, and the islands of the Archipelago, now in process of strict chronologic arrangement in the British Museum, offer to the student a rare opportunity of acquiring a mastery over historic developments in the ceramic and plastic arts. Neither should coins or gems be forgotten in any treatise professing to produce a vivid picture of arts which adorned the early eras of Grecian civilization. We thank M. Beulé for his valuable contribution to a subject which extends far beyond the limits of a single volume. Fortunately the labourers in the field are no longer few, and we gladly remember that each year adds to the store and to the critical accuracy of our knowledge.

MISS MARTINEAU'S BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.*

THE difficulty of measuring the flight of time and the continuous passing away of generations is one of the best known and perhaps one of the most mournful facts of life. After the first burst of a career is over, and a man is once fairly in the swift current of things, he feels as if he would give almost anything he has got if only he could stand aside for a single day and survey from without the space through which he has passed. In our hurry we almost forget about eminent men, for example, who is alive and who is gone. Absorbed with the people who are conspicuous for the hour, we allow the memories of those who were our heroes a few years since to fall into a background of haze, and by the time that a man is well on in middle life he is more likely than not to have forgotten who, of the names that come before him in books, papers, or speech, have been contemporary with him and who have not. Miss Martineau's biographical sketches, republished from a daily newspaper, of eminent persons in all walks of life who have passed away since 1852, may serve both to remind us with some point and precision of the too many men who have been lost to us within the last sixteen years, and also to give us a moment's vantage ground whence we may each of us measure the length of our own journey. The general and extremely vague truths about the swift lapse of years, the ceaseless and silent industry with which old Time plies his scythe, and so forth, assume a forcible particularity when the names of the illustrious or well-known dead in a specific period are arranged before us as they are in the present volume. It is such a survey which makes us conscious of living in a new time. Practically there is never any instantaneous solution of continuity. The break spreads over years, and it is only when the transforming process is complete that we know what has been going on, and where it has landed us. The death of Lord Palmerston was perhaps the most widebearing landmark of these times. A man who sits for half a century in the House of Commons, playing a more or less conspicuous part all the time, seems to stand still long enough, and to stand out high enough, for us to make him the measure of the pace of events. Miss Martineau's book fills something of the same office.

Apart, however, from this, which is not wholly a sentimental view, it has other recommendations which make us glad that Miss Martineau has thought it worth while to publish what were something much more than mere transitory journalistic sketches, meant to be read in the morning and forgotten by the afternoon. They are, for one thing, little repertories of that sort of fact which it is often most difficult to lay one's hand upon—the fact which is not exactly contemporary, and yet has not come to be exactly historical. People disappear from the pages of Men of the Time, and their names are still without a place in the volumes of a Biographical Dictionary or a History. And yet they are just the kind of people about whom one most constantly wants to know something. Take Lord Palmerston himself, for instance, or Lord Brougham, or Lord Carlisle, or Lyndhurst or Campbell, in the political order; Robert Owen, Humboldt, George Combe, in another order; Macaulay, Hallam, De Quincey, Rogers, Landor, Croker, Lockhart, "Christopher North," in literature. These are all people to whom allusions are constantly being made as if we knew all about them, while in truth we hardly know where to find out anything about them, and a generation is ever growing up without even that vague sort of information which comes to us who have been contemporary with them. The worst of it is that Miss Martineau's list is incomplete. We have only such sketches as she chanced to write, and among statesmen, for instance, we miss at once two of the most conspicuous of our losses within the last seven years—Cobden, and Sir George Cornewall Lewis. Very likely there are others of the same magnitude, if it were worth while to think about them. Still this is no reason why we should not be thankful for the good work that there is in the sketches we have. They are very short—too short, probably, to be effective in the highest degree or in the highest sense; but, though short, they are marked throughout by a fine suggestiveness which does much to compensate for want of greater elaborateness of presentation. After all, a string of dates and so-called facts about a man is not what wise people most wish to have, nor is it in the majority of cases in any sense instructive. Miss Martineau tells us generally when a man was born and when he died, what sort of things he was good at, and what public fortune, if any, befell him; and the rest of her sketch is made up of little strokes that suggest, often with singular felicity, what manner of character he had. Her hero for the hour is really a central sort of figure, and he has substance and colour and humanity, instead of being, as is so often the case in biographical sketches, a mere name in a crowd of dates. There is thus a certain quality of M. Sainte-Beuve about these sketches. They are of the nature of studies, and even men and women who hardly deserved to be studied in this sense come in for more than their share of this intellectual analysis. George Combe, for example, albeit his book on the Constitution of Man is said to come next in circulation after the Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and Robinson Crusoe, was scarcely worthy of a very thoughtful account, unless indeed it may be said that any text is good enough to preach a sound sermon upon. And Miss Martineau says some excellent things about a great defect which unfortunately is not by any means gone out of the world with George Combe. He went to work in religion and morals, says Miss Martineau, as Huskisson more justifiably professed to do in fiscal things—"opening his hand by one finger at a time, because the people could not receive a whole handful of the truth about Free Trade." Combe was guilty in Miss Martineau's eyes, and this after all is only a statement of fact, "of conforming to established notions and forms of expression which, it came out at last, were in his opinion false. A collocation of the evidence afforded by himself in a course of years shows that he accommodated himself to the popular view and language in theological subjects where there was no real sympathy of opinion." Miss Martineau does not deny, at least not expressly, that there may be a justification, under certain circumstances, for dividing doctrine into esoteric and exoteric. She only denies Combe's right to take such a license in his place and time. That he should have preferred temporizing courses was due to a mental temperament which was such that "no romance of duty dazzled him, no idolatry of the ideal intoxicated him, no sympathy with human passion or devout aspiration put him off his guard." He was "above the perils of gross selfishness and dishonesty, and below those which attend high intellectual and spiritual gifts." Finally, there is effective analysis in saying of a man that "his remarkable self-esteem, his self-consciousness rendering him very faintly impressionable, his good nature and real benevolence, his shrewdness and caution, the absence of all keen sensibility, and the presence of a constant sense of justice—all fitted him to hold any given ground well against unscrupulous and passionate adversaries." Our only complaint, we repeat, is that the character was barely worthy of so careful and skilful a scrutiny.

Miss Martineau's analysis has the excellent quality of ease. Anybody can spin out and elaborate analyses, redolent of strain and endeavour and artifice. Not everybody can do this sort of work successfully, without an air of deliberateness, and without brandishing the scalpel, like a carver of meat among the ancient Romans. Miss Martineau's analysis comes in bits, and is none the less telling or finished because it does not sprawl over two or three pages at a time. It is set off, too, by a pleasant masculine irony in the case of people whom she does not much like, and by a fine moral sympathy with people whose career or character pleased her. A well-known and most successful lawyer of our times is parted with on mixed terms of good humour and reprobation, in the words that "Such welfare as he had need not be grudged to him. Much of it he earned for himself, and some of it was a poor substitute for blessings and enjoyments relished with even a greater keenness than his by poorer, more modest, refined, and honoured men." There is something of Mr. Kinglake's neat incisiveness in this, only it is rather more human than that famous sabreur usually is; in other words, there is a desire to speak the truth, and yet to avoid hurting, as much as might be. Twice perhaps the author of these sketches hits thoroughly hard; when she is writing about Rogers's causticity and Croker's malignity. We cannot conceive of anything worse to be said of a man than that some of his sayings "could not possibly have had any other origin than the love of giving pain; some were so atrocious as to suggest the idea that he had a sort of psychological curiosity to see how people could bear such inflictions." "Except the worship paid to the Railway King for his wealth, we know nothing in modern society so extraordinary and humiliating as the deference paid to Rogers for his ill-nature."

Whether it was mere want of space, or, as we are ready to believe, a disciplined inclination to balanced and many-sided views of character, that prevented the writer from harping on single strings, either of eulogy or dispraise, the absence of excess in either direction, combined with perfect fulness of colour and perfect distinctness of moral judgment, is especially remarkable, and we may add that it is especially delightful. It is a good thing in judging the character of people who are gone, and perhaps also of people who are yet with us, to raise the standard of measurement, and to make it the point of first moment and highest resolve to see all round it, with an eye for proportion and for the quantities in which the various elements and attributes are intermixed. Even in the case of Croker, Miss Martineau would fain take leave of him with words of sufficiently good omen to of an old Greek. If ever there was a man of whom one would insist on saying nothing, it was Croker. The journalist who left Peel's hospitality to go and write a rancorous attack on him and all belonging to him is a creature to whom it is a sin and a waste to give a thought. Miss Martineau does not spare him, yet she will not leave "the unhappy old man," as she calls him—unhappy in his own terrible disposition—without commemorating the active assistance which he always gave to the work of Polar Discovery. "Long after political unscrupulousness and rancour are forgotten, those higher landmarks of his voyage of life will remain," and so we leave him. This is the right mood after all—to keep a man's solitary virtue or claim to the very last, that so we may bid him farewell pleasantly, if such a thing be possible on the strength of a single virtue. Perhaps Brougham and Macaulay fare most hardly at Miss Martineau's hands. The vanity of the one, and the backslidings into which it dragged him, and the "shallow and insolent Whiggery" of the other, seem to have got such hold of the writer as to make her what she usually is not—a trifle scornful in her condemnation of what she thinks the universal failure of Macaulay, and what certainly was the mixture of shiftiness and recklessness in Brougham. On the whole, we are inclined to relish most the writer's account of Sir Francis Beaufort; it is so intelligent and appreciative of work done, and so lighted up with warm moral enthusiasm for a man who always did his duty to the uttermost point, and without either stint or Pharisaism. In this sketch we see at its height what is more or less visible in them all, and what is the most delightful feature of them all, a predominance of the moral standard over every other, only it is morality on its least didactic and most widely sympathetic side. The writing of these sketches, to conclude, is as good as their form and size would permit; they are thoroughly readable, instructive, and even elevating, as their tone constantly tends to stimulate sympathy with many sorts of people, without relaxing the right consciousness of the duty of a moral judgment of the men who come before us.

MR. A. H. STEPHENS ON STATE SOVEREIGNTY.*

MR. ALEXANDER STEPHENS, the Vice-President of the ill-fated Southern Confederacy, is perhaps of all American public men the best qualified fairly to represent and discuss the conflicting theories of State rights and Federal authority which, after a political struggle of more than a quarter of a century, were at last brought to a decisive issue on the field of battle. It is true that there must always be a deficiency of practical interest in the re-opening on paper of a controversy so decided; for there is a feeling, in both the reader's and the writer's mind, that it is useless yet again to dispute with the pen the verdict once recorded by the sword. Nevertheless, in justice to a brave, high-minded, and most unfortunate people, and in due regard to historical truth and to the interests of political science, it is even now worth while to hear what a scholar, a man of deep political learning, of profound knowledge of constitutional history, of moderate opinions and temperate spirit, has to say in defence of principles which, however generally repudiated in 1869, were as generally entertained ten years ago, and which the South deemed worth upholding with her whole wealth and her best blood. Mr. Stephens, if any one, may be expected to think and speak fairly and impartially on the subject. He was more consistent than any Northern opponent of secession—nearly all of whom had, at one time or another, declared in favour of it; he is less embittered and exasperated than any Southern secessionist. He opposed secession from the first on Southern grounds; he upheld, on the same grounds, the right and duty of every Southern citizen to abide by the decision of his State; he was true to his cause to the last, yet the only part he took in the war was that of a negotiator and peacemaker; he is neither unpopular with the North, nor distrusted by his own people. The opinions and arguments of such a man are entitled, à priori, to respectful attention; when they are so just, so clear, so well-reasoned, so amply supported by authorities of the highest character and of every class as we find them in the volume before us, they cannot but assist us greatly in forming a true judgment upon the nature and merits of the controversy.

The plan of Mr. Stephens' work is simple and somewhat trite, but convenient for his purpose. It is written in the form of conversations with Northern visitors at his Georgia residence; each of the three interlocutors representing and stating, with great distinctness, and we believe with perfect fairness, the ideas of one of the principal Northern parties, and defending them by authority and reasoning, while the chief part of course is played by Mr. Stephens himself, as the assertor of the defeated doctrine of State sovereignty, to which subject exclusively the present volume is devoted. The argument is well arranged, with a regard both to historical order and logical sequence, and the propositions which the author undertakes to maintain are as well and as conclusively supported as any propositions admitting of controversy well can be. Mr. Stephens is superior to the common artifices of advocacy, or is too confident in his cause to need them. He never stoops to weaken or misstate the opposite view; he takes the strongest points of his antagonist's case, as stated by its most eminent advocates, and meets them with arguments and facts about whose relevancy there can seldom be the shadow of a doubt.

The Northern theory of Federal sovereignty, as stated by Motley, and reinforced by quotations from Story and Webster, divides itself into two alternative propositions. The first is that the States never were sovereign, but derived their very existence and origin from the Union. The second is that, granting them to have been sovereign under the first Confederation, their sovereignty was resigned or taken from them by the Federal Constitution of 1787. Mr. Stephens meets these assertions by undertaking to prove:—

That the Declaration of Independence proceeded from the colonies individually and severally, and asserted their several independence and sovereignty; and that their sovereign character was constantly recognised during the Confederacy, 1776-1787.

That they did not part with it in 1787; that some of them expressly reserved it; and that it was acknowledged by the framers of the Constitution, and had been recognised by the highest authorities down to 1860.

That secession was legally competent to the Southern States, and was morally justified by the conduct of their Northern confederates.

The Declaration of Independence was a joint act; but an act for which the authority of each colony was sought and received by its delegates to Congress, and which was done by them in its name and by its authority. The Declaration pronounced the colonies to be "free and independent States." The Articles of Confederation declared that each "retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence." The recognition of Great Britain was given not to the Union or Confederacy, but to the States; and King George III. acknowledged "the United States—namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay . . . . N. Carolina, S. Carolina, and Georgia—to be free sovereign and independent States." And Congress declared that every inhabitant of any of the colonies owed allegiance thereto. To assert, then, that the States were not sovereign under the Confederacy is to contradict not only the plain facts of history, but the Articles of Confederation themselves.

The second argument, then, is the more plausible—to wit, that by the closer Union of 1787 the States surrendered their sovereign character. The fact which has given plausibility to this theory is that there was a party in the Convention, of which Hamilton was the leader, which desired to substitute a National Sovereignty for a Federal Union of Sovereign States; and that, the Constitution being the result of a compromise between the two parties, some of the favourite phrases of the Nationalists were retained. But Mr. Stephens is surely right in saying that sovereignty cannot be resigned by implication. And further, while some phrases that might bear such a meaning were retained, others, which distinctly expressed it, were carefully struck out. Thus a resolution in favour of "national government," passed before the purpose of Hamilton and his friends was understood, was afterwards rescinded; and throughout the Constitution the word "National" was systematically struck out wherever it occurred in the first draft, and "United States" substituted. The Preamble is the great reliance of the Federalists of to-day. On the strength of the words "We, the people of the United States," they assert that the Constitution was established, not by the States severally, but by the people of the Union over the States. But the history of the phrase breaks down this argument. It stood at first, "We, the people of New Hampshire, Massachusetts . . . . and Georgia." But it was expected that some of these States might (as for a while they did) refuse to ratify the Constitution; and it was accordingly provided by Article VII. "that, on being ratified by nine States, it should come into force as between the States so ratifying." It would be absurd to say, "We, the people of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York . . . and Georgia do establish," if Rhode Island and New York should happen to reject the Constitution, and stand out of the Union. And for this reason only "the United States" was substituted for an enumeration of the States which would have expressly excluded the present Federalist theory. But in fact how was the Constitution enacted? As it came from the Convention, it was nothing more than a proposal, or draft of a Bill. What gave it force or made it law? The ratification "by the States," which Mr. Motley declares it never received, but which the Constitution itself, in Article VII., declares that it must receive. How was it ratified? By the sovereign power and authority of each State, exercised by the sovereign people of the State, in the manner by State law provided as the only mode in which such supreme act of sovereignty could be done—namely, through a Convention called ad hoc under the direction of the State Government. In what character was it ratified? It speaks for itself. As a compact "between the States," not as a superior law over them. And Virginia and New York, in ratifying, expressly reserved the right of withdrawing, in case of need, the powers they had delegated to the Federal Government and Legislature; in short, the right of secession.

In all the State Conventions the Federalists were careful to repudiate the construction which is now put upon the Constitution. Hamilton himself was anxious to explain that the phrase which termed the Constitution "the supreme law of the land" meant nothing whatever save that it was to be obeyed, and in no way

* A Constitutional View of the Late War between the States, its Causes, Character, Conduct, and Results; presented in a Series of Colloquies at Liberty Hall. By Alexander H. Stephens. 2 vols. conferred any power or authority on the Federal Government beyond the express limits of the Constitution.

Mr. Stephens' interlocutors here quote a speech of Webster's, in which that great party leader, for the purposes of a particular occasion, repudiated and denounced the term "compact" employed by Calhoun to designate the Constitution. The dispute was not merely verbal, the matter really in controversy being nothing less than the great issue between Federal and State sovereignty. Mr. Stephens retorts by reading Calhoun's reply, in which his opponent is overwhelmed by quotations from every great authority, judicial and political, in which the word "compact" is used as Calhoun had used it, and with the same idea involved in its use, finishing with several such citations from Webster himself. After this—the only attempt at a rhetorical advantage or mere controversial victory in the volume—Mr. Stephens proceeds to cite a variety of authorities asserting the sovereign character of the States under the Constitution of 1787. Thus Judge Washington, of the Supreme Court, says:—"They are, in their separate political capacities, sovereign and independent, except so far as they have united for their common defence and for national purposes. They have each a Constitution and form of government, with all the attributes of sovereignty." Webster, writing to the Barings, and speaking as a lawyer in answer to a legal question, says the same thing in words as strong or stronger. The Senate, in 1837 and in 1860, formally resolved "that in adopting the Constitution the States acted severally as free, sovereign, and independent States." Livingston exposes and ridicules the false inference drawn from "We, the people," and asserts the prior existence and independence of the States, antecedent to and capable of surviving the "Federal Compact." And General Jackson, in explaining the famous Proclamation in which he had denounced Nullification, and in which certain expressions had given great alarm by their apparently Federalist tendency, carefully ascribes the Constitution to "a compact among the several States" as "independent communities." Again, he spoke of them as "sovereign members of our Union," and in his farewell address solemnly adjures the people to maintain "the rights and sovereignty of the States."

A Sovereign can have no judge; and the Federal Constitution provided no means by which one State could bring another to justice for wrongdoing or nonfulfilment of engagements. In like manner there existed no legal mode by which the Federal Government could coerce a State which should exercise the right of sovereignty to redress its wrongs under the compact by denouncing the compact itself. A sovereign Power is the judge of its own rights. Its subjects must obey it, and defend it, right or wrong. It follows, therefore, from the sovereignty of the States, that they were entitled legally to secede if they chose, and that their citizens were bound to follow and to fight for the choice of the State. This was the view on which Mr. Stephens acted; and in its support he quotes the authority of such eminent lawyers as Tucker and Rawle, and the conditional admission of Story himself. He shows that Massachusetts and the other New England States had more than once asserted the right of secession, and threatened to exercise it; that Mr. Lincoln himself asserted, in general terms, the right of any people or portion of a people, locally distinct, to choose its own government; and that Horace Greeley, up to the very last, insisted that, if the South chose, she had a right to go in peace. He himself disapproved the policy of secession, but asserted to the fullest degree the absolute nature of the right, and the sufficiency of the provocation; and he calls Webster to testify, in very distinct terms, that the systematic violation of the Constitution in the case of fugitive slaves was alone a sufficient vindication of the total repudiation, by the South, of a compact which the North observed only as far as she pleased.

It is impossible, within our limits, to give a fair idea even of the outlines of such an argument; much more to convey a just impression of the lucidity, power of thought, vast and appropriate reading, and vigorous reasoning by which it is sustained. It would be difficult to name a more perfect masterpiece of constitutional reasoning and political disquisition; a work which might with greater advantage be placed in the hands of the young lawyer who desired to see how those high questions which are the common ground of the lawyer, the historian, and the statesman, can be treated by one who combines the qualifications of all three. The book is perhaps hardly suited to the general reader, but it may be confidently recommended as indispensable to every one who wishes really to understand either the Federal Constitution or the Civil War; and it will be ranked among the most valuable of those materials which the writers of this age are accumulating for the future historian of America.

MAD.*

If the name of a novel is intended as a clue to its style, we should say the author of Mad has been rather happy in his choice. At least, were we to soften "mad" into "very eccentric," we should give a fair impression of our estimate of the book. Mr. Fenn jerks at us a curt title which he thinks will tell, and then proceeds to fix the attention he has arrested, and to gratify the curiosity he has excited, by a reckless defiance of all the unities of time and place. He hurries us from generation to generation, and from scene to scene, presenting to us an endless variety of characters, while he gives us scant time to take stock of each so that we may recognise them when we meet them again. He enmeshes us in long involved sentences, and then, extricating himself while we are yet entangled in them, seeks startling effects in violent contrast, and mercilessly retrenches his words, leaving us to grope for his meaning. The reader must piece together the plot, as he best can, out of spasmodic utterances and fragmentary scenes. In the first half of the first volume your mind is continually on the stretch, striving to grasp the ends of a number of threads, in the hope that they may twist themselves together later, and spare you further trouble. But you are oppressed with a sense of injury, considering that people are supposed to read novels for amusement. You have an uneasy consciousness, too, that the author is trying to trick you into an exhibition of interest by arts that are beneath even the dignity of fiction, and you are constantly on the point of throwing his novel down in disgust. Yet with all this there is something that tempts you to read on, and as you read the style gets less unpleasant, the book grows upon you, and your opinion of the author grows too. There are traces of real power here and there that are not to be mistaken for its shadows, and these multiply as you proceed, and engage your interest in spite of radical defects. The construction of the plot is the reverse of artistic; its framework is the very ordinary one of a disputed inheritance and missing deeds, and it works itself out, and things right themselves, by a series of marvellous coincidences that tax the reader's credulity beyond its utmost strength. The characters crowd upon you, and your despairing cry is "still they come," as one after another they force themselves to the front, take the lead and keep it for the time, all insisting on placing themselves on a footing of the most republican equality. When you are at the end of the story, you find that those who were evidently intended to stick to subordinate parts are the people whom you know much the best; and very graphically drawn some of those minor characters are. And although an author must be permitted to pick his personages where he pleases, yet he cannot hope to leave a pleasant impression on his readers' minds if he dwells too exclusively on the least attractive side of human nature. All the people Mr. Fenn presents us to are more or less weak or wicked, with the sole exception of an exemplary daughter and a hardworking curate, and they, with their unpretending loves, are hustled systematically into the background. But above all, the fatal blot in the story—and it is a blot which stains many of its pages—is the author's morbid taste for the revolting. There he out-Ainsworths Harrison Ainsworth. He goes out of his way to gloat over horrible scenes a mere hint at which would be quite sufficiently suggestive for most people, and he works them out with a disgusting fidelity of detail. We do not say that this labour of love is not so well performed as fairly to merit the approval of those who care to sup full of horrors; but then, with the generality of readers, the very success of work of this sort is a blemish. Mr. Fenn likes monosyllabic titles, and we may submit that "Rats" would have been at least as truthfully suggestive a title as "Mad." The rats are as much the heroes of his story as any one else, and they are continually reappearing to play leading parts as the ministers of poetical justice. We might tolerate and even welcome them once in a way—when, for example, in a gloomily dramatic scene they force a combat on a felon skulking in the sewers, and compel him to dive for safety under the fetid stream, and swim up the drain beyond their reach. But if Mr. Fenn chooses to let his rats loose on the living, he might have spared us their frequent visits to the dead, and we object to follow him and them into the chambers of horrors to which he invites us. Moreover, talking of the battle of the sewers, we must observe that he is by no means original in the selection of his sensational incidents. Jarker's flight through subterranean London is taken from Les Misérables; and his escape on the roofs, from Oliver Twist. But we confess that Mr. Fenn does not mar his ideas in the borrowing, for his elaboration of them is decidedly forcible and clever.

We have dwelt more upon its blemishes than we should have done did not the book, as we have said, show marks of no slight power, with evidences of a style and tone that only want to be chastened down to become effective. It seems to us that Mr. Fenn's faults may mostly be referred to a single one—the want of self-reliance. Affectedly pretentious as his mannerisms often appear, he wants confidence in himself in the best sense. He leans on others when he could walk very well alone, and he draws on the impossible and the worst form of the sensational while he has quite ability enough to do justice to a plot that limited itself to the probable and natural. He forgets that sins against good taste are seldom condoned even by those who find an unwholesome stimulant in them. If he had taken the measure of his capabilities better, he would jumble his characters less, bestow more care on individual ones, dispense with the grotesque and extravagant machinery of melodrama, and thus, we have no doubt, he might write an excellent novel. Scattered everywhere through the book are touches of real pathos. Some of its episodes are very touching in their simple force and truth to nature, although none are altogether free from the mark of the beast—a needless lingering on unpleasant details, or the introduction of some disagreeable metaphor. One of them struck us especially. Jarker, the Bill Sikes of the story—bird-fancier, ruffian, housebreaker, and murderer—is married to a woman much his superior in character and station.

* Mad: a Story of Dust and Ashes. By George Manville Fenn, Author of "Bent, not Broken," &c. 3 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1868.

She is repenting every hour of her life the folly into which a caprice for Mr. Jarker had betrayed her, but she attempts to do her duty, to preserve her self-respect, and even her illusions in the home which her brutal husband makes a hell to her. She is lying powerless on her sick bed, and even Jarker's threats and the dread of his violence cannot give her strength to rise to save him the trouble of making up the fire. Jarker, accordingly, is in a more savage temper than usual, swearing horribly at her and everything else, until at last, wearied out and half-intoxicated, he throws himself half-dressed on the bed by her side:—

> The rushlight danced and flickered, and a few drops of rain pattered against the window as the night breeze sighed mournfully down the court first one and then another bird scraped at its perch, roused as it had been by the noise and light, so that it sounded again and again like the earth upon the coffin-lid; some loose wood work among the pigeon traps upon the roof swung in the wind, and beat against the tiles, and then all was very quiet and still in the wretched attic.
>
> "Bill—Bill dear," murmured a voice after a while—a strange harsh-sounding voice, as if it came from a parched and fevered throat—"Bill."
>
> No answer, only the heavy breathing of the ruffian, and the pattering as if of earth on the coffin-lid.
>
> "Bill—Bill dear, water!" whispered the voice once more; but there was no answer, only the restless pattering noise of the birds. Then again silence, so still and profound, that it seemed scarcely to be London. But the silence was broken by a little liquid, trilling laugh, the laugh of the child as some bright-hued happy dream passed over its imagination; though there was silence again the next moment, to be broken once more by the strange husky voice, a voice that seemed new to the place, as in almost agonizing tones it whispered,
>
> "Kiss me, Bill!"
>
> But there was for response only the sound as of the earth pattering upon the coffin-lid more fitfully and hollow. While now, slowly and timidly, a thin white arm was raised, and seen then in the dim light, it was as though it was waved threateningly above the drunken ruffian's head; but no, there was no threat in the act—no calling down of judgment from on high; for the arm was passed, lovingly, tenderly, round the coarse bull neck, and still there was no response to the appeal.
> "Kiss me, Bill!" was once more whispered; but a long, deep-drawn stertorous breath told that William Jarker slept heavily, as the arm lay motionless clasping his neck; and then came a sigh, as piteous and heart rending as ever rose from suffering breast.

Next morning, Jarker wakes out of his drunken sleep to find his neck encircled by the cold arm of his dead wife, while the child nestles up to her, terrified at the living, not at the dead, and the ruffian's oaths die away on his pale lips as he flies from the room in abject terror.

The best character in the story is Matt Space, the old compositor, who becomes the dingy guardian angel of the helpless hero and his family. Drunken and slightly crack-brained as he is, the strange acquaintanceship is mutually beneficial. Matt reforms his habits as he finds an object in life. His visits to the struggling family are like those of the ravens to the prophet, and he unselfishly feeds them from his own precarious wages. He brims over with dry humour of a very fair quality, and has a quaint philosophy of his own that is both instructive and entertaining. The poor old fellow has to draw on it largely for his own use, for he has his share of troubles. Mr. Fenn lands Matt in the hospital, as a congenial sphere for his own peculiar talent to disport itself in. He makes the old man's treatment a text from which to preach a violent sermon against hospital nurses, with what amount of truth we are not prepared to say; but their atrocities and negligencies are so circumstantially insisted on as fairly to entitle Mad to be called a novel with a purpose. And of course he takes the opportunity of subjecting Matt to some horrible surgical operations, making us accompany him to the performance, and not sparing us a single one of the details. Yet while we object to Mr. Fenn's depraved taste for analysing the horrible, instead of merely indicating it, we must say that some of his studies—especially in the courts of London, and among the dwellings of the poor—give us a sense of their being photographs from nature which it would be presumptuous to criticize. The warrens and rookeries of the poor are not nice places to find oneself in, either in spirit or in body; but, taking Mr. Fenn for a guide, it may be instructive, if not pleasant, to visit them. He is evidently thoroughly at home there, and feels that he may let his fancy lie fallow while he paints actualities from the life. He is not a man to sacrifice stage properties so valuable, and so capable of being employed with effect, as rags and misery, filth, starvation, and vice. Yet he shows that poetry may be found lurking in the foulest dens, and that people may handle pitch all their lives and be much stained by it, and yet not be blackened all over. Whether, as we are inclined to believe, the book has been thrown off as the fruit of a long experience of the subjects it deals with, or whether the author has carefully got up those subjects that he might write his book, there can be no doubt that he has versed himself in them somehow. An expurgated edition of Mad we should recommend to our readers as far better worth perusal than nine-tenths of the novels of the day. But then there is that fatal fault on which we have felt bound to insist so strongly, and we must repeat that some of the descriptions are little less than loathsome. We cannot better express our meaning than by saying that those who enjoy a morning at the Morgue, or an afternoon at the Campo Santo Vecchio of Naples, had better read it; and that those who do not had better refrain. But we are convinced that Mr. Fenn is capable of writing a book that any one might enjoy.

MISS SMEDLEY'S POEMS.*

To those who have enjoyed the rich humour of Miss Smedley's novels (the last and not the least characteristic of them was Linnet's Trials), as well as to those who are cognizant of the dramatic force which she throws alike into her prose and her poetry, it will be matter neither of surprise nor regret that she does not rest content with gathered laurels. In her new volume she has this special title to success, that she concentrates in it powers which have hitherto, for the most part, been manifested separately. Its pièce de resistance, "Lady Grace," might have been wrought into the shape of a very effective novel; and as it is, thrown into the form and proportions of a five-act drama in blank verse, it serves to bring out the talents of its author with additional force. An impression, indeed, of her versatility will be produced in many readers on observing that she adds in this volume a new feature to those which characterize her former works. Several of the poems which fill its earlier pages are seemingly written to satisfy that taste for the mystical which is having its day with our poets and poetry-readers. In this path, however, she only follows one or two leaders of the poetic fashion of the hour, and, catching the infection of an undoubtedly attractive vein of thought and expression, is content to play second, and to win whatever credit may attach to skilful and by no means unsuccessful echoes. In her, to our thinking, more proper walk, of which her dramatic poem, "Odin's Sacrifice," and several smaller pieces, are the representative types, Miss Smedley may claim an originality of fancy, manner, and character sufficient to give her a high rank among female writers of poetry. As we are not disposed to conceal our preference for that class of poems where Miss Smedley is most herself, clear, earnest, lucid, and outright—so that a fire is kindled, or a laugh is provoked, as the reader cons the productions of a mind that is singularly earnest and enthusiastic, at the same time that it has a keen relish for good-humoured satire—we shall touch but lightly on the samples of her more dreamy and mystical style, and thus allow ourselves wider room for examining the excellent comedy of fashionable life which fills a good half of her volume. Passing over the first poem—"A Character"—for another of the same vein and with the same ring of Tennyson about it, yet withal less dreamy and more real in its drift and purpose, we pause for a moment on the pages which Miss Smedley has devoted to "A Contrast." Possessed of a woman's heart, and something more than an ordinary woman's share of observation and reflection, she has been constrained to dwell upon some "problems of the time" on which it may be a question how far it is good to speak with the tongue, even though the fire may be hot within one. It is unquestionably a "contrast of contrasts" when a simple maiden casts in her lot with a man who, though no worse than his fellows, has lived in the world, and eaten of the bitter fruit of the tree of knowledge. But this strange contact of pure with impure, of a high and guileless standard with a lower, baser ideal, is better left to work out its lesson in silence. We are disposed (Jesuitical though it may seem) to acquiesce in the pretext against which Miss Smedley inveighs in p. 11, that "women should not see," and to trust to the daily contact of a purer exemplar to call forth in the stronger and less sensitive partner efforts at atonement, and strivings towards a less selfish standard. We do not deny the fine touches which grace the close of this poem—the description of how the wife's revelation of a single "wavering in her thought" before marriage, and her severe judgment upon herself for this fault, sets her husband comparing his standard with hers, to the gradual improvement and elevation of the former. The ending is very pretty and natural:—

> So for a year he holds his peace,
> And meditates on noble things,
> And listens while a seraph sings,
> And all the meaner voices cease;
>
> Till, laughing once, she says with pride,
> "See, love, how sage your wife has grown!
> You never check her with that tone
> Of fond contempt you gave your bride."
>
> He looks at her with reverent eyes,
> He clasps her with a generous shame,
> "There was a revelation came > From your angelic fault!" he cries.

Thus it is, no doubt, that, in the modern problem of wedlock's lottery, the good in the woman frequently leavens the man, and even imparts value and virtue to what might have turned out a blank. Nevertheless we believe that these matters are usually better dealt with by plain words and illustrations than by parables. Nor are we sure that, in its measure, the next poem, "Hero Harold," is not a more wholesome and fruitful lesson in its very simplicity than the dark sayings of "A Contrast." No illustration of woman's power to refine and purify her harder and more coarse-grained mate can surpass the picture of Harold, a better sort of Samson, going through his feats of strength without even a flush, and only subject to a flutter of the heart,

> When it bounded, not for fame,
> Not for shouts along the air,
> But for one soft touch that came
> For a moment on his hair—

as he rested from his triumphs at his loved-one's feet. This poem ... a word of praise for its conception and execution. These is a fine study in the glimpse of Harold cast out upon the waste of waters, and "drifting to his rest"

> With the sunset on his face:
> Till where purple curves are high
> On the last faint fading line,
> Into that unfathom'd sky
> Down he drops without a sign.

And very real is the picture of the hero lapsing into a dream of past prowess, that would have preluded a castaway's death but for the tender offices of a more refined "Nausicaa," who breathes a new life into the waif and stray of pitying ocean. Another poem, written earlier, though it is placed latest in the volume, and published first, we fancy, in the Fireside Library, is very much akin to this in its spirit and dramatic force. We mean "Odin's Sacrifice," a fine piece and one which deserves study, because it shows Miss Smedley in her best and truest vein of poetry, and offers the opportunity for a contrast worth thinking out between her treatment of the subject and that which it has met at the hands of the Laureate in his much more recent poem, the "Victim." The description of the plague in her poem may remind of the beginning of the Iliad. The long-delayed denouncing of the victim that the god will accept has much akin to part of Sinon's tale in the Second Book of the Æneid; but the mother's devotion of herself to save her child, and the reserve of the king, thinking to save his best-beloved, and cheat the god by the sacrifice of his heir rather than the wife of his bosom, are touches of nature too deep and subtle for pagan parallel. Among the best short poems of this charming volume we may name "The Fisherman," a brief tale of touching pathos, and an impatient outburst on behalf of Poland, with the heading, "In the meantime," the fire and vehemence of which is characteristic of its generous and enthusiastic author. Of the parables and mysteries to be found in the volume none charms us equally with the last, "Eremos and Endæmon," a fine-wrought fancy of the mutual attraction one sometimes sees of the recluse to the liver in the world, and vice versâ.

But we must give our remaining space to "Lady Grace," as that which in the present volume has most in it to win Miss Smedley even higher consideration as a poetic worker, and clever analyst of the modern mind and manners, than she has hitherto attained. The time of this drama is the present day, with its "girls of the period," its mildly fast young men, its selfish worldlings, and its Belgravian mothers. The scene is laid in the drawing-rooms, club-rooms, bachelor lodgings, and croquet-grounds of London life. Lady Grace, a rich widow in the flower of life, has generous impulses which prompt her to devote herself to making others happy, and she cannot at first brook the deprecatory counsels of Cranston, her lawyer, a high-spirited and upright man, who suppresses any reference to his boyish intimacy with his fair client, and, believing her to have forgotten the past, because she plainly has no recollection of him, struggles with a growing passion for her, and sets himself to do her hests—as "her lawyer, nothing more!" He and Lady Grace are the only noble natures individualized in the drama. Around them swarm "golden lads and lasses" of various shades of selfishness and worldly wisdom. Chief amidst these are Captain de Courcy and Rosa Wilmot, Lady Grace's nephew and niece, to whom she and the reader are first introduced as the male cousin is teaching the female to "smoke a weed" in the lawyer's office. De Courcy is, of the two, the more utterly unrelieved piece of selfishness and silliness, and his sayings and doings deserve to be read and quoted as hitting off this special representative of a class too often to be met with. Rosa, though she disclaims it, has some little heart—too much to accept Aunt Grace's favours while reserving, as De Courcy does, the right to deceive her, but not enough to keep her from allowing her aunt to endanger her fair fame by taking upon herself the blame of an entanglement which is really the niece's affair. But both are types of a more or less normal selfishness, and so are most of the surrounding characters of the drama. How Lady Grace bestows her money on a thankless nephew, and hazards her reputation for a thoughtless niece; how, from a high pedestal, up to which the marrying men hardly dare to look, she falls, through no default of her own, to a position of suspicion and questionableness—given up by her suitor, Lord Lynton, shunned, if not cut, at Mrs. Vane's ball, lectured by her precious nephew, and left alone by her half-ashamed niece; and how, when she is in a mood to quit the world for a "sisterhood of mercy," she comes to learn that there is one heart which is still true to her, even when she has signed away all her worldly goods, and is worth nothing save for herself—that heart, "her lawyer's, nothing more!"—we should be more disposed to tell at length but that we must not spoil the reader's enjoyment of a capital plot, which is as well carried out as it is conceived. The dialogue is wonderfully racy, and full of keen observation and satire. We need but refer to De Courcy's exposition to his fair cousin of the deliciousness of a weed, and his special pleading when pressed by Rosa to answer the question, why a wife may not smoke if a lady cousin may; his professions to Mrs. Vane of readiness to do anything in reason, but not his strongly-expressed objection to mothers, especially self-elected ("Regulars are oppressive—volunteers intolerable"); and his complacent encouragement to his aunt, when she cannot measure the height of his temptations:—

> And therefore, meaning well, we spend too much > Against our will, because we cannot help it.
> But I'll be careful now.

These and divers other dicta of this sample of the "young man of the present day" deserve to pass into bywords to be launched at the whole genus, if haply they may tend to improve it. An equally typical character is Sir George Sandys, the lady's man who boasts his conquests to his friends at the Club, and, in reply to an expression of "wonder what the ladies say of us in their seclusions," undertakes to narrate his experience:—

> Did you never hear?
> I had the chance once; in a country house,
> Stalled by good hap next to a gathering-place,
> Where a whole bevy groomed their golden manes
> Just before sleep—air sultry—windows wide—
> I in the balcony—a mist of words
> Whirling against the moonlight.

This is very good; and so are the minor sketches of Mrs. Vane and Lady Melville, playing Captain De Courcy against Lord Lynton, and bent on retaining for Emma the "two strings to her bow" which seems to be an article of the Belgravian creed. There are, of course, passages of graver meaning and deeper reflection in the dialogues between Cranston and Lady Grace. Here is a protest of the former against the worldling's standard of conduct and propriety. Lord Lynton has given up Lady Grace. Fitzerse asks, What could he do? Cranston answers, > Unanswerable question!

> Limit your risks by their foreseen results,
> And so be safe. But never walk by faith
> Into the danger of the vast unknown.
> A man who did so once found a new world,
> And was, not safe, but famous for all time.
> 'Tis hardly worth the pains.

And there are many fine expressions of noble thought and observation of life in the graver scenes of the drama, to which quotation cannot do justice.

It remains for us to say that the groupings at the end of each scene and act are extremely cleverly managed. There is something in them and in the dialogue itself which reminds us of the Love Chase and the Hunchback. "Lady Grace" is not, like them, written for the stage; but it abounds not the less in many of those elements of attractiveness which have given these dramas a never-failing popularity. We hope that the Mrs. Vanes and the De Courcys of society will read "Lady Grace" with a measure of profit equivalent to the pleasure which its perusal has afforded us.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

A TREATISE on geography hardly suggests at first sight any other idea than that of a school-book. Neither does a treatise on grammar, and yet, although the grammatical study of any particular language may be the least inviting of tasks, no study is more interesting than that of comparative philology. To exhibit several languages together in their mutual relations is to vivify a mass of inanimate detail; we become conscious of change in the structure of human speech, and change implies life. In a work published a quarter of a century since, and now materially modified, Herr Ernst Kapp* has attempted to accomplish for geography what Bopp and his fellow-labourers have accomplished for grammar. Geography is in his hands no dead thing—no mere list of places, no mere table of the length of rivers and heights of mountains; but is regarded philosophically as the most important factor of history, as the main agent in determining the character, which involves the destiny, of the various inhabitants of the earth. It must be said that he has produced a most interesting and suggestive volume, as calculated to provoke thought as any that can well be mentioned. The besetting sin of such a work is likely to be fancifulness. Once allow that the characteristics of man are but, as it were, the translation of the characteristics of the earth herself into a more spiritual language, and the door is at once opened for interpretations and analogies limited only by the fertility of the writer's imagination. Many of these may be, and indeed are, highly ingenious, poetical, and suggestive of profound truth, but certainly they lie outside the domain of legitimate science. The author frequently traces out the connexion between the physical characteristics and the history of various regions with extreme ingenuity, but is generally exposed to the observation that, instead of accounting for facts by his theory, he is fashioning his theory to square with his facts. We may consider that he is commonly in the right, but, in the nature of things, the correctness of his views cannot be demonstrated. He evidently writes under strong influences from Schelling, Carus, and Oken, and may have some difficulty in procuring a hearing from the more hard-headed and matter-of-fact school now predominant in Germany.

* Vergleichende allgemeine Erdkunde in wissenschaftlicher Darstellung. Von Ernst Kapp. Braunschweig: Westermann. London: Nutt.

The current number of Petermann's Geographische Mittheilungen * contains two papers of peculiar interest—one a description of the interior of Vancouver's Island, by the English Governor, Robert Brown; the other an account of the latest Arctic discovery, "Wrangel Land," discovered by Captain Long in 1867. Both are illustrated by maps. There is also a curious essay, by J. G. Kohl, on the first Polar expedition undertaken from Germany, the date of which was about 1040.

Professor Kutzen † performs for Germany what Kapp has attempted for the whole earth. This book is a description of his native country, considered with reference to the influence which its varieties of soil and physical configuration have exercised upon the character of the inhabitants and the history of the State. The immense extent and picturesque diversity of Germany afford materials in abundance; and the alliance of geography, ethnology, and history, necessary for the execution of his plan, has produced a highly interesting work.

J. J. Von Tschudi ‡ is one of the most entertaining and instructive of travellers, whose writings will for generations to come constitute one of our chief sources of information respecting South America. The fifth and concluding volume of his second great work labours under one disadvantage—the want of human interest. The journey described in it has lain principally through "antres vast and deserts wild"; first through the rugged passes of the Andes, afterwards along the yet more barren wilderness of the Bolivian coast, perhaps the most inhospitable tract on the face of the earth. Most striking is his description of the utter sterility of this region, and of its only town, the wretched Cobija, founded by shipwrecked mariners whose only choice lay between it and the ocean, subsisting on provisions brought from distances of hundreds of miles, but maintained for its proximity to copper mines, and as the only seaport of the immense Republic of Bolivia. He makes, by the way, a singular mistake respecting the date of the foundation of Cobija, which was 1679, not 1619. An excursion to Chili affords a more cheerful picture. The traveller found the population of Valparaiso doubled since his former visit in 1838. He also speaks well of the capital, Santiago, and bears emphatic testimony to the merits of its University, which is distinguished in many branches of science, and is the only institution of the kind in South America that boasts a chair of Greek. The extraordinary fanaticism of the women of Santiago, the cause of so terrible a catastrophe a few years since, is a gloomy trait in a bright picture. Von Tschudi is inclined to ascribe it to physical causes. Some of his observations on the effects of acclimatization in Chili have an important bearing on the scientific controversies of the day. He finds, for example, that the Chilians suffer from heart disease to an extent unknown in any other country. A great mortality has lately been observed among the birds of the country, apparently occasioned by enlargement of the heart and liver. Dogs assume a peculiar type, approaching that of the hyæna. Acclimatized bees lose much of the virulence of their sting. On the other hand, the soporific principle of imported narcotic plants is highly intensified. The imported flora is beginning to displace the indigenous, as in Australia. Our traveller also visited Bolivia, where he made the acquaintance of the late President Linares, a man too wise and just for his distracted country. His tour in Peru is likewise highly interesting, and is enriched with numerous illustrations of Peruvian antiquities, and a very curious specimen of a hieroglyphical method of writing invented by an Indian in the present century.

General von Brandt § served with the French army in the Spanish war and the Russian expedition. His reminiscences constitute the first volume of his memoirs. They are highly entertaining, and afford a lively picture of the vicissitudes of campaigning in a hostile country. Some personal recollections of Napoleon are very graphic.

Sebastian Franck || was one of those restless spirits, cast up in periods of great popular commotion, who have too much originality and independence to identify themselves heartily with any party, and who consequently incur the enmity of all. He was a contemporary of Luther, and would generally be classed among the Reformers, but was too much of an innovator and too little of a sectarian to find himself at home with them. Luther styled him an enthusiast, but Franck's biographer, in adopting the designation, is careful to state that he employs it in the most honourable sense of which it is susceptible. His paradoxes were confined to religious subjects; he did not participate in the revolutionary and communistic movements which brought discredit on so many of the Reformers. In some respects he seems to have been a precursor of Quakerism. He was an historian as well as a theologian, and a most diligent translator and compiler. Hunted from city to city, equally obnoxious to Protestants and Romanists, he led a wandering life, and died in obscurity.

Anno*, Archbishop of Cologne from 1056 to 1075, appears to have been canonized, but fills a much more conspicuous place in the history of his country than in the calendar of his Church. He seems, indeed, to have been a zealous ecclesiastic, but chiefly appears in his biography as the hero of a succession of feuds in his capacity as a Prince of the Empire.

Diestel's "History of the Old Testament in the Christian Church" † comprises an account of all the commentaries composed upon it from the earliest ages of criticism down to our own. The stupendous industry required for the achievement of such a labour is no less apparent than the utility of the labour itself, if satisfactorily executed. We cannot pretend to say how far Dr. Diestel may be a faithful exponent of the authors he cites, but there can be no question as to the conciseness and lucidity of his analysis of their writings.

Dr. Redslob contends for an inner mystical sense in the New Testament ‡, something in the manner of Swedenborg, only that Swedenborg allowed the literal sense to subsist alongside of the allegorical, while Dr. Redslob, if we understand him rightly, would abolish it entirely in favour of the latter. He thinks that the narratives of the New Testament were invented as a veil for occult dogmas, and that the perception of this fact, and the intelligence of the dogmas in question, is denoted by the apostolic endowment of "speaking with tongues." This example of his system will probably be found sufficient.

Dr. Lehmann's analysis of the pseudo-Clementine writings § is an interesting and readable as well as a learned work. He arrives at the conclusion that these "Recognitions" fall into two great sections, respectively comprising the first three and the last seven books, the latter of which he considers to be modelled upon the other chief pseudo-Clementine production, the "Homilies."

Dr. Schmidt investigates the relation of Schleiermacher to the philosophy of Spinoza || in the spirit of a disciple of the former. He is determined that Schleiermacher shall retain all the credit which his patronage of Spinoza secured for him among philosophers, and is at the same time hardly less concerned to dissipate the suspicions which it naturally excited among theologians. It may be questioned whether these objects are wholly compatible with each other. Before determining the point, however, it is necessary to arrive at some clear understanding as to what Spinoza's system is. A slight examination is sufficient to establish the impenetrability either of the philosopher's works or of his commentator's heads. The most valuable part of Dr. Schmidt's book is his account of the numerous expositors who have severally, each to his own entire satisfaction, demonstrated the atheistic, the pantheistic, or the theistic character of the system of Spinoza.

The first volume of Lotze's Mikrokosmus ¶ has reached a second edition. It is a treatise against the materialism of the Vogt school, rather constructive, however, than polemical in its course of argument. It is written in a clear style, and with considerable ability, but the reasonings resorted to are such as materialists will hardly consent even to discuss.

Two recent productions of the German press are too important to be omitted from any survey of its contemporary condition, while at the same time their highly technical character precludes any satisfactory discussion of their merits in this place. They are Westphal's philosophical German Grammar, and Bethmann-Hollweg's†† work on the Germano-Roman law of the middle ages. Each is by a writer of first-rate eminence in his department. Still more abstruse but less important is Dr. Baumann's ‡‡ volume (the first of a set) on "time, space, and mathematics in modern philosophy."

The first volume of a series of works on Roman history and archæology treats on the least inviting of all Roman subjects, the Calendar.§§ The work is, however, very erudite and valuable, and promises well for the success of the series which it commences.

satirical writer of the latter half of the last century, deserves to be held in honour by his countrymen for his persevering efforts to break up the torpor and stagnation of public life in Germany. His writings were seasonable and effective in their day, but have only an historical interest in ours; nor can we consider that the author, acute and lively pamphleteer as he was, deserves the eminent position to which the zeal of his biographer and editor, Dr. Ebeling, would exalt him. His chief merit is to have contributed to popularize French ideas in Germany, which by no means sets him on a level with the originators of those ideas in France. Dr. Ebeling's work is too ambitious for the subject.

A new edition of Wasielewski's Life of Schumann * is enriched with some letters not previously published. The work in its present form is hardly adapted for the English public, but now that Schumann's music is beginning to be known among us, we apprehend that an abridgment of it might be attempted with success. It is a far more interesting book than Von Hellborn's Life of Schubert, which has been translated twice over. Schubert's existence was so retired, and his intimacies were of so commonplace a nature, that his biography hardly discloses a trace of the opulence of fancy and feeling which he must certainly have possessed. Schumann was himself the most reserved of men, but his circle of acquaintance was wide, his biography has been undertaken while his memory is still fresh, an extensive correspondence has been preserved, many incidents in his life were peculiarly adapted to elicit traits of character, and from all these circumstances combined we obtain a vivid and a tolerably complete portrait. As a psychological study, his unostentatious figure is more interesting than the fascinating personality of Mendelssohn, or the adventurous career of Weber. There is not in the whole range of biography an instance of an artist's life more purely and simply consecrated to Art.

Herr C. H. Bitter has supplemented his valuable biography of Sebastian Bach by an account of that great musician's hardly less famous son Emanuel, and the brothers of the latter.† The work is partly biographical, partly musical, but technical details preponderate, and it is not likely to be much referred to except by musical readers. The penury of biographical details is the sufficient apology for this method of treatment. Emanuel Bach's life was tranquil and uneventful; the nature of the compositions to which he devoted himself precluded his becoming a conspicuous public character like Gluck, or a popular idol like Weber or Rossini; and although his contemporaries rendered the fullest homage to his genius, they have preserved hardly any particulars of his life. His reputation has considerably declined since his death, and Herr Bitter appears to a certain extent in the character of a vindicator and apologist. At the same time he does not spare what he regards as the shortcomings of his hero, whose great service, according to him, is to have adapted his father's style of composition to the technical improvements effected in his own days. The elder brother, Friedemann Bach, adhered obstinately to the manner of his father, whose genius he was unable to rival. He thus fell behind the world in every sense, and died in distress, partly occasioned by his own impracticable temper and dissipated habits. Johann Christian, the younger brother, followed an opposite course. Greedy of gain and careless of renown, he devoted his fine talents to the gratification of the frivolous taste of his day, and has been requited by the total oblivion of posterity. The wide diffusion and long persistence of musical talent in the race of Bach is a most curious phenomenon, and justifies the elaborate research which Herr Bitter has bestowed upon the family genealogy.

"Musical Character-Portraits," ‡ by Otto Gumprecht, are a series of essays on Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Auber, and Meyerbeer. They are very pleasant reading, and the criticism is genial and liberal, but seems to embody the floating mass of popular opinion with little pretension to originality.

Vilmar's manual of German popular poetry § is an excellent little work, very clear in its delineation of this interesting subject, and illustrated by some well-selected specimens.

Anson, by R. Avé-Lallemant‖, is a curiosity in its way. It is the story of Anson's famous voyage, recounted with great exactness in very musical octave stanzas. The writer's poetical powers are not inconsiderable, and he has produced a very pleasing narrative poem. A little volume of fables ¶ has all the point, and only the point, that can be conferred by a liberal exhibition of spaced printing—the German substitute for italics.

Friedrich Spielhagen  is one of the best of modern German novelists, but resembles all other German novelists, good and bad, in succeeding better in short tales than in three-volume novels. His "Village Coquette" is a very charming story, simple in plot, animated in style, and perfectly true to nature: not devoid of tragic interest, but ending happily, as a novel should to be entirely satisfactory. Three short novels *, the most recent issues from well-known libraries of cheap fiction, put forth no great pretensions on their own account, but may be recommended as good light reading for students of the language.

The most important article in the last number of the Jahrbücher für Kunstwissenschaft † is a description of the churches and monuments of Ravenna, by J. R. Rahn. It is very elaborate, and copiously illustrated. Unsere Zeit ‡ has its usual able digests of information on subjects of contemporary interest. Russia, Abyssinia, Mexico, Japan, and the German tariff are treated of with peculiar exhaustiveness.

THE DIVISION.

EVERY one knew that the second reading of the Irish Church Bill would be carried by a very large majority; and so easy was it to calculate the result of the division, that opinions only differed as to how nearly the majority would approach to a hundred and twenty, and how much it would exceed a hundred and ten. There were not half a dozen men whose votes were at all doubtful. The constituencies have taken very good care to let their representatives know without any mistake what on this stirring subject are the views of those whom they represent. That the second reading has been carried by a majority of one hundred and eighteen is, therefore, not at all a startling or unexpected event. But it is an exceedingly important one. It is satisfactory that a question raising such large issues, heralding as it inevitably will so many great changes, and affecting so deeply persons of all classes and creeds, should have been settled once for all by the largest majority known in the House of Commons for more than thirty years. Never was an issue more fairly, seriously, or solemnly taken. It is just a year ago that Mr. DISRAELI wrote his Maundy Thursday letter, and warned the country of the dreadful plot being got up against the Crown by Romanists and Ritualists; and now the designs of these terrible people, designs at that period described as involving an evil worse than that of a foreign conquest, have been approved, after an election which turned Mr. DISRAELI out on this very point. If England has gone wrong in the matter, it has gone wrong very deliberately, and with full warning. A great step in national history has been taken, from which there is no receding; and although the measure is, we believe, not only just and wise, but indispensable, yet we do not think that any one ought to shut his eyes to the serious consequences it may entail. With many of the prophecies of woe which have been uttered during the debate we have no kind of sympathy. The Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland is sure to get on well enough if any one really wants it there, and sure to fade away if it is not wanted. In half a century it will have used or neglected the great opportunity now given it of showing what amount of stuff and life there is really in it. The Irish Protestants will be just as loyal and industrious and energetic in two years' time as they are now. The clergy of all denominations may be less sore, and can scarcely be more sore, than they are now. But on two points the alarmists seem to us to be quite right. The disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church cannot fail to affect the English Church. The minds of men have been turned in the direction of leaving all religious bodies to themselves. The argument that the State can do perfectly well without a national religion will tell on both sides of the Channel, and how serious will be the discussion when it is raised as to the English Church may easily be learnt by any one who cares to weigh what Mr. LOWE meant when he said that he objected to a disestablished Church retaining great endowments, as that would be to set up a theocracy in the middle of a nation. Then, again, it is impossible to believe that this division will not inspire the Irish with hopes which must some day be disappointed. Mr. BRIGHT openly and courageously avowed that Fenianism had been one of the most immediate causes of the proposal to treat the Established Church as the majority of Irishmen would wish it to be treated. Irishmen will certainly think that a resettlement of the land, and probably will think that a Repeal of the Union, may be obtained, if enough noise is made, and England is sufficiently terrified. Sooner or later they will have to find out their mistake, and we are not sure whether the disenchantment may not come as soon as they wake to the fact that the proposals of the Ministry that has done so much to please them about the Church are, as to the land, to be confined within the miserable limits of political economy. These are very considerable risks to run, and the division of the week may be taken as a sign that England, having counted the cost, is still determined to run them. In politics the risk of standing still is sometimes greater than the risk of moving on, and now the determination to move on, as the less dangerous course of the two, has been taken. It is an immense advantage that this determination has been taken and manifested with a decisiveness which will spare us further wavering, and prevent us from losing through irresolution the advantages that moving on promises to ensure us.

The debate and the division must be taken together. The Ministry has not only been supported by a compact and overwhelming majority; it has not only carried the second reading of the Bill; it has established conclusively, to the mind of Parliament and of the country, three most important points—that the Irish Church must be dealt with, that there is no alternative plan or scheme of dealing with it, and that the Government plan of dealing with it is not susceptible of much improvement, or open to much alteration. Even Mr. HARDY must admit that some sort of Irish Church Bill is now inevitable. But neither he nor any one else has a rival scheme to offer. Mr. GLADSTONE commented with excusable exultation on the complete manner in which the labours and reports of the unfortunate Irish Church Commission have been snuffed out. No one had a single word to say for them and their proposals. Mr. HARDY said that he was not bound to stick up for them, and he certainly did not stick up for them. Dr. BALL, who was supposed to be the guiding spirit of the Commission, had no faith in the suggestions which he once took so much trouble to frame, and was occupied with a novel anxiety and distress in his fear lest Maynooth should not be treated as well as it deserves. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER's plan of disestablishing the Church, and taking away half its property, was a plan that has cost its honest author the Chancellorship, but which has never occurred to more than one mind in the country; and its own supporter promised to abandon it directly the House pronounced, as it has done, in favour of the Government. Nor were any important objections to the details of the Bill suggested. The division must be taken to have decided that disestablishment and disendowment shall both be entire. All objections therefore to details in the Bill which rested on objections to entire disestablishment or entire disendowment must be considered as disposed of. Many Opposition speakers complained that there was nothing generous in the treatment of the Irish clergy. Supposing there is not, what generosity, it may be asked, is compatible with entire disendowment? Dr. BALL again thought that the landlords were not treated nearly well enough, thus differing from Mr. DISRAELI and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who thought that they had been openly and coarsely bribed. We should certainly not have expected a speaker of the ability of Dr. BALL to urge the argument that they are especially aggrieved by having to support their clergy, because they will at the same time have to pay the tithe rent-charge. How are they worse off than their neighbours? The tithe rent-charge is a bit of the produce of the land which never belonged to them, which was no more theirs, and which no more came into their income or was deducted from it, than the produce of a field outside their boundary. At the end of forty-five years the State is going to make them a present of those fields just outside their boundaries. Meantime, if they give out of their incomes to their clergy they will do exactly what the Protestant bootmaker or grocer of the nearest town will do, and we can only hope they will do as much. Dr. BALL will have been doing a very bad turn to his Church if he has encouraged Irish landlords to excuse the meanness so natural to rich people by alleging that, with their heavy payments for the tithe rent-charge, they cannot be expected to do much more for the parsons. All the objections to the details of the Bill that will bear examination are easy to deal with. Possibly 1660 is not the right date at which to draw the line as to private endowments. It may turn out that argument may show that the year 1634 is theoretically the more defensible point as a beginning of the calculations; but if Dr. BALL is right in saying that no means exist of proving any private endowment antecedent to the reign of Queen ANNE, the House of Commons need not waste time on a purely imaginary speculation. It is said to be hard for incumbents and curates not to be able to change the scene of their service; but then, as Mr. GLADSTONE replies, let them change, if they like, with the assent of the new ecclesiastical body which will regulate the affairs of the Church. The amount to be paid to Maynooth is said by Mr. HARDY to be far too much, and by Dr. BALL to be far too little; the Government wishes earnestly to give the right sum, and will be glad to listen to conflicting arguments from the Opposition in order to guide its decision. The compensation to Maynooth is said to be given from the wrong source; and it is urged that the Consolidated Fund should supply it, so that more money may be available for lunatic asylums in Ireland. The Government is of a contrary opinion, and thinks that the claims of the British taxpayer to relief ought to prevail over those of the Irish payers of county-cess. But if Parliament, as representing the British taxpayer, likes to put this additional bonus in the pockets of the fortunate Irish owner or occupier of land, the Government need feel no shame or scruple in yielding to the wishes of Parliament on such a matter.

There is also another sense in which the division must be taken in connexion with the debate. No vote of any of those present was, we may be sure, affected by any speech or any argument, but the country is influenced by the general tone and character of a debate; and the Government has triumphed, not only because it had a majority of a hundred and eighteen, but also because the division closed a debate in which it had carried off almost all the laurels. No new speaker, indeed, made any great mark on the Ministerial side, unless the ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland is to be called a new speaker, which to nine Englishmen out of ten he practically is. We believe that few persons in this country had ever heard his name until they found with what vigour and effect he had answered Dr. BALL. The speech of the English SOLICITOR-GENERAL was disappointing. It was wordy and without force, and seemed poor and ineffective after Sir ROUNDELL PALMER. Probably Sir JOHN COLERIDGE was taken by surprise, as he well might be, and was not prepared to answer offhand a person who was supposed to be an opponent, and who was discovered to be for entire disestablishment, and for taking away half the property of the Church. But Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. LOWE, and Mr. GLADSTONE never spoke better than in this debate. It is as useful as it is elevating to have a Government speaker who supports what clergymen and squires think the naughty side of a question, in a high stream of fervent and unaffected piety. Mr. BRIGHT is the only man in Parliament who could say the things he does, and encourage his hearers to look on following him as a religious duty, without shocking the taste and grating against the feelings of an assembly that hates above all things theological rhetoric. But there can be no doubt that when it seems natural to a speaker to give his oratory a religious turn, the effect that is produced is very great; and Mr. BRIGHT is never for a moment troubled with the thought that, if he may assume that the Supreme Being will be pleased at seeing the Irish Church destroyed, Mr. HARDY may also assume that the Supreme Being will be pleased at seeing the Irish Church upheld. Mr. LOWE did not, apparently, produce as much immediate effect upon the House as the intrinsic merits of his speech justified. Nothing could have been more terse, pointed, and suggestive than the bulk of his remarks. What he said was lively and epigrammatic, and sometimes a little hard and overbearing, but it was pregnant with material for the most serious thought. It showed that there was no part of the great Irish question as to which he had not formed a clear opinion, based on grounds that he had reasoned out. Whether his opinions were right or wrong is another matter. Mr. LOWE is not a man whose opinions are to be disposed of in a hasty paragraph. But at any rate he had got a theory about corporations, and not, like most people about him, a half theory, and he showed that he had followed the problem of what limits a State should impose on religious bodies far beyond the limits suggested by the one instance of the Irish Church. Mr. GLADSTONE's reply just before the division was so happy, so vigorous, and so full of buoyancy and the delight of victory, that it greatly enhanced to his followers the pleasure of taking part in the triumph of so conspicuous an orator. Almost all oratory is full of art, if not of tricks, and the turn of associating the waning hours of the night with the lapse of the last brief period of the existence of the Irish Church, making men feel as if the hands of the clock would record the decisiveness of the blow they were dealing, was, to say the least, in the best style of that oratory that does not disdain to be artificial. Against all this the Conservatives had only to set the speech of Mr. HARDY; for Dr. BALL, like Mr. DISRAELI, departed altogether from the true standing-point of Conservatism, and ended by suggesting that the religion of the Church selected as the only true lamp of Protestantism should be supplemented by a higher position and greater wealth being given to the Church whose delusive glare she was established to extinguish. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER made one of the best speeches in the debate, but his speech only redounded to his own credit, and separated him much more from the Opposition than from the Government. Easter, therefore, finds the Government with a compact and firm majority, with a policy towards Ireland recognised as inevitable and almost unassailable, and with the palm of oratory to give glory to its success. No Government could occupy a better position, and it is only to be hoped that the advantage may be so used that the Bill may be got through the Commons without delay and without renewal of bitterness.

THE BELGIAN SURRENDER.

THE Belgian Government has lacked either the courage or the ability to stand on its clear rights. The identical Note published by the Moniteur Belge and the Journal Officiel is expressed with more than Imperial obscurity, but the gist of it comes to this, that the French Government has willed there shall be a Belgian question, and a Belgian question there is. The concession is decently draped, but there is real flesh and blood underneath it. "The introduction by the "Government of, and the vote by the Chamber on, the Rail-"way Bill has given rise to animadversions in France;" and the Belgian Government has consequently thought it right "to forward to Paris thoroughly frank and loyal explanations." A mixed Commission will "examine the divers industrial "questions arising from the existing relations and from the "treaties recently proposed for the cession and working of the "Belgian railways." The object of this Commission is "to "give mutual proof of friendship and confidence," and its result will be "to develop the commercial and industrial "relations of the two countries." Every one of these statements suggests matter for grave reflection. It is true that the Railway Bill has given rise to "animadversions "in France." This is decidedly a mild way of putting the facts. Ever since the Belgian Legislature, acting in entire accordance with the Belgian Government, displayed the wicked desire to do what it would with its own, the French semi-official press has kept up an intermittent chorus of execration and remonstrance. At one time it talked of commercial reprisals, at another it hinted at immediate annexation. Now it whined about distrust, and now it blustered about defiance. The dignity of an independent State allowed of one treatment of this challenge. Silence absolute and contemptuous was the only attitude the KING's Ministers ought to have assumed in the face of so unprovoked and inexcusable an insult. To notice it in any way whatever was to concede the point in dispute. If it be once granted that Belgium is accountable to France for an act of municipal legislation, her whole position in the European system is altered. She becomes a dependency of France. There are degrees of dependence, no doubt, and some of them are compatible with all the externals of free action. But a State whose nominal sovereignty has never been impugned may be wholly wanting in the essential characteristics of that condition. England under CHARLES II. was united by no open bond to France under LOUIS XIV., but she was not the less a satellite of her mighty neighbour. And so Belgium, without any formal surrender of her immunities as a neutralized State, may yet be reduced to a similar state of submission to the France of NAPOLEON III. In recognising these "animadversions" as a fact which called for explanations on their part, the Belgian Ministers have, as we cannot but fear, taken the first step in this direction. We have no wish to exaggerate the importance of the act, or to represent it as either decisive or irretrievable. But, so far as it goes, it is of the character described. If there were to be any "frank and loyal explanations" in the business, they should have been forwarded from Paris to Brussels, not from Brussels to Paris. Belgium had acted strictly within her right; it was France that had given the provocation, and it is consequently France that ought to have been ready with the explanations. As coming from the Belgian Government they can have but one meaning. They imply that the "ani-"madversions" had some foundation in reason; that, however exaggerated may have been the language of her assailants, Belgium has not been wholly guiltless. To admit this is to recognise a right on the part of France to dictate what shall be the domestic legislation of another country; and we repeat, that to do this is to concede the whole point in dispute.

The reason assigned for the appointment of the Commission seems as nearly as possible the direct contrary of the truth. Instead of being a proof of "friendship and confidence," it is rather a proof of enmity and alarm. If the dispositions of the French Government towards Belgium were what they profess to be, it would not make the "animadversions" of which it is itself the author a ground for demanding material concessions under the guise of commercial "developments." If the Belgian Government were not inclined to suspect the designs of France, it would have no object in buying off the hostility it fears. What are the precise apprehensions entertained by M. Frère Orban and his colleagues it is not so easy to say, but that their assent to the French proposal implies uneasiness of some kind is obvious on the face of things. A strong Power may sometimes make concessions to a weak one out of pure good nature, or from a desire not to appear overbearing. But the converse process is seldom, if ever, met with. A small State is forced to stand more doggedly on its dignity than a great one, and for this reason its concessions count for so much the more. Belgium would never have abandoned her impregnable position on the railway question unless the cost of maintaining it had seemed too great to be incurred willingly. Up to this point we are on firm ground; beyond this point we enter at once into a region of pure speculation. Whether M. Frère Orban saw cause for thinking that, without such a surrender on his part, the French Government might be tempted to make good the threats of its own inspired journals, whether he feared that Napoleon III. and Count Bismark would make friends over a prostrate Belgium, whether in such an event he distrusted the efficacious interference of the other guaranteeing Powers—are points upon which no satisfactory answer is at present attainable. M. Frère Orban may have been influenced by one and all of these possibilities. The language of the French semi-official press was certainly alarming, and though the Emperor of the French has often proved himself ready to eat his own words, it is never safe to reckon upon his indefinite persistence in so distasteful a diet. Count Bismark has not of late shown any inclination to make things pleasant for France, but on the other hand he has no special affection for small States, and might be content to let Belgium go, if by so doing he could cross the Main without having a war with France on his hands. Of the other guaranteeing Powers, Austria is too weak, and Russia is too remote, to make their support of much practical value. And England might not be disposed to bring on a European war by defending Belgium when peace might be secured by leaving her to her fate. The correctness of these calculations is a different matter. So far as England is concerned, we believe that they are entirely erroneous; but if anything of the sort has been occupying the minds of King Leopold's advisers, we can hardly feel much surprise at the course they have taken.

But what, it may be asked, can be the value to the French Government of such a Commission as that now agreed on? In answering this question, it is well to bear in mind that the motives of Napoleon III. are not always to be judged from the circumstances under which the steps prompted by them are actually taken. The Emperor likes to have several irons in the fire at once, and he may be demanding a concession from Belgium simply as a colourable pretext for abandoning a design which he cherished a month ago and now no longer entertains. Supposing him to have meant mischief in the first instance, it was clearly necessary to prepare the minds of his subjects by a course of semi-official invective, and if he has since seen reason to change his plans, it is necessary to put forward some plea in order to account for his change of attitude. Besides this object, however, there are two alternative results of the Commission, one or other of which the Emperor may reasonably regard as worth having. The proposals with reference to "the "industrial and commercial relations of the two countries" which are to be the crown of its labours may be to the advantage of France, and thus Belgium will have had to pay in solid value for her self-assertion in the matter of the Great Luxemburg Railway. Or they may be to the advantage of Belgium, and then it may be safely predicted that the Emperor will only carry them out in return for the ratification of the contract with the Eastern of France to which, rightly or wrongly, he attaches so much military importance. In whatever light we regard it, the appointment of the Commission does not bode well for the permanent tranquillity of Europe.

THE DEBATE.

If the Opposition has been defeated by a crushing majority, it is not from any want of having argued ably against the Irish Church Bill. The leader of the Conservative party was, indeed, powerless. He could not do more than invent some kind of theory that would show intellectual dexterity and keep together his party. For him to defend the Irish Church with anything like ardour and efficiency was impossible. He was, as Mr. Lowe truly said of him, obliged to advocate it on grounds which would have been equally applicable whether the Irish Church was the worst or the best of human institutions. But the Bill found three opponents who, each in his way, made out as strong a case against it as could be made from the point of view he adopted. But then these three opponents took lines, not only divergent, but totally opposed to each other. It is the advantage of an opposing minority that it can do this safely and at ease. It can attack a Bill from any side, and its members can agree to reject a measure, although the reasons on which they reject it would immediately separate them if they had to act. On the other hand, the majority is only fortified in its resolution to carry a measure when it finds itself opposed on irreconcileable grounds. Mr. Hardy's case was that there is no Irish difficulty at all. The Irish have no wrongs or grievances. The Irish Church is a successful thriving institution, daily extending its just influence, making converts, spreading the true religion, deserving thoroughly well of the State, needing no reform. Dr. Ball's case is that there is an Irish difficulty, and that the Irish Church is not sufficient for the needs of the Irish nation. But all voluntaryism fails, and must fail. The proper thing therefore is to make the religion of the Irish people efficient, and the true remedy for Irish discontent is that the State should handsomely endow the Roman Catholic clergy. Sir Roundell Palmer's case is that there is much discontent in Ireland, and that a large portion of this discontent arises from the position of the Irish Church. As this position has only been created, and is only maintained, for the public good, it must be changed so far as the public good demands. It is entirely a question of how far to go. For disestablishment Sir Roundell Palmer pronounces absolutely, and he thinks one-half of the property of the Irish Church should be taken away from it. But he sees no reason why the other half should be taken. The public good may receive all the consideration it needs without taking away this half; and, if so, those who have got ought to be allowed to keep it.

The arguments of Mr. Hardy and of Dr. Ball are easily stated, and from the Liberal point of view easily answered. But the speeches in which those arguments were conveyed were both excellent. That of Dr. Ball produced perhaps a greater effect when heard than it is likely to do when read. As reported, it seems able and ingenious, but not much more. Mr. Hardy's speech, on the other hand, reads as the very best exposition of the true Conservative theory on the Irish Church that could have been given. He is a Tory after the heart of Tories, troubled with no misgivings, descending into no subtleties, escaping from difficulties by no side-paths, and yet able to state a case in a bold, intelligent, and masterly way. The Conservative party have not had such a leader for many years. Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Disraeli have always been somewhat alienated from their party, because their minds were shot with streaks of Liberalism; they could not be quite comfortable in ignoring obvious facts, and could not be quite satisfied with a theory of politics coherent in itself and by no means ignoble, but weak because out of harmony with the thoughts, the tendencies, and the events of the modern world. But Mr. Hardy is quite sublime as a Tory. At this time of day he honestly thinks that there is no Irish question. The Irish are, it is true, a little excited; but that is because their rulers foolishly stimulate their weak and barbarous minds with hopes of change. All that Ireland wants, Mr. Hardy said, with what may be termed heroic innocence, is a few years of peaceful industry; and the way he thinks to make them peaceful and industrious is to convince them that their lot is fixed, that the Irish Church shall be for ever established in their midst, that the land shall remain for ever in the hands that now hold it, and that the law shall always be triumphantly upheld. We quite believe that Mr. Hardy spoke with the utmost sincerity when he said that, if this policy were resolutely upheld, he saw no reason why Cork and Limerick should not in a few years become great manufacturing towns. The Conservatives must be really delighted with a man who, with the ability and vigour of Mr. HARDY, assures them, without any idea of educating or instructing them, but in simple language, and from the bottom of his heart, that he believes that the people of Cork, if they can but be made to understand once for all that England will attend to none of their complaints, will at once set up a great number of prosperous factories. Mr. HARDY carries the same heartiness of statement into the exposition of his views on the Church. He thinks it is quite wrong to count only Protestant Episcopalians as served by the clergy of the Irish Church. The whole population of an English parish is counted among the parishioners of an English clergyman, and so it ought to be in Ireland. The Roman Catholics as well as the Protestants are the parishioners of an Irish clergyman, and he ministers to the wants of all. Some of his parishioners will only accept secular aid from him, just as is the case in England, but he gives them all secular aid impartially, and would be most glad to give them religious aid if they would let him. And as a matter of fact he does give them religious aid of a most valuable though peculiar kind. He fills them with the seeds of Protestantism. While the Irish stay in Ireland these seeds come to nothing. They are like the ears of wheat boxed up with Egyptian mummies. But only let the Irish cross the Atlantic, and then these seeds show their latent energy, and sprout into Protestant convictions, as the mummy-wheat grows and fructifies if brought over the sea and potted in England. Mr. HARDY is a real thoroughgoing Tory, not a half-hearted one like Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who says that it is not the business of the Irish Church to make converts. Mr. HARDY takes the high tone. It is the task of the Irish Church to proselytize, and it fulfils its task successfully. That the Roman Catholic priests hate the Irish Church is of course true. But why do they hate it? Not for any good reason; not because they and their religion are not well treated; not because they have not the highest consideration always shown them, but simply because they are like HAMAN, and are dissatisfied in the midst of their own prosperity by the thought that MORDECAI is sitting in the gate. It would be equally useless and in bad taste to criticize these views. The true way to enjoy and appreciate Mr. HARDY is to take him just at he is. It would be like making a fine old Eastern patriarch wash himself and dress in an evening black suit, if we pared down to the Liberal standard the mind of a man who believes that nothing is needed at Cork but utter political despondency for the establishment of cotton-mills, who considers that the Irish clergyman is successful in converting his Catholic parishioners, and who thinks that the priests and their clique are like the naughty HAMAN, jealous of the good MORDECAI, whom ESTHER and all right-minded Jews love so dearly.

Dr. BALL'S Toryism is of a very different kind. It is the Toryism of a man who has been a Liberal almost all his life, and now separates from his old party on a great question. His speech contained many criticisms on the details of the Bill; but it also contained one leading expression of opinion against its whole principle. What Dr. BALL rested his hostility to the Bill on was the impossibility of a voluntary Church succeeding. There must be endowments if a Church is to be what it ought to be; and if the Church of the minority is to be endowed, so ought the Church of the majority to be. This is totally opposed to the views of Mr. HARDY. It gives up establishment; it gives up any notion of keeping alight the lamp of Protestantism; it gives up the whole idea of a national religion. The duty of the State, according to those who agree with Dr. BALL, is not to decide between one religion and another, but to get every sort of religion as good of its kind as possible. Mr. BRIGHT answered Dr. BALL by saying that the voluntary system had been tried in Ireland itself with the greatest success, for Roman Catholicism is only a voluntary system there. But this is not an answer to Dr. BALL, if Dr. BALL is to be met on his own ground. Few Englishmen would be prepared to say that Irish Roman Catholicism is a good kind of Catholicism. On the contrary, it seems an exceptionally bad kind. If the true policy is for the State to give every kind of religious body money, in order to persuade it to be the best thing it can be after its own type, the present character of Roman Catholicism in Ireland is a reason for endowing the Roman clergy there rather than for not endowing them. No one can doubt that State endowments produce in religious bodies, or at least have a strong tendency to produce, these results—learning in the clergy, dislike of violent religious change, and submissiveness to the secular authorities. Are these good things? If so, are they worth paying highly for? and if so, is it the business or duty of the State to pay for them? Dr. BALL answers all these questions in the affirmative, and it would carry us into far too wide a field of discussion to attempt to show that he is not right. But whether he is right or not, we may remark that, in the first place, his view is not at all the view of the party with which he now acts; in the next place, if this is the duty of a State, England has a frightful burden of duty imposed on her, for we ought to pay the Hindoos in India to give us the best kind of Brahminism, and the Mahometans to give us the best kind of Mahometanism; and, lastly, as Mr. GLADSTONE said, the proposal is wholly impossible. If this is the best remedy for Ireland, we must give up the best remedy and take the second best, which, for anything Dr. BALL saw, may be the plan of the Government. There is a fraction of the Conservative party, and perhaps a fraction of the Liberal party, that agrees with Dr. BALL; but no candidate ventured even so much as to name such a project to his constituents; and a scheme for the endowment of all creeds, out of new funds to be provided by the British taxpayer, is not really within the sphere of practical politics at all.

Sir ROUNDELL PALMER'S arguments are not easy to state, and are very difficult to answer. His general attitude towards the question of the Irish Church is that of Mr. GLADSTONE, not of Mr. HARDY—of a Liberal, not of a Conservative. He thinks there is a very pressing Irish question; he wants the policy of England towards Ireland to be altered. He is for total disestablishment. He thinks a great portion—no less than one-half—of the property of the Church should be taken away from it, and he approves of the proposed destination of the surplus. There is hardly a shred of agreement between him and the bulk of the Conservative party. He acknowledges that the State is quite justified in getting rid of a State religion. He does not think it any part of the necessary duty of a State to control or improve a Church; he does not think that a State needs such sanctification as it gets from keeping up an institution like the Irish Church. He thinks that, if the public good demands it, the State may apply to such purposes as it thinks fit the property of religious corporations. But he meets the Government by saying—The considerations of the public good which you suggest convince me that it would be advisable to take away a part of the property of the Church, but not all. When the funds now in the hands of religious corporations are applied to purposes which we now consider detrimental to the public good, such as the maintenance of the splendour of our Established Church, or where those funds, as in parishes with very small Protestant congregations, are applied to what experience shows is the unattainable object of spreading the religion of the conquerors, by all means take away these funds and apply them as you like. We confess we are not able to see on what grounds Sir ROUNDELL PALMER thinks that the State ought to appropriate all the funds in the hands of the Church Commissioners for the repair of churches, for that is a minor matter. But he goes on to urge that, where there is a religious corporation—that is, an incumbent enjoying a local revenue having no connexion with the Church merely as an Established Church and its consequent splendour—and when the object of that corporation, which object is the ministering to the spiritual wants of a Protestant congregation, is being fulfilled—where, that is, there is a good-sized Protestant congregation with an endowed Protestant clergyman to minister to them—there is no reason why the endowment should be taken away. The object to which the endowment is applied is a good one, it is practically attained, and it is in no way bound up with establishment or disestablishment. Why should not such a corporation retain its endowment? Corporations may be, as Mr. LOWE said, the creatures of the State, and can be made or unmade; but it certainly is for the interest of the community that, when a corporation is dissolved or its property taken from it, the change should be made on some intelligible principles. A corporation holding property should be permitted to hold it until the public good demands that it shall not be allowed to hold it any longer. The monasteries, for example, were dissolved, and their property taken from them, because England thought that it was a bad thing to have monasteries; but no one can say that England thinks it a bad thing to have Protestant congregations served by clergymen living on endowments instead of subscriptions. Mr. GLADSTONE objected that Sir ROUNDELL PALMER would take endowments from the poor, and leave them to the rich; and Mr. LOWE said Sir ROUNDELL PALMER was like SAUL, who destroyed all the lean cattle, but kept alive all the fat ones. But this does not seem to us conclusive. It may be quite right, for example, to take the endowments away from a poor little grammar-school which no one attends, and yet to leave them to Eton or Rugby. Why do we do this? Because we look to see whether the corporation has or has not fulfilled its object. Precedents, so far as they are worth anything, are against the Government. In Canada the clergy were not stripped of all endowments derived from the State, but only of so much as public policy seemed to demand. In New York the Protestant Episcopalian Church was allowed to hold the land with which it had been endowed in the days of English government. The real answer to Sir ROUNDELL PALMER is that all these local funds must be looked on as parts of a whole, destined to promote the common end of imposing on a conquered people the religion of the conquerors. The general destruction of these funds has given rise to a discontent which we recognise as legitimate, because we do not hold it to be just to take the religious funds of the conquered for the purpose of maintaining the religion of the conquerors. As between Ireland and England all the funds of the Irish Church are devoted to a wrong purpose. It is decided that it is for the public good to take them all away, and apply them all to a good purpose, and the first criterion of a good purpose is that it shall not excite discontent in that portion of the Irish people which has hitherto been prejudiced by the malappropriation of these funds. If this is the true test, then the endowment of the clergy of thriving Protestant congregations is not a good purpose. It would continue the existing discontent, for these Protestant congregations would be perpetually benefited by the inheritance of that which originally accrued to them from a wrongful source. We get to a point in such matters where legal reasoning can carry us no further. Somebody must decide whether the discontent of Ireland, if any part of the spoils of the conquered Church were left in the hands of Protestant congregations, would be deep, permanent, and legitimate enough to be a national evil, and a Government backed by a majority of 118 has come to the decision that this would be the case.

MR ROEBUCK'S POLITICAL LEGACY.

MR. ROEBUCK'S Sheffield friends are quite right in paying him a compliment, and it may be hoped that they appreciate the lecture which they have received in return. A man of considerable ability cannot have been an active member of Parliament for nearly forty years without learning something of public affairs; yet Mr. ROEBUCK'S repeated assertions that he has mastered a special art or mystery excite a certain amount of puzzled curiosity. To ordinary observers his judgments appear to be remarkable rather for passionate emphasis than for recondite originality; and although he is perfectly sincere in his belief that he has been a consistent supporter of Liberal opinions, it is evident that the lapse of years has produced in him its frequent effect of an instinctive aversion to change and to popular doctrines. Five-and-thirty years ago the present supporter of the Irish Church was vehemently denouncing the House of Lords. There is, indeed, no necessary connexion between the two institutions; but the assailant of aristocratic privilege was certainly not at the time deeply attached to ecclesiastical establishments. Mr. ROEBUCK would perhaps even now disclaim any sympathy with the Irish Church; but at the present moment loud protests against Roman Catholic domination are practically equivalent to apologies for Protestant ascendency. When it is said that if Mr. GLADSTONE were inclined to Catholicism he would do exactly what he is doing, the appeal to religious prejudice implies a condemnation of the Government measure. A zealous Reformer has a perfect right to sober down, with advancing years, into a No-Popery alarmist; but it is difficult to trace in the change a gradual development of political wisdom. At the end, as at the beginning, of Mr. ROEBUCK'S political life, a restless spirit of antagonism has assumed the successive forms of almost revolutionary impatience and of reactionary indignation. In the meantime his career has been almost brilliant, and occasionally useful. From the first he succeeded in the House as a speaker, and he gradually acquired a peculiar position as the recognised expounder of opinions which more timid members hesitated to express. In public or in private it is difficult to draw the line between outspoken boldness and eccentricity. Mr. ROEBUCK gave utterance indifferently to thoughts and feelings which were half consciously stirring in the minds of others, and to crotchets of his own. An egotism which was naturally associated with his independent position received a fresh impulse from the relation which he bore to his constituents. The electors of Sheffield were tolerant of breaches of party discipline, until their favourite at last came into collision with their own interests and prejudices. Mr. ROEBUCK'S opposition to Mr. GLADSTONE'S Reform Bill would scarcely have been condoned, even if he had not forfeited his local popularity by attacking Trades' Unions. The minority which stood by him to the last either sympathizes with his present opinions, or makes due allowance for a not ungenerous indiscretion. Mr. ROEBUCK'S friends will perhaps be reconciled to the interruption or close of a Parliamentary life which would have been guided by the principles of his political testament.

There is a certain merit in every protest against popular commonplace, and a fastidious taste may derive a momentary pleasure from an unwonted expression of antipathy in place of conventional expressions of good will; but a solemn warning against three well-known sources of danger conveys no practical lesson. "Beware of Trades' Unions," says Mr. ROEBUCK, "beware of Ireland, beware of America." But no intimation is given of the nature of the necessary precautions. However much Sheffield or England may beware, Ireland lies on one side of the Atlantic, and America on the other; and it is abundantly proved that Trades' Unions are not to be suppressed by legislation. It would have been as profitable to say, "Beware of east winds in March; beware of bad harvests; "beware of the potato disease." March winds and American spite must be endured, and if possible survived, with the equanimity which recognises an unavoidable nuisance. There might be some advantage in recommending Sheffield grinders to abstain from the abuses connected with Trades' Unions, if only they were disposed to listen to the advice. The company at the Sheffield dinner, consisting principally of those against whom trade combinations are directed, would gladly adopt Mr ROEBUCK'S counsels, but that they know that it is useless to beware. Masters are perfectly ready to tell delegates, in Mr. ROEBUCK'S words, that nobody shall come between labourer and employer; but if the labourers unanimously obey the directions of delegates and councils, the only choice lies between negotiation with the Unions and the discontinuance of business. "Let the labourer not ask beyond what he ought to "have. Let the capitalist not refuse what he ought to give." Let the lion lie down with the lamb; let the desert blossom like a rose; and let the golden age return. Between the labourer's estimate of what he ought to have, and the capitalist's judgment of what he ought to give, lies the whole region of conflict and of mutually hostile organizations. The workmen will be the less inclined to listen to Mr. ROEBUCK because he is evidently opposed to their demands. In warning the capitalists that if they yield they are ruined for ever, he proclaims himself a partisan, perhaps of the right side, but certainly of one side in the dispute. The Commission of which Mr. ROEBUCK was a member has unanimously recommended the legal acknowledgment of Trades' Unions, although it may be true that they create or indicate a serious social danger.

A grave political philosopher, summing up in prophetic strain the results of old experience, might have been expected to suggest some plausible method of averting or diminishing the threatened Irish peril. Mr. ROEBUCK can only say that the real difficulty of Ireland is the priesthood, and that the priests encourage the Fenian conspiracy. There can be no more forcible illustration of the mischief which arises from habitual disregard of prudent reticence. Because it has sometimes been Mr. ROEBUCK'S fortune to express at the right moment opinions which required utterance, he has persuaded himself that the side of truth which he sees ought at all times to be publicly exhibited. Of course the priesthood constitutes one great Irish difficulty; but, in default of a practicable scheme for getting rid of the priests, it is as well to make the best of their existence. When some of their chief dignitaries denounce Fenianism, even though they may include the harmless Freemasons in their condemnation, a judicious statesman will take them at their word. The priests are troublesome, because they exercise independent power, not unfrequently in a spirit of hostility to the English Government. Mr. ROEBUCK would confirm and justify their ill-will, without depriving them of any opportunity of gratifying unfriendly feelings. Mr. GLADSTONE proposes to disarm them by abolishing the principal grievance of which they complain; and Mr. ROEBUCK is prepared with no juster criticism of his policy than an insinuation that Mr. GLADSTONE himself is inclined to Catholicism. If the priests favoured the Fenians, the first object of the English Government should be to dissolve the alliance. It is idle to urge Englishmen to be firm towards Ireland, if firmness means the refusal of all popular demands. When the time which Mr. ROEBUCK anticipates has arrived, it may be proper to assure Mr. GLADSTONE that the English people mean to be Protestants; but their profession of faith will be premature as long as the PRIME MINISTER has not perverted the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER or the PRESI-DENT of the BOARD of TRADE. It is possible and probable that, notwithstanding all measures of conciliation, Ireland will still present insuperable difficulties; but Mr. ROEBUCK's system would at once destroy all chance of improvement.

Although it is as useless to beware of America as of Ireland, Mr. ROEBUCK may boast that he formerly proposed a definite plan for reducing the power of the United States. In the House of Commons, and in private conversation with Lord PALMERSTON, he advised the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, at a time when the intervention of England, and probably of France, would have decided the fate of the civil war. The scheme, though it had the merit of aptitude for its object, would have been at the same time unjust and impolitic. The Confederacy had never established its independence, and the Northern armies were operating at the time on several portions of its territory. A recognition of the Government of Richmond could only have been justified by some cause of quarrel with the United States, and, like the similar procedure of France in the middle of the first American rebellion, it would have been immediately followed up by war. It is for Mr. ROEBUCK to explain why the English people should have spent two or three hundred millions, and perhaps have lost Canada, for the benefit of the Southern States, or for the injury of the North. Even if there had been any excuse for war, the feeling of a large class of the population in favour of the stronger party in America would have caused a wise Government to hesitate in causing a rupture which would have involved serious domestic dissension. It is true that the American feeling of hatred has never been mitigated by the scrupulous neutrality of England, and that American journalists and orators are not ashamed to resent Mr. ROEBUCK's solitary protests, while they forget the refusal of the Government or of Parliament even to listen to his proposals. There is every reason to fear that, in act as in word, the people of the United States will be unjust and hostile to the people of England; but unless Mr. ROEBUCK can correct the historical and political education of America, unless he can inspire some one man among so many millions with the originality and the courage to correct popular delusions, it is a waste of words to repeat that it is necessary to beware of America. The national deference to the supposed opinions of the majority is highly favourable to the prejudiced malignity which astonishes those who are accustomed to difference of opinion and freedom of discussion. Causeless and chronic ill-will cherished by a great community may cause a mixture of irritation and contempt, but it is idle to utter cautions against an evil with which it is impossible to deal.

THE MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT OF LONDON.

MR. BUXTON and Mr. HUGHES, who have again introduced the London Municipal Bills, probably desire rather to prepare the way for future legislation than to carry a measure which is too comprehensive to be entrusted to any private member. One of the Bills divides London outside the City into nine boroughs, which are to be organized under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act. The second and more ambitious Bill purports to erect a Corporation of London under a governing body selected from the Corporations of the City and of the municipal boroughs. The present Corporation of London is to be virtually superseded, although it will still be retained for local purposes, to regret, as a skeleton or a shadow, its former grandeur. Both Bills are drawn in an abstruse style which renders it difficult to understand some of their provisions. The third clause of the Corporation of London Bill, which is probably the longest and most unintelligible sentence in the English language, may be placed on a level with the masterpieces of the obscurest German metaphysicians; but, in a Bill which is not destined to pass, the marginal notes indicate sufficiently the general tendency of the clauses to which they refer. When the measure was formerly brought forward, its most zealous promoter persuaded himself that it had been accepted by the authorities of the City, who afterwards indignantly repudiated the imputation. The magnanimity of Aldermen and Common Councilmen will never be equal to municipal suicide, although the framers of the Bill have baited their hook with a proposal to let the Lord Mayor for the time being extend his reign, for the remainder of his term, over the whole of London. Future Lord Mayors are, unlike similar functionaries elsewhere, to be elected by the Common Council. A careful study of the clauses of the Bill suggests the probable conclusion that the City Council is to elect five City Aldermen to be Aldermen of London, and that the several boroughs are to be represented in the Court of Aldermen by their respective Mayors, and two Aldermen of each borough; but the unparalleled ingenuity of the draftsman renders any confident interpretation of the provisions of his Bill presumptuous and uncertain. A Common Council of a hundred and thirty-one members, appointed by a similar process, completes the proposed Corporation. The vested interests of the Board of Works and of Sir JOHN THWAITES are reserved with a solicitude worthy of Mr. GLADSTONE; but neither institution is to be replaced when by lapse of time it disappears. The Corporation of London, inheriting the powers of the Board of Works, will absorb the greater part of the functions which would otherwise belong to the municipalities of the several boroughs. The estates of the City are also to be transferred to the new Corporation, while a saving clause reserves to the freemen, liverymen, and citizens all their existing privileges, with the exception of the possession of their property and the exercise of their present rights.

The task of creating a complex municipal government for the metropolis is so novel and so arduous as to entitle any elaborate contrivance for accomplishing the object to indulgent consideration. Popular opinion inclines to the substitution of a simpler organization for the co-ordinate or conflicting bodies which divide among themselves the local administration of London, and it is only by the examination of detailed schemes that the expediency of establishing municipal institutions can be duly estimated. The fundamental difficulty consists in the inseparable connexion between municipal government and household suffrage. Whatever may be the plan devised, the ultimate authority must rest with the majority of ratepayers, although in Mr. BUXTON's proposed federation of boroughs, as in the present Metropolitan Board, the power of members is in some degree weakened by a secondary or indirect mode of election. It would be possible to divide the metropolis into municipal boroughs, without providing any ulterior system to comprehend the whole of London. Marylebone, Finsbury, and the rest might be incorporated for municipal as for Parliamentary purposes, and subjected to the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act. In a Bill formerly introduced by Mr. MILL there was an attempt to represent property by vesting certain administrative powers in justices to be appointed by the Crown; but the owners of freeholds form but a small minority of the wealthy class, and it would perhaps be invidious to depart from the ordinary municipal precedents. It would scarcely be necessary to establish a Court of Quarter Sessions, with a Recorder, for each of the nine boroughs; but in other respects the general Act would be applicable. The chief objection to the plan is that it would be unpalatable to the better class of inhabitants, as they place little confidence in the vestrymen who would be transformed into Common Councillors and Aldermen. In provincial boroughs there are some interests common to the whole population, and the principal traders or manufacturers are generally preferred for the highest municipal offices. Londoners live side by side without mutual intercourse, nor has the feeling which is called by Frenchmen church-steeple patriotism the smallest influence over a resident of Chelsea or of Paddington. If the Metropolitan Board of Works continued to exercise its present functions, the Corporations would be little more than vestries; and, on the other hand, the abolition of the Board would be the destruction of the only common organization which has yet been established in London. The jealousy which naturally exists between the Central and the District Boards would become more inconvenient if Corporations were created, and at the same time deprived of ordinary municipal attributes.

The power of the metropolitan boroughs will be still further reduced if they are overshadowed by a Corporation of London; nor is it easy to discover what purpose the smaller Corporations will serve, except to provide constituencies for the governing body. The police will still be administered by the Government, while the management of streets, of buildings, and generally of important affairs, will be vested in the central Corporation. The Metropolitan Board of Works has no means of providing for the expenses of administration, except by levying rates; but the Corporation of London will, according to the scheme, possess the estates which now belong to the City, to the great increase of its influence and independence; yet the advantage which it will thus possess over the Board of Works will perhaps be counterbalanced by the abolition of the permanent Presidency. There will be no security for the administrative ability of annual Lord Mayors, and the conduct of business will practically devolve on some subordinate officer. It may be doubted whether functionaries elected without reference to their general ability or special qualifications will be competent to govern, for local purposes, a community as large as one of the great American States, or as a minor European kingdom. When the powerlessness of the several boroughs is discovered, an agitation will inevitably arise for the direct election of the Lord Mayor and the Common Council. A secondary election in some degree increases the chance of regard to merit, but, by diminishing popular confidence, it tends to weaken authority. The members of the Metropolitan Board of Works are personally superior to ordinary vestrymen, but, perhaps for that reason, they are not popular in their official capacity. Their own immediate constituents gratify their jealousy by reminding their chosen representatives that the District Boards alone derive their power directly from the people.

Some of the criticisms on Mr. BUXTON'S Bills will apply to any plan which may be devised for constituting a metropolitan municipality, and the practical difficulty of carrying any measure of the kind will be more formidable than any theoretical objection. It will be impossible to reconcile the City, by any affectation of deference, to the surrender of its estates and of its ancient privileges; nor will the outlying districts be in all cases eager to be enclosed within the municipal pale. Although vestrymen would probably be glad to assume the rank of councillors and aldermen, it may be doubted whether they would be content to purchase titular dignity at the cost of parochial independence. The necessity of a central Government for the metropolis would increase with the development of local organization; and federal institutions have a tendency to encroach on the functions of their component parts. Notwithstanding the frequent expression of a desire for greater unity of municipal administration, a Corporation presiding over a population of three or four millions would perhaps excite a certain feeling of uneasiness. No similar body has ever been placed by the side of a national Government; nor is it easy to calculate the consequences of possible rivalry and collision. The Municipality of Paris has never been allowed to resume an independent position since under HÉBERT and CHAUMETTE it bearded the Convention, although during the short-lived Republic of 1848 a member of the Provisional Government bore the title of Mayor of Paris. The largest Corporation now existing has acquired, in its administration of the city of New York, a deserved reputation as the most corrupt body in the civilized world. A large portion of the municipal taxes, which amount to five or six millions sterling, is notoriously appropriated by the members of the Corporation, while the performance of the corresponding duties is scandalously neglected. A London Corporation would be incomparably more respectable; but in some respects it might be too strong for legislative control. The City has repeatedly succeeded in baffling Parliament, although its dominions form but a fraction of the metropolitan area. A Corporation representing the whole of London would be more ambitious and more powerful, and in times of excitement it might fall under the control of demagogues, after the precedent of WILKES who was Lord Mayor of London, and of O'CONNELL who was Lord Mayor of Dublin. Apprehensions of this kind may, even if they are chimerical, impede the establishment of a Corporation of London; but the controversy will be simplified and facilitated by the discussion of a definite project of legislation.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

ONE more Attorney-General has tried his hand at Bankruptcy Reform, and we may congratulate Sir ROBERT COLLIER on having produced by far the most promising Bill which has yet been brought forward. It has the merits of being a Consolidation Bill, and of being comparatively brief. And without entering now into details, many of which will require much discussion, we must record our conviction that it is almost as important that the Bankruptcy Law should be consolidated in one clear and terse statute, as that it should be based upon sounder principles than have hitherto prevailed. At this stage, however, we confine ourselves to a consideration of the principles on which the ATTORNEY-GENERAL has based his measure of reform, and we should have little but praise to accord in this respect if the principles laid down were acted upon, as perhaps they ultimately will be, somewhat more fully and more boldly than is done by the clauses of the Bill as they at present stand.

Hitherto Bankruptcy legislation has professed three distinct objects—first, to distribute the bankrupt's estate equitably among his creditors; secondly, as a sort of counterpoise to the cruel but not ineffective policy of imprisonment for debt, to give an insolvent debtor a discharge from his liabilities; and thirdly, to punish criminal and quasi-criminal offences against commercial morality. Of these three functions of Bankruptcy Law, which we may call respectively the administrative jurisdiction, the whitewashing jurisdiction, and the penal jurisdiction, it has been growing clearer every year that the first is the primary if not the sole legitimate object, and that the others, if touched at all, should only be dealt with as incidental to good administration. Sir ROBERT COLLIER stated this even more strongly than we have done. He said, in his speech on the introduction of the Bill, that the sole object of a Bankruptcy Law was to collect the bankrupt's estate, and distribute it among the creditors as fairly, cheaply, and speedily as possible. We are not at all sure that this is not strictly right, but the Bill, as printed, does not quite come up to this statement of its principle. It contains provisions for the discharge of the bankrupt, though it is intended to be accompanied by a Bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt. It does, however, abolish the existing penal jurisdiction, leaving criminal bankrupts to be dealt with by the ordinary law. As to the propriety of this last arrangement there could be no doubt, if only the ordinary law were made capable of dealing effectually with the gross commercial swindles which lie at the foundation of so many bankruptcies. Sir ROBERT COLLIER admits that it is not so, and in his reply to the criticism offered on the introduction of his Bill, said, truly enough, that the matter was part of the great question of the appointment of a public prosecutor. That is undeniable, but at present we have, in a very unsatisfactory shape, something like a public prosecution of fraudulent bankrupts. It is conducted by the wrong persons, and improperly mixed up with administrative functions; but it is a grave question whether even an anomalous, imperfect, and objectionable method of checking the besetting evil of the day—commercial dishonesty—ought to be abandoned until an effectual substitute is found. Only let the ATTORNEY-GENERAL introduce a Bill for the appointment of a public prosecutor, if possible, for all crimes—but if not, then in all cases of commercial fraud—and no one can object to the withdrawal of all penal jurisdiction from the Court of Bankruptcy.

The whitewashing clauses are open to more question. Was the ATTORNEY-GENERAL right, in his speech, in excluding relief of this kind from the legitimate functions of Bankruptcy Law, or is his Bill right in retaining the jurisdiction in a modified form? In a sense perhaps both are right. On principle it may be that, when imprisonment for debt is gone, a debtor has no right to claim a release until he has paid in full. In fact, however, society and trade are not yet ripe for so severe a rule, and some provisions for the relief of debtors must inevitably find their way into any Bankruptcy Bill. What these provisions should be has long been a moot question, and we are bound to say that Sir R. COLLIER'S clauses are preferable to any that have yet been enacted or proposed, though we think them to some extent unsound in principle, and not unlikely to break down in practice.

The true principle has never seemed to us doubtful, and, as will be seen, the present Bill does make some approach to it. When a man owes more than he can pay, it is his clear duty to do his utmost to satisfy his creditors. On the other hand, it is at least a moral obligation on the creditors to enable the debtor to meet their claims in the manner least destructive to his future career. In the case of a single debtor and a single creditor, what the debtor ordinarily asks, and what the creditor is generally disposed to concede, is time, and nothing else. "Pay me what you can now, and let the rest stand over "till you are in a position to pay that also," is the language of a fair and liberal creditor, and no debtor would think himself ill-used by a friend who was willing to give time, though he was not inclined absolutely to remit any portion of his claim. What is fair in the case of a single debt is no less fair when a multitude of creditors are concerned. If it can be so arranged, the just and merciful thing must be to give a bankrupt time, and time only, for payment of his debts. Even where bankruptcy is the result, not of fraud or recklessness almost equivalent to fraud, but of imprudence only, we do not see that the insolvent debtor has any right to prefer any higher petition than this; "Give me time and I "will pay thee all."

Now, if this is the right principle, what difficulty is there in applying it? When a man becomes bankrupt, his available property must be divided in satisfaction pro tanto of his creditors. For all that remains of debt, let him have time to turn himself round and accumulate a second fortune if he can. If he succeeds, let his obligations revive; for why should a bankrupt be living in wealth while the creditors whose money he has spent are left without their own?

To some extent, as we have said, the Bill adopts these principles. It provides that, after a bankrupt's available property shall have been distributed, no portion of a debt proveable under the bankruptcy shall be enforced for five years; and on principle we should like to see this extended, according to Mr. JESSEL's suggestion, so as to suspend proceedings equally in respect of proveable and non-proveable debts. There is no distinction between the two, except that the one class of liabilities is capable of estimation, and the other is not; and the reason for giving time to the bankrupt is just as cogent in the one case as in the other. If the provisions in favour of the bankrupt stopped there (care of course being taken to stay the running of the Statute of Limitations, if indeed the law does not already do that by anticipation), we think that enough would be done. At the end of the five years, a bankrupt who had been prosperous would pay the balance of his debts. If still unable to do so, his estate would again be put in course of liquidation, and in all probability the milder form of a creditor's deed would almost invariably be adopted; but if not, the bankrupt would pay so far as he could, and would gain afresh respite of five years to work for his creditors and for himself. This may be thought to be severe on the bankrupt, but, after all is said, it is fairer to be severe on the defaulting debtor than on the unpaid creditor; and any law which compels a creditor not only to give time, but to give up a large percentage of his debt, is not only severe but unjust to those who are denied their rights and deprived of their property. The Bill, however, does not stop where we should like to see it stop. It gives an absolute discharge to every bankrupt who, either out of his estate or by means of his earnings in the five years after his bankruptcy, pays ten shillings in the pound, and this, although at the end of the reprieve he may be ten times as rich as the creditors one-half of whose debts he is allowed to wipe out. It is not suggested, and obviously cannot be suggested, that there is any principle in this hard and fast line of a ten-shilling dividend. The amount of dividend is by no means a test of the honesty of the bankrupt, though it may be a criterion of his cleverness; and the proposed arrangement directly encourages the very common fraud of obtaining goods on credit on the eve of bankruptcy, so as to divide perhaps 51,000*l*. among creditors for 100,000*l*. instead of dividing 1,000*l*. among creditors for 50,000*l*. The clever bankrupt who did this would get off scot free, while the man who abstained from adding to his follies or his frauds this last aggravation would remain liable for half, at any rate, of his unpaid debts. All Sir ROBERT COLLIER's arguments pointed to the conclusion which we have advocated, but he said that if a bankrupt were made liable for twenty, instead of ten shillings, in the pound, it would crush and paralyse the man and prevent him perhaps from ever succeeding in life. Considering how much any merely unfortunate bankrupt might make of a respite of five years, there does not seem much ground for this apprehension; but even if it were true in all cases that such a result would follow, the Bill would be utterly indefensible. It would be equivalent to an enactment that every bankrupt who paid ten shillings in the pound, no matter by what fraudulent devices on the eve of insolvency, should escape altogether, but that every other bankrupt should be "crushed and paralysed and made in-"capable of succeeding in life."

There are other provisions in the Bill—a few bad, some doubtful, and many more good—on which we may hereafter have to comment; but the one matter of paramount importance is to rest the indulgence given to a bankrupt on a sound basis, and for this end nothing is needed except to carry to their legitimate length the principles which for the first time are indicated by Sir R. COLLIER's Bill.

MR. LOWE AND THE METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

MR. LOWE'S answer to a Deputation of the Scottish Meteorological Society involved some characteristic fallacies. There is much to be said for the good old official custom of giving conventional reasons for practical decisions. A commonplace Chancellor of the Exchequer might have told the meteorologists that he regretted that he had no funds at his disposal, or that the House of Commons would be disinclined to vote money for scientific observations, or that no fraction of the grant could be withdrawn from the Royal Society. As a general rule it is inconvenient to state, as a reason for action, any proposition larger than the particular case. Statesmen, like judges, have enough to do in determining the issues immediately before them, without anticipating future applications of general principles. Mr. LOWE's active intellect fits every special case into its proper place in a theoretical system, and he is at all times willing to communicate to the world at large the process by which he has arrived at any particular conclusion. The Meteorological Deputation not only failed to obtain a grant of money, but were also required to listen to a lecture on the proper relations of Government to science. Mr. LOWE informed them that he entirely disapproved of official interference in aid of scientific exertion, and of expending public money for any object which could be accomplished without it. It seemed to him improper that voluntary societies should incur a certain amount of labour and expense, and that, unable or unwilling to extend their sacrifices of time and money, they should at last apply to the Government for assistance in the accomplishment of their objects. The anomaly was especially irritating because the Minister of the day would probably possess far less knowledge than the applicants of the subject-matter in question. Astronomers, chemists, and meteorologists must be regarded in their respective departments as exclusively competent, whereas the public bounty administered by laymen might possibly be misdirected; yet it may be collected from Mr. LOWE's general argument that the fear of misappropriation furnished but a secondary reason for his refusal. In general he held that it was not proper for the trustees of the public purse to contribute to any object beyond the province of administrative government. As the meteorologists had not succeeded in their attempt they were treated with due courtesy; but if their Society had been already in enjoyment of a grant, they would have fared no better than the school-managers whom Mr. LOWE, when he held his former office, invariably treated as a dangerous class, cultivating piratical projects for the plunder of the Treasury. At that time it was useless to argue that the managers had subscribed their own money for the benefit of others, and that they could by no possibility derive any personal advantage from the grants of the Privy Council. In the eyes of the VICE-PRESIDENT they were sturdy beggars, only the more contemptible because their objects were philanthropic; and Mr. LOWE's invariable candour prevented him from concealing in the smallest degree his uncomplimentary opinions. Meteorology is, like reading and writing, a branch of useful knowledge which ought, in the judgment of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, to maintain and propagate itself.

A consistent doctrine perspicuously stated is not necessarily true. Mr. LOWE assumes that the objects of private persons must be certainly private, and probably selfish; and he logically infers that they have no right to diminish their self-imposed burdens by demanding a contribution from the taxpayer. It might be asserted with more plausibility that voluntary subscriptions for public purposes are essentially inexpedient and unjust. If it is right that poor children should be taught the rudiments of learning when their parents are unable or unwilling to pay for their instruction, it would seem, as it probably appears to Mr. LOWE himself, that the cost ought to be borne by the general community. There is no theoretical justice in imposing an exceptional tax on benevolent or pious persons who build and maintain schools because the only alternative would be the non-existence of popular education. As those who provide the money naturally influence its application, prejudices and personal feelings become mixed up with the original motive of benevolence; and Mr. LOWE devotes his acuteness to testing the amount of alloy rather than to appreciating the value of the sterling metal. In practice a sweeping condemnation of voluntary effort would be as erroneous as an indiscriminate refusal of public aid. A wise Legislature and Government will watch the tendency of public benevolence, distinguishing between mere expressions of sentiment and institutions which meet an undoubted public want. Within certain limits the voluntary assumption of exceptional burdens may be properly encouraged. When private enterprise is insufficient, the expediency of supplying the want at the public expense can only be estimated by examination of each particular case. Subscribers to a charitable or useful association are witnesses as well as advocates, having given earnest of their faith in the principles which they promote. A man who gives an annual sum of money, and perhaps a portion of his time, to a Meteorological Society, proves his belief that it is possible and desirable to make discoveries in relation to wind, weather, and climate.

It would be obviously inexpedient to subsidize all scientific societies; and it is unnecessary to inquire whether Mr. LOWE judged rightly in refusing a grant to the Scottish Meteorological Society. In all such cases the head of the proper department must exercise his own judgment, and his decision is for the most part exempt from appeal, unless it is professedly based on questionable principles. The objection which was founded on the alleged ignorance of the Government with respect to scientific subjects is entirely unfounded. It is because the Government has no special facility for pursuing scientific investigation that it may fairly be expected to assist with money associations which supply the official want of knowledge. At all events, and more especially in the present day, science has a practical side, tending, in the words of the great rhetorical promoter of natural philosophy, to the "relief of man's estate." Some sciences, such as chemistry, admit of so many profitable applications that the prosecution of discovery may perhaps be properly entrusted to private enterprise. Astronomy, on the other hand, though it bears practically on navigation, and on some other pursuits, is barren of gain to students of the science; for no man has for his own profit "bound the sweet influences of "the Pleiades, or loosed the bands of ORION." Civilized nations have in general so far differed from Mr. LOWE, that they have provided means for the cultivation of a science which must otherwise be left to enthusiasts or to men of wealth, or be supported by the uncertain liberality of voluntary subscribers. It is said that the ASTRONOMER ROYAL, who is one of the most efficient and most cheaply paid of public servants, considers that his duties are strictly confined to observations and inquiries which may have a practical bearing; but an equally eminent astronomer, occupying himself with the other branches of the science, might be not less advantageously employed. According to Mr. LOWE's doctrine, the Government ought not to contribute to astronomical investigations, because the Minister for the time being may not know a comet from a planet.

The less certain and more imperfect science of meteorology at least aims at apparently useful objects. The seafaring population has remonstrated against the discontinuance of storm-warnings; and the simultaneous observations of temperature and of other particulars, which are now regularly published, are both immediately useful and valuable as materials for future generalization. There is little doubt that the laws which regulate wind and weather, even in the most variable climates, will be sooner or later as fully known as the principles of chemistry; and the benefit of fuller knowledge on these subjects will extend to classes so large and important that it may properly be regarded as public. If the labours of the Meteorological Society are likely to be fruitful, it might be worth the while of the nation to bear a portion of the expense; but the argument against Mr. LOWE is entirely independent of the merits of any single association. A Chancellor of the Exchequer may perhaps be allowed to watch with exaggerated vigilance all proposals which involve a charge upon the revenue; but it is as much his duty to know how to spend as to guard against extravagance. If a thing is to be done, there is nothing saved by charging it on one fund rather than another; and something is lost when the cost is provided for by unequal demands on a part of the community. Mr. LOWE, as might be expected, approves generally of the objects of scientific societies, and it may be supposed that he does not consider that their expenditure is wasted. The extension of the domain of knowledge concerns the whole community, if any object can be thought to be of universal interest, and at first sight it might seem to be entitled to public support. There is no harm in profiting by the willingness of volunteers to bear more than their share of the burden; but sometimes their efforts are practically wasted, because they are insufficient. It is difficult to explain the objection to pay a scientific society for discharging the duties of a public department, except on the assumption that Mr. LOWE's repugnance to cant has exaggerated itself into an intellectual mannerism or prejudice. If the commonplaces of the vulgar are often partially false, the reaction which takes the form of ingenious paradox is not a certain guide to truth. If the subsidies of the State to scientific societies were doubled, the amount involved in the controversy would still be trifling; and science is more likely to suffer by undue parsimony than the Treasury to be depleted by excessive liberality.

THE MINISTRY AND THE FENIANS.

THE questions which were asked in the House on Tuesday last had been asked, at different times and with different degrees of impatience, out of the House. What was the Government thinking of when it remitted the imprisonment of half a score Fenians? What was its inducement? what its hope? And was it true that the liberated prisoners evinced their gratitude for the leniency of the Government by taking the first opportunity to denounce and revile it? These questions have now been answered, and the country can form its own opinion of the wisdom or folly of the policy pursued. A batch of Fenian convicts has been let out of prison unconditionally, because the men were deemed too insignificant to require to be subjected to conditions. And as soon as they were let out they resumed their habit of seditious and treasonable scurrility. Mr. AUGUSTINE COSTELLOE honoured the town of Ballinasloe with his presence on his return from prison, and there informed a sympathetic audience that he still was, as he always had been, a Fenian, and that "so long as he had "breath he would conspire and plot to overthrow the British "Government." Another ex-convict, at a dinner in Cork, where the Mayor presided, exhorted his enthusiastic audience to trust to the sabre, not to the Government, for the vindication of their rights. The only rebuke which this insane rodomontade received from the august municipal authority in whose hearing it was uttered, was an expression of confidence that Mr. GLADSTONE would give them what they wanted as soon as their swords could. Mr. GLADSTONE will feel proud of this Mayor's confidence.

It is indeed difficult to acquit the Government of very grave misconduct in this affair. We do not impute to Mr. GLADSTONE a political Jesuitism like the religious Jesuitism which Mr. ROEBUCK half ascribes to him. We, for our part, do not regard him as a Fenian in disguise. We do not suspect him of angling for the votes of the Brotherhood against the prospective election of the Fenian President. We do not believe that he carries about in his pocket a cut and dried Declaration of Irish Independence. But we shall not be surprised to hear that this is said of him, and believed by many. Certainly it is difficult to reconcile this strange extravagance of lenity with the ordinary principles which inspire statesmen. It is open to the obvious criticism that it exposes the Cabinet to suspicion of a connivance with sedition of which its friends know it to be entirely guiltless. But, if Ministers are guiltless of this, what was their real object? There are three well-known and well-founded reasons for the condonation of political offences. The first is, when the punishment has effected its end, and the offenders are both discomfited and penitent; the second, when the severity of the punishment has been immeasurably disproportionate to the offence committed; the third, when the party of the culprits is likely to gain the ascendant, and it is expedient to conciliate them before the day of reprisals comes. Each of these contingencies may justify a recourse to sudden and extraordinary clemency. But none of them can be urged in justification of the act of Ministerial clemency now under consideration. We have just seen how little is the regret or the penitence of the pardoned. No one will pretend that the punishment inflicted was too severe for the crime committed. This was about as serious as any crime could be. It is childish to speak of it as a mere political offence, which ought to go scot-free. Doubtless it suits both the taste and the policy of the gentry who compose the Amnesty Committee, to fritter away the guilt of sedition to something less important than petty larceny. Many of the Committeemen are no doubt keenly alive to the probability of their figuring in the same dock as those with whom they so warmly sympathize, and the kindness which they feel proceeds as much from motives of obvious self-interest as from compassion. But Mr. GLADSTONE might be expected to remember that other persons besides the patrons or abettors of sedition are concerned in the administration of the criminal law. The people of England, and all people in Ireland who have anything to lose, will not complacently submit to a commiseration which limits its regard exclusively to the disturbers of the public peace. They will bear in mind the events of two years ago, and ask why the Minister of the Crown intervenes to arrest the course of public justice. They remember only too well that for months together the sister island was convulsed by the machinations of mock patriots who proved their love of country by terrorism and assassination; who kept some counties in a state as bad as that of civil war; who murdered policemen, attacked private houses, stopped the ordinary trade of the country, frightened away capital, and brought upon a whole people the degrading suspension of the Habeas Corpus. They cannot forget the expense and the terror—the cost of a large army and numerous constabulary, of extraordinary assizes and prosecutions—which the insane defiance of the Government brought upon the country. They cannot forget the sacrifice of ease, comfort, and security bravely volunteered by loyal subjects to crush the conspiracy of mouthing madmen. They cannot forget the high sense of duty and the noble contempt of danger displayed by those juries who gave a true and just verdict in spite of the secret and avowed sedition-mongers by whom they were threatened. They cannot forget the interruption, not only to trade and commerce, but to the daily intercourse of social life, with which these wretched malefactors cursed the land; the mutual distrust of friends and neighbours, masters and servants. Neither can they forget—for its signs are, unhappily, still before their eyes—the painful sense of general insecurity which long survived the frustration of this parody of treason. They remember, too, the comparative relief which was felt by every decent man when the ordinary vindication of the civil law gave something like a return to the normal repose of tranquil times. Ireland had only just begun to breathe afresh after the unhappy excitement of two years ago. The impatient and hurried sale of property, which was provoked by the threat of a civil conflict, had ceased. Not only had men of wealth and position begun to resume their residence amidst their tenants with confidence, but the poorer occupiers themselves had recovered from the apprehensions of stealthy and nocturnal visits from the emissaries of Fenianism. There is a large section of middle-class agriculturists in Ireland who, by ties of friendship and kinship, are eminently exposed to the solicitations of plotters and conspirators. So long as a conspiracy is hatching, the lives of these poor men are a worry and vexation to them. They find themselves made the involuntary members of secret societies, and the involuntary agents of treasonable plots. In the mere agony of doubt and fear, they are forced to sympathize with treasons and plots. The discovery of the plot and the punishment of its authors leave them free from fear and anxiety. This was the state which had been attained by many Irishmen, too happy to be left to the quiet prosecution of their respective callings. Just as they were settling to their work, the Government undoes all that it had done, and lets loose upon the world a parcel of crackbrained and ranting enthusiasm. While capital is recovering its confidence, and industry its habits, these parodists of patriotism are making a tour of sedition, disquieting the loyal, and re-animating the spirits of the disaffected. The result is obvious. The first and intuitive inference of the Irish mind is that the Fenians are released because the Government is afraid of them and of their numerous auxiliaries. It is not the beneficent Government which is thanked for its clemency, but the "cowardly" Government which is despised for its weakness. As a weak Government is a thing to be ashamed of, THADY and TERENCE don't mince their words in giving expression to their contempt, and when men who have experienced the worst that a Government can inflict on them vent their contempt upon it, there is no wonder that others should not respect it. Mr. GLADSTONE may be excused for not having foreseen the consequences of this lenity. But how came Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE not to warn his chief of them? He at least must have known the effect which was sure to be produced on the minds of his countrymen. If Mr. GLADSTONE thought by such means to enhance the popularity of his Irish policy, he entirely mistook the people with whom he had to deal. They would not one whit less have appreciated his sympathy in changing one law constitutionally because he punished the unconstitutional infraction of another. As it is, he has combined a most momentous change in one institution of the country with a signal concession in favour of those who vaunt their hatred of all its institutions. It is not wonderful then that he has excited a double suspicion against himself—that of timidly conniving at schemes which he must view with abhorrence, and that of bidding for an unworthy and undignified popularity by pardoning their authors.

Certainly the terror inspired by the punishment of the Fenian convicts is of the slightest kind possible. At this moment the members of the twin associations—the Fenian Brotherhood and the Irish Republican Brotherhood are planning the movements of the ensuing campaign which, according to their programme in the Irishman, they have resolved to carry on in the United Kingdom. By this we suppose they mean that it is not to be restricted to Ireland, but extended to England and Scotland. Though an open war would not thus be announced beforehand, it is not impossible that the tactics to which they have heretofore had recourse may be repeated in the towns of Great Britain. We may perhaps hear of houses fired in great cities, policemen assassinated, a few stands of arms taken here and there from old pensioners or abandoned forts. It is too late in the year to begin this sort of campaign with effect now, but it will keep for the dark and short days of autumn. Possibly it may cause us a good deal of trouble and some cost. Both the cost and the trouble might have been saved had Mr. GLADSTONE's temperament allowed him to prolong the imprisonment of the liberated felons. But we shall only have to capture and imprison them again. When next they are confined, we hope that their present conduct will act as a warning against their second liberation. The English people have a right to be exempted from the annoyance and worry of constantly hunting down dirty and disaffected Hiberno-Americans. One good result of their present vagaries is, that the chief leaders of the last abortive rising still remain, and will continue to remain, in prison, notwithstanding the earnest and indignant protest of the Amnesty Committee. It is satisfactory, too, to learn that the gaolers are not soon to lose the personal acquaintance of Messrs. LUBY and O'DONOVAN ROSSA, who were at one time supposed to be among the objects of Mr. GLADSTONE's unseasonable compassion. The severity which he has wisely exhibited to these men, if it had also been exhibited to their followers, would have saved some trouble in England, and no small trouble and disquiet in Ireland.

THE IRISH CHURCH BILL OF 1833

IT is impossible to follow the course of the present measure by which the Irish Church is to be swept away as a State Church, and to be stripped of property given it by the State, without feeling an interest revived in the history of its predecessor six-and-thirty years ago. The Irish Church Temporalities Act of 1833 was a very small piece of legislation as compared with Mr. Gladstone's Bill, but it paved the way for what has now come to pass, and many of the passions it excited, and of the arguments by which it was attacked and defended, are being resuscitated and repeated at the present moment. A sketch, therefore, of its nature and history may not be without interest; and if it is safe to assume anything as to the general knowledge of the past, it is safe to assume that no portion of history is so little known as that which lies just beyond the memory of each generation. The day will come when examination papers will be set in the history of William IV.'s reign, but until that day comes probably no part of English history will be so universally unknown.

Then, as now, it was at the outset of the proceedings of a newly-reformed Parliament, when there was in power a Liberal Ministry with a large majority in the Commons, that the Irish Church Bill was brought in. Parliament was opened on the 29th of January, 1833, and on the 5th of February the King made his Speech, in which, after stating that the attention of Parliament would be directed to the better distribution of the property of the Church, the King went on to say that, "although the Established Church of Ireland is by law permanently united with that of England, the peculiarities of their respective circumstances will require a separate consideration." He also referred to the disturbances then going on in Ireland, which had greatly increased since the end of the preceding Session:—"A spirit of insubordination and violence has risen to the most fearful height, rendering life and property insecure, defying the authority of the law, and threatening the most fatal consequences if not promptly and effectually repressed." So closely does history sometimes repeat itself; and we might almost think it was the present Queen describing the brutal outrages of the last few weeks, and the appeals of released rebels at a Mayor's dinner-table to the "logic of the sabre." The Address of course echoed the Speech, and elicited a warm discussion. Mr. O'Connell at once characterized it as a bloody and brutal Address in answer to a brutal and bloody Speech. This was, in fact, the beginning of O'Connell's long and violent hatred of the Whigs, and he was at once answered by his own special antagonist, Mr. Stanley (Lord Derby), who laid down the proposition that "a Government, to be loved, must first be feared." On the 12th of February the Bill for the Reform of the Church of Ireland was introduced by Lord Althorp, who began by explaining that it was because the Bill was one to which the Government attached great importance that he, as leader of the House, and not Mr. Stanley the Irish Secretary, had been charged with its introduction. Lord Althorp said that although, looking at the proportion of the population attached to the Protestant Church, the people certainly had occasion to complain of the greatness of the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland, yet the amount of those revenues had been greatly exaggerated. The House, he thought, would be surprised to hear that the net revenue of the Irish Bishops was only 130,000*l.* a year; for, although vast tracts of lands belonged to the Bishops, five-sixths of the yearly value went to the tenants. The whole annual income of the Church did not exceed 800,000*l.* The first proposal of the Government was to do away with the whole system of First-Fruits, and, in lieu of it, to tax benefices on a scale which, starting with an exemption of all benefices of 200*l.* a year or under, rose in an increasing ratio according to the value of the benefices, and was estimated to produce, on the whole, an income of 42,000*l.* The Bishops were to be taxed on a scale something similar, and this new taxation was to begin at once, without regard to vested interests. A Board of Commissioners was to be appointed to administer the fund, and as Church-rates were to be forthwith abolished entirely, the fund was to be applied to those purposes to which Church-rates were applicable. Further, by reducing the incomes of some Archbishops and Bishops, by abolishing all sinecure seats in cathedrals, additional funds were to be placed at the disposal of the Commissioners. Out of twenty-two bishoprics, ten were to be swept away, and two archbishoprics out of four; so that, out of the 130,000*l.* a year previously belonging to the Irish Episcopate, 60,000*l.* a year would be at the disposal of Parliament in the sense that Parliament was to hand this sum over to the Commissioners, for Church purposes, and especially for the augmentation of small livings. But the next proposal stood on a very different footing. The Bishops had large landed estates, but they could only grant leases for twenty-one years; yet the leases were in practice annually renewed, and the fine, together with the rent, formed the revenue of the Bishop. The value of such leases, lessened as it was by the uncertainty whether the Bishop would renew the lease, and by the chance of the fine being augmented if the tenant made the property more valuable by improvements, was only twelve and a-half years' purchase. The Government proposed that any tenant who chose to tender a sum equal to six years' purchase might have a lease in perpetuity at a fixed corn rent. The sum thus gained was, it was said, a mere creation of the Legislature, and therefore belonged to the State. By passing an Act of Parliament the State instantly gave a value of six years' purchase to the land, and the State, which created this value, might reasonably keep it for itself.

This was the essence of the Ministerial measure of 1833. It did not profess to apply any of the revenues of the Church to secular purposes. The Government most carefully guarded itself against doing anything of the sort. It left to the disposal of Parliament, for any purposes that Parliament might think fit, no Church property at all. The theory of the Ministry was that by a clever stroke of legislation the State invented a new piece of property, which did not belong to the Church in any sense, for it did not exist, and it was only the State that could make it exist. It was a sort of treasure-trove, a fortuitous accession of wealth, which Parliament might, it was supposed, apply to secular purposes because it never had belonged to the Church. It was, as it were, a new thing belonging by right of occupancy to its maker and inventor, the State. Thus the whole character of the Bill of 1833 was different from that of the Bill of 1869. It rearranged the revenues of the Church so as to admit of the abolition of church-rates, and to augment the incomes of the poorer incumbents. It suppressed ten bishoprics without in any way consulting the Church as to its wish to dispense with this amount of spiritual supervision, and it proposed to leave Parliament to apply to any purposes, secular or not, but in no way specified, a fund which was not, and never had been, ecclesiastical property. The Bill of the present year is totally different. It allows the Church to regulate its own spiritual affairs, but it takes away a vast amount of ecclesiastical property and applies it to secular purposes—to purposes that have indeed a sort of tinge or halo of religiousness about them, but the effect of which is to reduce the amount of county-rates paid by Irish tenants.

Mr. O'Connell followed Lord Althorp, and expressed his warm approval of the Bill, which he considered "contained within itself the seeds of future amelioration." The Bill, though not going so far as he could wish, was founded on a valuable principle, since it recognised the right of Government to look into the state of ecclesiastical property hereafter. "They had in Ireland fever hospitals, receptacles for the insane, and institutions where individuals afflicted with various maladies were received. These institutions might be supported by a portion of that ecclesiastical property." It would, he thought, be found hereafter that, by a due appropriation of part of those Church revenues, the country might be relieved from the Grand Jury Cess. It thus appears that the destination of the ultimate surplus of the Irish Church was anticipated by O'Connell. Mr. Gladstone is adopting word for word the suggestion which O'Connell then made; but in so far as O'Connell spoke broadly of applying ecclesiastical property to the purposes he recommended, he was departing from the proposal of the Ministry of the day. He might choose to think that their Bill would afterwards lead to applying ecclesiastical property to secular purposes, but this was something different from what they proposed. They were secular funds, secular because invented and called into existence by the State, that the Government of Earl Grey proposed that Parliament should, if it thought fit, apply to secular purposes. At a later period of the evening Mr. Stanley owned that the Cabinet were, as had been hinted by a previous speaker, not agreed on the abstract point whether the State had a right to touch Church property, but he said that the proposal submitted to the House did not raise this question, because the Church had no claim to a property which it had never possessed; and although Mr. Stanley did not in the course of his speech refer to the particular suggestions of O'Connell, or express approval or disapproval of them, he contended that the difference between the former value and the increased value of the episcopal lands might be applied to secular purposes, or to any purposes that the State might direct. On the other hand, as Mr. Stanley is now the Earl of Derby, it ought to be recorded that he at the same time stated that he never would consent to any measure which he thought in his conscience and judgment would destroy or injure the Protestant Church in Ireland, or would interfere with the extension of the Protestant religion.

The Opposition was led by Sir Robert Inglis and Sir Robert Peel. The former urged that, if the King were to pass the Bill, he would violate his coronation oath, and that the members of the Legislature were equally bound by the oath they had taken not to support it. He also thought the Bill an infraction of the Act of Union, and contrary to the preamble of the Catholic Emancipation Act. He also thought that, when Lord Althorp said that the revenues of the Irish Church were excessive, he forgot the "expansive force of Protestantism." Further, if so many Irish bishops were suppressed, how would there be enough to attend in the House of Lords? And he ended by dwelling on the merits of the Irish clergy, and the danger to the Church of England if the Church of Ireland were injured. Nothing could be more different, or more curiously mark the difference, between the habits of thought and the intellectual capacity of the two men than the objections of Sir Robert Peel. His first objection was, that a proposition of this sort, as relating to matters of religion, ought to have been brought forward in a Committee of the whole House. He admitted that the time was come when the whole state of the Church of Ireland must undergo an enlarged and comprehensive consideration. He approved of redistributing the revenues of the Church so as to make it better able to propagate and extend the blessings of the Protestant faith, and he thought that Church-rates ought in some way to be abolished. He could not say whether twenty-two bishops were or were not too many for Ireland, but Sir Robert Peel in no way questioned the perfect right of Parliament to suppress bishoprics, if it could be shown that there were too many. He had no scruple in interfering with the spiritual organization of the Church. With regard to the proposed application of the improved value of the land, Sir Robert Peel acknowledged that the Government had offered their proposal as one that did not raise the question whether ecclesiastical property could properly be applied to secular uses; but he urged that it was calculated to mislead, and that, as a matter of fact, it had misled the House, and had been taken, and would be taken, as a declaration that the Government were prepared to secularize Church property. There can be no doubt that Sir Robert Peel was right. The House welcomed the measure for this reason, which was very popular in the House. It was thought to be, and it was immediately treated by O'Connell as being, an indication of the determination of the Government to establish this principle. Lord Althorp and Mr. Stanley did what they could to make this misunderstanding impossible; but they were misunderstood, and much of the disappointment and irritation caused by the Bill was owing to this misunderstanding. Even to this day traces of this misunderstanding remain; and there are persons who confidently assert that Lord Derby in 1833 himself proposed that the property of the Church should be applied to such secular purposes as were then suggested by O'Connell, and are now suggested by Mr. Gladstone.

The progress of the measure was delayed by the passing of the Bill, introduced in accordance with the King's Speech, for the suppression of disturbances in Ireland. This Bill was commenced in the Lords, and was read for a third time there on February 22. The first reading of the Bill was moved in the Commons on February 27, and the third reading was carried on March 29. Thus a whole month was consumed in discussing this Bill, and nothing could exceed the fierceness and animosity with which it was opposed. On March 12, however, a motion had been made for the second reading of the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, and then objections were taken, under the auspices of Sir Robert Peel, to the effect that it was a tax Bill, for it taxed the incomes of incumbents, and therefore ought to be brought forward in a Committee of the whole House. A Committee was appointed to search for precedents, and the Committee supported the objection. Accordingly, on April 1, the House went into Committee, and resolutions were passed for the regulation of the temporalities of the Church. The next day the House agreed to all the resolutions passed. Nothing more, however, was done that month, but the Bill, which was now founded on the resolutions, was read for the second time on May 6, the Ayes being 317, and the Noes 78. In the little band of dissentients is recorded the name of W. E. Gladstone, the member for Newark. Sir Robert Peel of course led the Opposition, and his arguments against the Ministerial scheme of treating the improved value of the episcopal lands as secular property because created by the State appear quite unanswerable. The Bishops, he pointed out, had an unlimited power of leasing, until their powers were restrained by the State, to the limit of 21 years, and the restraint, as stated in the preamble of the Act creating it, was expressly devised in the interest of the Church, that the property of the Church might not be wasted. That the State should relax these restraints, and then claim the benefit accruing from this relaxation for itself, was neither logical nor just. To all which Lord Althorp replied, as might have been done this very week by his then silent opponent, the member for Newark, that "he could not admit that there was any analogy between Church property and that of corporations, and still less was there any between it and the property of individuals which came to them by inheritance."

On May 13th the House went into Committee on the Bill, and Lord Althorp then formally signified that the King had placed his interest in the temporalities at the disposal of Parliament. Sir Robert Bateson, who was supposed to be a good authority on the subject, informed the Government that this measure must lead to the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland, and had alienated from the Ministry the affections of the Protestants of Ireland. Mr. Stanley, who was by this time Secretary for the Colonies, did not contribute much to the debate, except by informing the House that, whereas he had on a former occasion stated that he had discussed the Bill with the Primate, who had said that the least objectionable mode of obtaining Reform was to reduce the number of Bishops, he now wished to let the House know that it was he himself, and not the Primate, who had made that dashing remark. On the 20th May a Mr. Dillon proposed an amendment which anticipated the Bill of 1869. It was that the revenues of the Irish Church should be applied to purposes of general utility after the demise of the present incumbents. Only sixteen members, and of these only six

English members, voted for the amendment, among whom was Mr. Roebuck, whose political testament, if he had tried to make it then, would have been very different probably from what it was when he made it last week. The Bill for some time made little progress, because the House was busy with the Ministerial proposition for the abolition of slavery, but it was taken up in a desultory way on June 17, when Mr. Lefroy defended the large number of Irish bishops, on the curious ground that Irish bishops were really only like archdeacons, so that their number might be expected to be large. The mouths of English archdeacons must have watered when they heard that in Ireland archdeacons were of so glorified a nature that the Ministry held it a great credit to themselves that they ventured to propose to reduce the income of one of them—the Bishop of Derry—to 8,000*l.* a year. On the 11th an amendment was proposed, but had to be withdrawn without a division, to the effect that Irish bishops should, after a certain date, cease to sit in the House of Lords; but, oddly enough, the ardent reformer who proposed this was willing that Irish archbishops should continue to sit for ever. On June 19 the Committee got so far as the 108th clause, and then, two days later, came a memorable day, the day that finally separated O'Connell from his party, and in the end separated Lord Derby from the Whigs. Mr. Stanley announced that the Government proposed to withdraw the 147th clause, by which the surplus was to be appropriated to such purposes as Parliament might think fit. He yielded to the strong feeling that prevailed in the House and in the country against any alienation of Church property, and he candidly owned that, although the Ministers had been able to convince themselves and their own circle, they had been unable to convince any one else that the surplus created by the State was secular in its inception. It is worth remarking that Scotland and the Scottish members were violently opposed to anything like disestablishment or disendowment; and this may warrant the belief that the success of Mr. Gladstone's present Bill will be due to the Free Church movement in Scotland more than to any other single cause. The necessity or wisdom of modifying the Bill to get it through the Lords also weighed of course very strongly with the Government, although they could scarcely aver that they were guided by this consideration. But, directly Mr. Stanley sat down, he and his colleagues were bitterly taunted with their base fear of the Upper House; member after member declared that he had been deceived, and had been induced to vote for the Irish Coercion Bill on the false pretence that he was to have an opportunity of conciliating Ireland by voting for the 147th clause; and O'Connell not only denounced the Ministry as faithless to Ireland, but declared, and carried out his threat, that he would vote against the Bill going any further. Nevertheless, the Ministry had a majority of 131, and the Bill passed through the Commons in the shape which the Ministry recommended. It must be observed that the effect of the Government proposal was, that no declaration should be made as to the appropriation of the surplus, and it was left as an apple of discord for future Sessions to say what this appropriation should be. All that was done was to leave out any express statement that Parliament should decide how the surplus should be applied.

The Bill was read for the third time and passed on July 8, after Mr. Sheil had ineffectually proposed to insert in the preamble an express declaration of the right of the Legislature to make such appropriation of the property of the Church as should most conduce to public utility. To us in this day the only feature of interest in the last debate of the Commons on the Third Reading is that Mr. Gladstone took that opportunity of uttering his sentiments on the subject. He was prepared to defend the Irish Church, although he admitted it had slumbered. But what Protestant Church had not slumbered? As for the future, it was of the utmost importance to have a body capable of spreading and extending the Protestant doctrines. The theory now upheld by Sir Stafford Northcote, it may be observed, was not invented then; a perfectly stationary Church still seemed rather ignoble, and the defenders of the Irish Church believed that it had an "expansive force," and that the business of the Irish clergy was to extend Protestantism. On July 9 the Bill was read for the first time in the Lords, the Duke of Newcastle entreating the Bishops to vote against it on principle, regardless of consequences, and the Bishop of London replying that he thought it was always unwise to be indifferent to the consequences of a vote. The debate on the Second Reading took place on July 17, and no speech made on that occasion is more pleasing to read now than that of the Marquis of Westmeath, who said that he objected to the amalgamation of the diocese of Kilmore with that of Elphin, because the then Bishop of Kilmore was a very old man, and if the Bishop of Elphin died first this old Bishop of Kilmore would have, in taking charge of the two dioceses, to go thirty Irish miles and then cross the Shannon. And how could the Bishop cross the Shannon, and where, he would ask, could the Bishop put up at night? These pertinent questions, he thought, quite disposed of this great measure of national justice. The debate was adjourned, and the next night, the 18th, the Bishop of Exeter made a great demonstration against the Bill. On the 20th, he was followed by Lord Eldon, who said that, if the Bill passed, the House of Lords would not last twenty years; and he reached the loftiest flight of Eldonian humbug—the completest type of humbug perhaps ever attained in England—by declaring that "the Archbishops, Bishops, and clergy might undergo much persecution, but he hoped that they would allow him—if they would allow a layman to go along with them—to take a full share of the evils of the Church." Let it be fully remembered that one of the most audacious parts of the Bill was to cut down the income of that sweet martyr, the Bishop of Derry, to 8,000*l.* a year. With no inconsiderable courage, the Bishop of London (Bishop Blomfield) followed Lord Eldon, and announced his intention to support the Bill. The Archbishop of Dublin supported him; but the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Howley) took the other side, arguing against so sweeping a reduction, "more especially as the Bishops must be useful in the capacity of resident gentlemen." Two Royal Dukes took part in the debate, the Duke of Sussex being as much for the Bill as his brother of Cumberland was against it. The division showed that Ministers had a majority of fifty-nine. A few amendments were made in Committee, but of so slight a nature that the Government advised the Commons to agree to them, and on the 2nd of August all discussion on the Bill was at an end, and it received the assent of both Houses.

NAPOLEON LE BIEN-INTENTIONNÉ.

MACHIAVELLI has a remark upon Pope Julius II. to the effect that the successful reign of that warlike ecclesiastic was owing, not simply to his own character, but to the extent to which his character suited and harmonized with the age in which he lived. If, he says, Julius had lived in an age averse to bold enterprise, he would have proved, not a successful, but a very unsuccessful, ruler. The truth of such a remark as this has its limits; for there can be no doubt that capacity and strength of character are in a great measure tested by the very fact of a man being able to adapt himself to the age in which he lives. A fool stands fast, concentred in himself; a wise man discerns the signs of the times, and knows how far he must give way to them before he can effect anything by his own influence. Still, for all that, a man's success and reputation must greatly depend on circumstances that lie purely outside his control; and the same temper, guided by an equal amount of insight, may subject one man to blame, and gain for another, under altered circumstances, boundless praise. And when circumstances change quickly, the same man may in a short time appear under marvellously different aspects. Thus it was that the profound sagacity, as it was once thought, of Louis-Philippe did, after his abdication, entirely vanish from the minds of men, and, instead of it, there appeared in him marvellous blindness and misguided folly.

We have been led into these remarks by the tone which is held towards the Emperor of the French in the very able letters from a Parisian correspondent, a Frenchman, which the Times has now been publishing for some weeks past. The Emperor is spoken of in these letters with undisguised hostility, but hostility of a kind wholly different from, and even opposite to, the vehement denunciations that were employed against him by his political opponents some years ago. He is nicknamed "Napoleon the Well-intentioned"; he is spoken of as a man who invariably desires to do the right thing, but who as invariably fails from confusedness of mind and a stupid habit of bungling. Such a representation of him has, no doubt, a measure of truth and a measure of prejudiced caricature. But what first occurs to one is, what an inversion this is of the view generally entertained in Europe at the time of Magenta and Solferino, and for some years later! Then he was looked upon as an unscrupulous, and on occasions cruel, but subtle and deep-counselling, ruler; as the man without whose implied assent no great change in European politics could be effected; as one who had never any but selfish aims, but whose aims were prudently conceived and surely carried out. And if we go further back in his history, we shall see him in a third guise, widely differing from either of these two—as a harebrained enthusiast, whose visionary schemes were rather topics of mirth to sensible men than susceptible of serious consideration. Can three portraits of character differ more from each other than these three do? And yet it is quite certain that the Emperor cannot be described rightly without an admixture of all three of these delineations.

The surest way of understanding what a man is, is to see what he admires. Now Louis Napoleon has never left the world in doubt as to the kind of character towards which he invariably looks with special admiration. "To understand the epoch in which one lives" is with him the keynote of all praise; to misunderstand it is the keynote of all blame. The Emperor, then, has chosen as his motto, "to understand his epoch"; he has tried, more than anything else, to assimilate himself to the men of his time, and to be the propagator and champion of modern ideas. It is this effort which has introduced into his character that extreme complication of which we have spoken. For "to understand the epoch in which one lives" is rather the motto of a speculative than of a practical mind. Practical men may, if they can and if they will, consider the thoughts of the age as a whole; it is better that they should do so, but their not doing so will not entail on them immediate ruin. But to practical men, and most of all to the rulers of countries, it is destruction not to have a quick eye to their immediate environment, to have ready expedients for emergencies, to be alive to superficial changes of feeling and the variable workings of the machinery of States. Thus the necessities of a practical man differ wholly from that "understanding of his epoch" which is the prime necessity of a speculatist. And in history or fiction the characters which are the most inexplicable problems are those in which the speculative and practical efforts, the "desire to understand" and the "necessity to act," have co-existed side by side, but yet have not sufficiently amalgamated with or influenced each other. Such a character was Cromwell, and such a character was Hamlet.

Of all practical men, the despot has need to be most practical. If he fails in this, his downfall is at once certain, and far greater than any that can befall men in a meaner station. It may be his wish to understand; but to employ hard physical force is his necessity. Now the First Napoleon was the model despot. "To govern" was his watchword; none could look with such scorn as he did on the "idealists," on the men who tried to look a little deeper than their neighbours. To understand the manœuvring of battalions, the friendly or inimical dispositions of his neighbours, the means of keeping down obstinate, refractory people, was all very well; but to understand anything further, of what practical use was it? Thus his figure was at once colossal and simple; if he fell, it was because Europe was too great to be dominated over even by his imperial capacity. He had no secret enemy of conflicting impulses in his own mind.

We should be doing the present Emperor injustice if we did not say that his singularly complex character appears to us to contain nobler elements than any which were exhibited by the First Napoleon. He certainly has no contempt for idealists; he has in himself much of the idealist. His desire to understand his epoch is even noble; and he has always endeavoured, as far as was consistent with the maintenance of his power, to further the good of his generation. But, then, "as far as is consistent with the maintenance of his power"—this qualification is so vast that few can believe that posterity will look back upon Louis Napoleon as, on the whole, a benefactor of mankind. A Greek tragedian would have represented him as a man afflicted by an Atè—by an inexplicable curse, arising out of some action of his own which turns all his good endeavours and struggles into mischief and calamity. It is easy to see that at the outset these two impulses co-existed in him—the fresh and honourable desire for the good of mankind, the enthusiasm for liberty, for national life and vigour; but, alongside of this, the desire to be himself the chief agent in human affairs. It is easy to see, likewise, that whenever these two impulses have come into collision, the latter has always gained the mastery over the former. Nor can the moral verdict of reprobation on such a career be doubtfully delivered; though there is much to mitigate our hatred of the man.

It is, however, the ability and not the character—the intellectual and not the moral nature—of Louis Napoleon that is the most interesting subject of discussion, and that on which the greatest variety of opinion exists. Certainly we do not agree with those who disparage or think slightingly of it. To underrate the tension of brain, the constant vigilance, required in the management of a great empire by a single person for a number of years—not to speak of the skill with which the opportunity gaining such an empire was seized—is only possible for those who have been blinded by a, doubtless just, animosity against the oppressor of their and his country. And yet it is perfectly true that the ability of Louis Napoleon has by no means displayed itself with any very striking brilliancy; it has subjected itself to disparagement; and it is clear also how this has happened. No intellect can produce an effective or splendid result which does not work on a single and simple design. The design may be good or bad; this does not matter, as far as the splendour of the result is concerned, though it matters much to its excellence; but it is a first necessity that it should be simple, and not ambiguous or confused. Such a design the First Napoleon had: it consisted simply in this, to make as many people as he could subservient to his will and submissive to his power. But the present Napoleon has had a double mind, an ambiguous design; his enterprises have been prompted half by chivalrous feeling and half by selfish interest. If he has desired to promote the noble aspirations of humanity, he has also, and at least equally, desired to be the founder of a dynasty. With such duplicity of purpose, what grand result could be attained? It is possible to be grand in virtue; it is possible to be grand even in wickedness. But to the man who hangs between good and evil, to the Laodicean, to him who is unstable in all his ways, what grandeur is possible? With the right hand to lay the foundation-stone of a united Italy, with the left hand to obstruct and harass the builders; to give Lombardy, and filch Savoy and Nice; to send the troops of Victor Emmanuel against Naples, and to keep his fleet from off Gaeta; to be desirous to propagate ideas, and to be able only to propagate bullets; above all, to wish ardently and promise perpetually to give to France that self-government which is the greatest gift a ruler can give to his people, and which, if he could give it, would reflect eternal honour on his name, and yet to be obliged, not only to refrain from giving this gift, but to spend all his energy in preventing the French people from wresting it from him—surely no ruler was ever placed in a position so little calculated to display his ability to advantage. If, indeed, the French Emperor could have had an uninterrupted course of material success, there would have been much to soothe his failure in a nobler ambition. He has a preference for the higher standard; he would like to be the benefactor of France and of Europe in respect of great thoughts and aspirations, to found institutions that should live, and be the reliever of the wants of mankind; but failing this, he would have not disliked carrying his arms over conquered provinces, and winning a name among the great military monarchs of the world. But this has been denied him; he has seen neighbours overtop him and win brilliant success, while he has been defeated; he has lost material no less than spiritual triumphs; partly through the force of circumstances, and partly from the thwarting influence of the less selfish elements of his own mind. And yet, when we speak of the less selfish elements, it is singular how much of petty desire has mixed itself even with these. In that inimitable letter to M. Ollivier, published the other day—than which surely no man ever wrote a more stinging satire on himself—the predominance of his wish to be famous over his wish to do good is manifested with the greatest naïveté. "He desires," he says, "to do something striking"; not to potter in a weak vacillating manner, not to make some small concession here and withhold some small concession there, but to blaze out before the eyes of the world; not to do what he has persistently done, but to do what he has never done. There can be no doubt where Dante would have placed Louis Napoleon—among the angels who were rejected alike by heaven and hell:—

> quel cattivo coro
> Degli angeli che non furon ribelli,
> Nè fur fedeli a Dio, ma per sè foro.
> Cacciarli i ciel per non esser men belli,
> Nè lo profondo inferno gli riceve,
> Ch' alcuna gloria i rei avrebber d' elli.

We have said that we do not agree with those who think meanly of the ability of Louis Napoleon. But we agree with them decidedly so far, that that mysterious subtlety for which he used to be so famous is not the subtlety of a man who is all-penetrative himself and shrouds himself up from the eyes of others, but the subtlety of a man whose thoughts are as mysterious, as much without a clue, to himself as to any one else. It is the subtlety of a Hamlet, not that of a Talleyrand. Such men as he is can win the remembrance, only by winning the love, of mankind. It is a coarser nature, a nature of stronger fibre, a Cæsar or a First Napoleon, that concentrates and rivets men's attention by the display of tremendous force. This kind of success Louis Napoleon has not been able to attain; the nobler success that is won by a consistent course of just and beneficent acts he has chosen not to win. He cannot expect to found a dynasty; and, when he dies, what motive will any man have for remembering him one moment longer?

ATHLETICS.

ENGLISHMEN may be slow to entertain novelties, but when the first disinclination is overcome, they usually go to the opposite extreme, and prosecute them with extraordinary ardour and persistency. A dozen years ago athletic sports were almost unknown in this country; now they are celebrated over the length and breadth of the land. A dozen years ago there was here and there a gymnasium; but the youth of England rather pooh-poohed parallel bars and exercises on the trapèze. They were voted slow; there was a suspicion that they were too nearly akin to calisthenics, an accomplishment that figured side by side with music and the use of the globes in the prospectuses of young ladies' schools; very few people went to see them, and but little kudos attached to the performer. He might be a star of the first magnitude, but his light was obscured; and altogether there was something unbusiness-like and unpractical about the whole affair that debarred all but a select few from taking part in it. But, during the interval between that time and the present, the gospel of Muscular Christianity has been more fully preached and expounded. It has been shown that a man who can run, jump, box, and ride is a much more agreeable fellow, and much more likely to get on in the world, than another who can only shut himself up in his study and read dull books; that, if a large amount of brains is a good thing, a large biceps is a better; and that, though it may be a fine thing to understand the Differential Calculus, or to be able to elucidate obscure—and usually improper—puns in Aristophanes, it is far more profitable to comprehend the full use of your arms and legs, and to avail yourself of them with ease and dexterity. Pattern heroes were created who at college vexed the souls of tutors and of deans by their total neglect of rules and ordinances, but for whom were reserved, in the third volume, the highest prizes that the novelist can award—the rich heiress, the lordly estate, the agreeable remembrance in the millionaire's will. And, in contrast, the fate of the immaculate student was exhibited, retiring, after every statute has been religiously observed and every ordeal successfully passed, pale, prematurely bald, with a permanent stoop and diminished clearness of vision, and, for his reward, the spiritual charge of a remote parish seldom free from fever, the society of an insipid wife, and the undisputed parentage of a small army of children.

It is no wonder that the youth of England studied the two pictures thus set before it, hasted to model itself after the man of muscle instead of the man of mind, and enrolled itself under the banners of the new religion that enjoins its disciples above all things to fear God, and run a mile in four minutes and a half. All over the country athletics became the rage. Boys of fourteen began to train, to get into condition, to t[illegible]athers, to examine the development of their muscles, to measure the circumference of their arms. They regulated their diet; even the accustomed pudding was abandoned, if necessary, and the sweet-shop left unvisited; they got to know what was meant by being drawn too fine, or being a bit above themselves; they studied times to a fraction of a second; they compared their own performances with those accomplished at other schools, and acquired a shrewd notion of handicapping; and there arose a demand in the land for thin jerseys and racing-drawers that quite revolutionized that branch of trade. Even at schools athletics soon became a business; but at the Universities they were speedily exalted almost into a profession. If the intelligent foreigners who recently visited our public schools, and were astonished at the amount of time devoted to cricket, had extended their travels to Oxford and Cambridge, they would have found matter for increased wonderment. They would have discovered that the academical year is conveniently divided into terms named according to the particular pursuits to which they are principally devoted. They would have suggested that perhaps there was a classical term, and a mathematical term, and a philosophical or historical term; and they would have been told that such was by no means the case, but that rather there was a cricket term, and a rowing term, and an athletic term. If some slight signs of incredulity were manifested they would have been taken, if the occasion were favourable, to the running ground. They would have seen a large gathering of persons actively engaged, and of others looking on, criticizing, comparing, but all alike, whether actors or spectators, displaying that gravity and serious earnestness which show the workman to have his heart in his work. They would have seen one young gentleman careering with bewildering rapidity round the running path, and another travelling with a very similar action, but with less velocity; and the difference between running and walking would have been pointed out to them, and they would have failed to comprehend it. They would have seen another young gentleman apparently leaping wildly into infinite space, and another hopping playfully over a series of hurdles, and another holding a chronometer, and another making notes for future guidance, and yet another whirling a fearful and wonderful instrument called a hammer round his head, and finally letting it fly in any and every direction except that originally contemplated. And, moved by the perils of this last exercise to a sense of the duty of providing for their own safety, they would have moved off and would have heard that this was a facsimile of what went on day after day, until every college had tried its own men, and then the picked men of each college had contended among themselves; and lastly, that, on the principle of the survival of the fittest, the picked men of the University had made a solemn expedition to London and done battle against similarly selected representatives of the other University. And on returning into the town it would have been pointed out that the prizes for which these athletes strove were by no means crowns of parsley, but tankards and goblets and medals of silver, a goodly array of which could be seen glittering in the shop-windows of the chief silversmiths, or on the sideboards of the most successful competitors; nay, that it was not an unheard-of thing for prizes more valuable still, say a mastership at a public school, to be given solely on account of proficiency in manly sports. And we think that the intelligent foreigners would have gone away much humbled at having been so ignorant of the aims and ends of English University education.

But in truth athletics are only one sport, or occupation, or business, whichever any one pleases to call them, out of many that are cultivated in a spirit of rivalry and competition, each University striving to outdo the other. Besides the boat-race and the cricket match and the athletics, there are inter-University billiard matches, tennis matches, racket matches, steeple-chases; and in a year or two, we suppose, if the velocipede mania spreads much in England, there will be inter-University bicycle matches also. For some one or other of these pastimes nearly every man has more or less aptitude. That aptitude is soon found out after his arrival at the University; and then he is so plagued and pestered to cultivate it—for the sake of your University, you know—that he is dragged nolens volens into the routine of training and practising. And it is astonishing how much time must be devoted to training and practising before a man can become a University champion in any branch of sport. Athletics offer temptations to an unusually large number of men. The new men who are likely to distinguish themselves in cricket or rowing can be generally counted on one's fingers; but in athletics there is a chance for every one. If a man cannot run, he can perhaps jump; or, if he can do neither, he may very probably be a good walker; while the more solid athletes, who generally possess strength without agility, can go through their ponderous exercises with the shot and the hammer. Again, if a man is not good enough for the University Sports, every college holds its own, and there is besides an open event at most college sports, and in addition the introduction of handicapping has given renewed chances to the most indifferent performers. So that on the whole—even apart from the substantial character of the prizes—there are more inducements to men to devote themselves to athletics than to any other sport. They are purposely arranged and organized so as to attract, not the best men, but the largest number of men. We are therefore justified in speaking of them as a business, which is so worked that as many shareholders as possible may be drawn into it. And the result is that the Universities are becoming more and more schools for the systematic education of the human muscles—a fact of which parents may take note if they please.

It is not to be understood that we are hostile to athletic sports. Far otherwise; but we believe that their least valuable parts are the most brought forward, that they are supported by objectionable and adventitious aids, and that they are being pushed to undue extremes. First, the least valuable parts of an athletic education are those which are connected with flat racing. Naturally, they are held in the most estimation. The best athletic exercise is undoubtedly boxing. It is invigorating, not a tax on the constitution, and has also the merit of being of great use; for a man who can defend himself and use his fists is a man ready armed. Naturally, this is the exercise that is most neglected; so much so, that at the recent meeting of the Amateur Athletic Club, not a single contest could be got up either for the light or the heavy weight prizes. Running is the least valuable athletic exercise, for Englishmen are not in the habit of running away from their enemies, and their friends are not worth the trouble of racing at the rate of ten miles an hour to catch them. It is also the most injurious exercise, as is proved by the sad tales of heart-aches—real, not imaginary—with which the young men of the day trouble their physicians. It is the running, say the physicians, that does the mischief; but still they run on at an unnatural pace, and struggle against nature, and finish "very much distressed," as the papers express it—in other words, staggering along, and very often falling just after the finish from sheer exhaustion. It is curious, too, that men destined for the most part to pass a dull, sober, sedentary life, should prepare for it by exercises more suitable to a hunter in the backwoods; but perhaps it is natural. We all remember the King of Bohemia, whose only passion in life was for navigation, though geographical circumstances prevented him from organizing a national navy. Secondly, we object to athletic sports being backed up by such an objectionable practice as that of rewarding the winners with silver cups and medals. Gentlemen do not expect such solid compliments when they get fifty or a hundred runs at a cricket-match, and the introduction of the custom into any University contest is a vulgar innovation. And lastly, we will support our assertion that athletics are being pushed to undue extremes by a narration of facts. A week or two ago the Thames Rowing Club held their sports, the proceedings at which were duly reported in the leading sporting papers. At the close of the day, after the customary events had been brought off, there was a two-mile steeple-chase. The competitors had to clear twenty hurdles, and also to get in, through, or over a water jump, thirteen feet wide, with four feet of water, and a hedge of hurdles placed in front at the take off. Thirteen started, and the majority quietly jumped into the ditch, and scrambled out—no great athletic feat, but rather calculated to induce rheumatics. This had to be repeated six times, and we believe only two or three of the competitors attempted to clear the ditch at all. So far the steeple-chase was a failure, except that there are always spectators who like to see people looking damp and miserable, and on this occasion they must have been abundantly gratified. But the Thames Rowing Club, which must include in its committee some person of great powers of invention, had yet another surprise in store. An event had been reserved for the last, called an "Obstacle Race." The unhappy competitors were to swim across a lake (which, by the way, was covered with ice a few hours earlier), then run 150 yards over five flights of wattled hurdles, then surmount "an obstacle," and then race home. There was a great deal of mystery about this obstacle. One paper said it would be an extraordinary obstacle; another said it would be an obstacle simply; another that no conception whatever could be formed about it. When made manifest to the eye, it turned out to be a barrier made up of "three perpendicular scaffold-poles, crossed at three-feet intervals by three others." It was nearly dark when the start was effected. The lake was crossed, the hurdles were cleared, and two dripping athletes got over the obstacle and secured first and second prizes. But the candidates for third honours were not so fortunate. Two gentlemen reached the top of the obstacle, and there they remained. They could not get down. Perched on the summit of three perpendicular scaffold poles, sitting there exalted, "by merit raised to that bad eminence," on a bleak evening in March, in the dark, numbed with cold and saturated with muddy water, their position cannot have been very comfortable. But soon a friend arrived to keep them company. A third gentleman equally eager to be placed in the race appeared on the summit of the obstacle. He also could not get down. He looked at the pair beside him, sitting fixed and motionless. Sedent, æternumque sedebunt. Should he also abide on a perpendicular pole, crossed by a horizontal one? No. How then should he get down. Happy thought; tumble down. Accordingly he tumbled down, and the shock of the fall preventing him from reassuming the erect posture, crawled the remainder of the distance and won the third prize. Thus we gather that if you are willing to swim, run, jump, climb up an obstacle, sit on a pole, tumble off it, run the risk of vertebral paralysis, and finally crawl on all fours, and will do all this in the dark, on a wintry night, you may get the third prize, and have the reputation of being a rather indifferent athlete. We shall look with curiosity for future specimens of ingenuity in the developments of athletic science. If there is any truth in the converse of the proverb, we ought to be not far off the sublime of athletics, for the ridiculous has been attained already.

GEMS OF THE DEBATE.

We had our say last week in due form about the wonderful speech which Mr. Disraeli, we are bound to believe, looked on as having some mysterious connexion with the proposals of the Government with regard to the Irish Church. But there are points, both in his speech and in some of the speeches which followed his, which are well worthy of a week's life, or even of a longer life still. Some things indeed were said which are worthy of being something when they have nothing to say. No one, we have long known, is a greater master than Mr. Disraeli of the great art of throwing dust in people's eyes, of uttering sentences which sound very well, and which, till you deliberately try to think what they mean, may easily be fancied to have a meaning. But on Thursday week Mr. Disraeli surely overdid it. There is such a thing as being too clever by half. We wonder whether Mr. Disraeli ever read in the old Spectator about the boy who managed the thunder and lightning at a certain play which Addison or Steele or both went to see. His lightnings were sent out so thoroughly at the right time and in the right proportion that the Spectator felt sure that he would some day be a master of his art. But for the present he had two faults to correct; he had to learn to hold his head a little lower and to hide his candle. So it is with the Conservative leader; the lightning of tropes and distinctions and hard words is very fine lightning, but we somehow see the candle. The thing is this time too plainly artificial. The followers of Mr. Disraeli are no doubt like the old woman under the sermon; they don't presume to understand. As long as Mr. Disraeli talks about Mesopotamia, it is all very well; we don't see the candle. But when he gets nearer home, it is another thing. Even in the ranks of Mr. Mill's Stupid Party, there are men who have some mother wit;

> Nec cuncti provinciæ sic sunt idiotæ.

Of course they must not say so, but there must have been some, even among county members, who could see that, in the fine words about guardians and trustees, their leader was simply bamboozling them. They must have picked up enough at Quarter Sessions to know that he was not talking law, and it needs no mastery of any subject to see that he was not talking sense. Surely this time the joke has gone a little too far. Language, we know, was given us to conceal our thoughts; but it is a mistake to make it too palpable that we have no thoughts to conceal.

Mr. Disraeli tells us, in terms which drew forth a cry of "hear, hear," that all philosophers agree that "in their investigations there is an inevitable term when they meet the insoluble, when all the most transcendent powers of intellect dissipate and disappear." We are sure that it is the printer's fault, and not Mr. Disraeli's, that the Insoluble is shorn of that mark of personal respect which it—or he—would certainly have received in a novel of Lord Lytton's. We have all heard of the orator who protested that he did not speak in Italics, but we feel sure that Mr. Disraeli would not deny that he spoke in initial capitals. The notion of meeting the Insoluble is one of the very vaguest, and therefore one of the very grandest, notions that we ever came across. It makes one's flesh creep and one's teeth chatter. We feel that it would be unpleasant indeed to meet the Insoluble if we were walking across a churchyard as the clock was striking one in the morning. When we meet the Insoluble our intellects are to dissipate and disappear. But at some inevitable term we shall all meet the Insoluble, so that we all have to look forward to a day when our intellects, transcendent as they may be, will dissipate and disappear. Somehow this is not altogether a cheerful prospect. And when our intellects have dissipated and disappeared, then, and seemingly not till then, "commences the religious principle." According therefore to Mr. Disraeli, true piety cannot be found except among those whose intellects have dissipated and disappeared at the shock of meeting the Insoluble. The godly, in short, are to be looked for only within the walls of our lunatic asylums; and yet Mr. Disraeli pronounces it to be sacrilege, confiscation, what not, to apply ecclesiastical revenues to the support of the only class among whom "the religious principle" has even "commenced."

For our own part we are in no small fear of the speedy dissipation and disappearance of our intellects. For we have truly met the Insoluble. We have met the Insoluble in more than one passage of Mr. Disraeli's speech. Where, for instance, does the Insoluble reign more thoroughly undisturbed than in such a passage as the following?—

> Church property is to a great extent an intellectual, a moral, and religious tenure. It is the patrimony of the great body of the people, and in our much developed civilization constitutes a mode by which the middle and the working classes become landed proprietors and resident landed proprietors.

A plain man might ask, as a simple matter of fact, how Church property helps the working-classes to become resident landed proprietors. Does it mean that a working-man's son may become a beneficed clergyman or even an Archbishop? Undoubtedly he may, as he may become Lord Chancellor or anything else; but, if this be the meaning, it is, to say the least, a little dark. Then about the Tenure. We can understand an allodial tenure or a feudal tenure, a tenure by knight-service or a tenure in frank-almoigne. But what on earth is an intellectual, a moral, and a religious tenure? And, seeing that the religious principle does not commence till the intellect has dissipated and disappeared, how can a tenure be intellectual and religious at the same time? Then again, it is only to a great extent that Church property is an intellectual, a moral, and a religious tenure. It may be to some extent a tenure unintellectual, immoral, and irreligious. It is undoubtedly a sad truth that some holders of ecclesiastical property are both stupid and wicked. But, if this is what Mr. Disraeli means, it is a very dark way of putting it.

We meet the Insoluble again in Mr. Disraeli's lecture on Disraeli. The definition is a purely arbitrary one of Mr. Disraeli's own invention, but it is something to have a definition at all. And, whether he means it or not, his definition of "confiscation" implies that confiscation may be just:—

> I consider that if the State seizes the property of a corporation without alleging any cause it is spoliation. But if the State alleges some penal cause for its violence, though it may be an unfounded, tyrannical, and oppressive one, then I understand the act of the State to be confiscation. I make that distinction between the two processes.

Mr. Disraeli may truly say "I make that distinction"; for it is a distinction purely of his own making, and one of which nobody ever heard before. Confiscation, it seems, is the act of the State when it seizes the property of a corporation, and assigns a penal cause for so doing. We should like to know exactly what is meant by "a penal cause," but perhaps that is too much to ask. We gather that every case of confiscation is a case of "violence," which sounds odd. For if "the penal cause" which the State alleges, instead of being "unfounded, tyrannical, and oppressive," should be perfectly just, we hold that in such a case the act is confiscation, but that the confiscation is just. Mr. Disraeli surely does not mean that the State can never confiscate the property of a corporation, that it can never dissolve the corporation itself. If so, our Kings and Parliaments, for at least eight hundred years past, have sinned not a little. People talk as if nobody but Henry the Eighth ever dissolved an ecclesiastical corporation. In truth, the thing has been done, almost in every reign, certainly in every century, from Edward the Confessor to Victoria. Was it confiscation, or spoliation, or violence, or what, when the Parliament of Henry the Fifth, alleging a very good "penal cause," suppressed the Alien Priories and confiscated the revenues? What says Mr Disraeli to the endless suppressions and confiscations which are still going on under our own eyes by the authority of the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill? For it is undoubted suppression and confiscation every time that the estates of a prebend fall into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission. Will Mr. Disraeli tell us whether every such transfer is an act of spoliation and violence? The truth is that, under pretence of distinguishing between spoliation and confiscation, what Mr. Disraeli really meant to do was to hurl two long words ending in -ation at the heads of his enemies instead of one. The intellects of his followers, already beginning to dissipate and disappear at the meeting of the Insoluble, with the religious principle already beginning to act upon them, would most likely go away with the notion that Mr. Disraeli had been talking about spoliation and confiscation, that spoliation and confiscation were very dreadful things, that the Government Bill was either spoliation or confiscation or both, and that Mr. Disraeli was a speaker a little above the bucolic understanding.

The Insoluble again stares us in the face when we come to Mr. Disraeli's doctrines about guardians, trustees, and fiduciaries:—

> I acknowledge frankly that the State has relations with all kinds of property, but those relations are of a different character in respect to private and corporate property. The relations of the State to private property are the relations of a guardian, and its relations to private property are those of a trustee. The duty of a guardian to his ward is mainly to protect his ward. The duties of a trustee are of a more complicated character. Undoubtedly his first duty is to see that the intentions of the founder are fulfilled, as far as the varying circumstances of generations will permit. Unquestionably, if he finds that the resources to attain the desired object are extravagantly beyond the amount necessary for the purpose of the trust, it becomes his duty to consider by what means of redistribution of the funds and property the object may be safely accomplished; but this I do maintain, that under no circumstances whatever can a trustee appropriate to himself the property of which he is the fiduciary.

Now it is plain that in the second sentence of this extract the word "private" occurs twice, where it ought only to occur once; the printer has clearly printed in one place "private" where Mr. Disraeli said "public" or "corporate." This we see at a glance. But in a sentence which had a meaning, we should have known in which of the clauses we ought to read "private," and in which "public" or "corporate." But here we had nothing to guide us; there was no reason in law, history, or common sense, why the State should be called "guardian" or "trustee" of one sort of property more than the other. The context seems to show that Mr. Disraeli means that the State is guardian of private property, and trustee of corporate property. But this is a distinction purely of his own making. The State is not, in any legal sense, a trustee of corporate property any more than of private property. Mr. Disraeli then goes on with a fallacy which is very common in speakers of his class. He first gives certain words a certain purely arbitrary meaning of his own invention, and then he goes on to use that purely arbitrary meaning as an argument. He chooses to say that the State is a trustee of corporate property, and then argues that because a man may not take to himself the property of which he is trustee, therefore the State, as trustee of all corporate property, may never confiscate any corporate property. If Mr. Disraeli meant anything, he meant this. But it is much more likely that he meant nothing at all; that he only intended to utter a sentence which sounded as if it was very deep, and to wind up with a good rolling word. The ending of the sentence with the word "fiduciary" is a masterpiece, and richly deserved the cheer which it drew forth. "Fiduciary" is a word only one syllable shorter than Mesopotamia itself, and to Mr. Disraeli's admirers it must have been just as unintelligible.

We had designed to cull some more flowers both from the speech of Mr. Disraeli and from some other speeches. But space constrains us to pluck a very few only. Sir George Jenkinson's appeal to the Coronation Oath, as if it were quite a new idea, was very charming; but on the whole Lord Crichton undoubtedly bears away the bell. One passage in his speech really kindled in us a hope that we were at last going to learn the date of the Reformation. "There is," says Lord Crichton, "a great difference of opinion as to the precise date of the extension of the Reformation to Ireland." There was, then, a precise date, and we had trusted that Lord Crichton was going to give us the precise date. Some, we are told, put the "extension to Ireland so late as 1560, when all but two bishops" &c. &c. Every one knows that all but two bishops at this time "accepted the Reformation." We should like to see the exact Parliamentary language of this remarkable process. Other authors give the date of 1551 as the date of "the employment of the Liturgy instead of the Mass"—as if the Mass was not the Liturgy of Saint Peter. But, more cruel still, "some fix it a few years later than the English Reformation." But when the English Reformation happened Lord Crichton still does not tell us. We can only guess that the English Reformation took place a few years earlier than some year which is neither 1551 nor 1560. This is poor food for an ingenuous seeker after chronological truth.

But Lord Crichton has something to tell us more amazing still. He fears—and the fear drew forth a cheer—that "the supremacy of the Pope would be substituted for the mild and beneficent supremacy of the Queen." We do not wonder at the cheers. The saying of Lord Crichton is just the sort of saying which calls forth an instinctive "hoo-ray." But will Lord Crichton tell us something about the "machinery" which he informs us is ready? Part of the "machinery" consists, so Lord Crichton says, of "a Cardinal Prince of the Holy Roman Empire." Is there then a Holy Roman Empire? Is the Act of 1806 recalled? Are the two swords grasped by one hand? Have Guelf and Ghibelin made up their differences, and are the forces of both coming against us? A Cardinal Prince of the Holy Roman Empire! From Pope and Cæsar defend us both! We shall have to put out a new article, and to declare that not only the Bishop of Rome, but the Emperor of Rome too, if Lord Crichton will only tell us who he is, hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England.

Lastly, that we may not pick our gems from one side of the House only, let us take Mr. Dillwyn, as, for knowledge of ecclesiastical history, a worthy compeer of Lord Crichton. Mr. Dillwyn "could not agree with those who held that the Church in this country had never undergone a revolution, but that it was the Church of Saint Augustine still. In his opinion, that was mere special pleading. The Church was a new Church." If the commonest facts of law and history are special pleading in the opinion of Mr. Dillwyn, it only shows how little Mr. Dillwyn's opinion is worth. Perhaps Mr. Dillwyn will kindly show us the Act of Parliament which abolished one Church and substituted another. Perhaps he will, at least more kindly than Lord Crichton, give us the date when so great an event happened. Also, what does Mr. Dillwyn mean by implying that those who say that the Church is still the Church of Saint Augustine, say that the Church has never undergone a revolution? The Church has undergone plenty of revolutions; so has the State; but the personality, so to speak, of either body is not in the least affected. This sort of talk is not only grossly ignorant, but it is utterly off the question. That the present Church of England is the Church founded by Augustine, and not some new Church, founded nobody knows when, is a plain fact of law and history. But it has nothing to do with the question. Once grasp, which people seem to have so strange a difficulty in grasping, the great principle of the omnipotence of the nation assembled in Parliament, and all this sort of talk comes to an end. Whether a society was founded and endowed under Æthelberht or under Victoria, Parliament may equally deal with the society and with its property, because Parliament may equally deal with everything. Its own sense of what is just and expedient is, in the nature of things, the only limit which can be put on the will of a supreme governing power.

CANADA AND THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.

THE Hudson's Bay Company is the last of the great territorial monopolies which were so lavishly created at an early stage of our colonial history. It has become a monstrous anachronism, and must as certainly be improved, if not off the face of the earth, at any rate off the face of all reclaimable land, as the native tribes whose hunting-grounds it has appropriated. But it has done good service in its day, and every one must desire that when it retires, as it must retire, from land which is fit for colonization, it should do so on equitable terms. That the proposal made by the Government for the settlement of the protracted negotiations between Canada and the Company is quite as favourable as the Company have any right to expect, or are ever likely to get, will be the conclusion arrived at by every impartial inquirer; and we trust that, after another fortnight's consideration, the shareholders will see the wisdom of accepting a not illiberal offer in preference to embarking in a litigation by which they may very probably lose all that they are now in a position to claim.

That a fur-trading Company should be allowed to keep about a third of the territories of the Crown in North America a perpetual wilderness, for the breeding of wild animals, is too preposterous a demand for even the Hudson's Bay shareholders themselves to make. They are ripe for disendowment, and the only question is as to the amount of compensation which ought to be awarded them. The Dominion of Canada (together with the outlying colonies of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and Columbia, which it must shortly absorb) includes nearly, though not quite, the whole of the settled and a great deal of the unsettled area of British North America. Beyond this lie two great districts—Rupert's Land, which is, or is claimed to be, the property of the Hudson's Bay Company, and is about as large as Europe, and the undefined North-West territory which stretches to the Arctic Ocean. This last is at present a barren waste, and the greater part of Rupert's Land is still of no value except as a hunting-ground. But in the very line across which the Dominion Road must ultimately pass from Canada to Columbia lies the so-called Fertile Belt, including the Red River Settlement, which, if not soon connected with the Dominion, will assuredly be absorbed by intruders from the States. Whether this Fertile Belt belongs to Canada or the Company has long been matter of dispute. The Canadians contend that, even if the original charter is not forfeited by breach of an implied duty to promote colonization, this region was never included in its terms; and they insist that it always was part of Canada, that it did not belong to the Crown when the charter of the Company was granted, that it was excluded from the grant under the exception of land "possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince," and that it only became English territory by cession from France long after the rights of the Company, whatever they were, had been acquired. Against this contention the Hudson's Bay Company have little to say, except that they have established five trading posts at various points in the disputed territory, and that they are prepared to defend their title whenever it may be assailed in a court of law. That they would succeed in maintaining the validity of a charter which, however improvident, has been recognised again and again by the Government of this country, we have little doubt; but their prospects of proving that the Fertile Belt is included within their boundaries seem to us extremely small. If it is not comprised in the terms of the charter, it would be absurd to suppose that the sort of possession implied from its user as a hunting-ground could be of any avail against the Crown, even if it were worth anything against a private owner. However, if the Company and the Canadians are wise enough to accept the terms of compromise now proposed, this question will never be raised. If they decline, we may expect soon to see the commencement of the most gigantic ejectment suit ever tried in any country.

Like many other charters of the same period, that of the Hudson's Bay Company granted, not only territory, but a certain measure of sovereignty, which has been exercised with judgment in preserving peaceable relations with the native tribes, and maintaining order in the hunting and fur-trading settlements. But for all other purposes the government of the Company has been a blank. Though they have constantly professed a desire to yield up any land which was suited for colonization, and have invited the Government to resume the direct administration of such districts, it was impossible for a fur-trading Company really to promote the colonization which must, in the end, destroy their traffic. Neither would it be possible or fair to expect the Government, either of this country or of Canada, to undertake the duties of administration without having the waste lands, or at least the bulk of them, at their own disposal; and the suggestions of this kind which from time to time have been offered by the Company may be dismissed as little more than rhetorical artifices for supporting a case which they, like every one else, knew to be one for compensation only.

A similar and equally plausible artifice was tried by the Canadian Government. The Dominion Act authorized the Crown to consent to the incorporation of Rupert's Land with the Dominion on suitable terms and conditions. The Ottawa Parliament accordingly requested that this might be done, on condition that the legal rights of any corporation or individual within the territory should be respected, and in terms this is of course all that the Hudson's Bay or any other Company could insist upon. But the working of such a condition would be to leave the Company practically helpless. The Canadian Government would at once appropriate the debateable Fertile Belt, and deny the right of the Company to compensation, and nothing would be left to the shareholders but a litigation in Canadian Courts against a Government already in possession and strongly committed to an adverse view.

The Imperial Government rightly rejected both of these counter proposals, until a settlement by negotiation should have been tried, and, failing that, a legal decision obtained fixing the boundaries of the Hudson's Bay territory. If the first of these methods fails (and we cannot believe that it will), it is plainly intimated that the great trial must come off, and whether this is to be the result or not mainly depends on the wisdom of the 1,700 shareholders in the Company. And they may well pause before they decide to reject the offer which is made to them. In substance it amounts to this. First, a payment in cash of 300,000*l.*; secondly, a reservation of one-twentieth of the land which may be brought into colonization; and, lastly, immunity from exceptional taxation, and liberty to continue their operations as a trading body. It is obvious that one-twentieth of a tract of land made available for colonization at the cost of other persons must be worth much more than the whole area without the communications and appliances of modern civilization, and the settled institutions which only a regular government can give. If there were no other clause in the proposed agreement than this, the Company would be giving nineteen-twentieths of their fertile land (assuming it to be theirs) as payment to Canada for undertaking the government of the whole. It is conceded that if this bargain is not made, the Company are bound to establish a Government themselves, and as Sir Stafford Northcote reminded them, they could scarcely expect to do it much cheaper. If this is so, the cash payment of 300,000*l.* is so much clear gain to the Company, and though it is less in apparent amount than what they have claimed before, it is not really so when the difference is considered between money paid down and a larger sum spread over an indefinite period, and payable only as land is gradually disposed of.

It is obviously the interest of the Company to close with these terms; it is not less that of the Canadian Government, or we should rather say, the Canadian people. It is probable that in mere money the land will never bring back to them the price they will pay for it when all the expenses of administration are provided for. It is now the accepted policy to give away, or almost give away, wild lands to any one who will reclaim them, and no surplus revenue of any account can be looked for from land-sales. But, on the other hand, it is of vital importance that the incorporation of the Red River Settlement should not be delayed by a tedious lawsuit. A few years more of suspense would Americanize the whole colony, and the grand prospect of a continuous line of colonized territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific would disappear for ever. Whether the leading communications of this district are to be with Canada and the St. Lawrence, or with the United States, depends mainly upon prompt action, and if the 300,000*l.* were regarded merely as a bonus to gain time, it would be wisely spent by those whose immediate interest is in the development of the trade and prosperity of the Dominion. Lord Granville, in suggesting his terms of compromise, did not disguise his expectation that they would fail to meet the extreme views of either party, but he would not have misdescribed the arrangement he proposed if he had said that it would give to each side larger benefits than either could hope from the most complete success in the litigation which is the only alternative. If the compromise is not accepted, those from whom the refusal comes will forfeit all claim to sympathy, whatever fate may ultimately attend them. And, in the case of an anomalous society like the Hudson's Bay Company, to lose the sympathy of the country is simply to lose everything they possess.

CRIMINOUS CLERKS.

LORD SALISBURY doubtless remembered his Dr. Watts when he drew attention to the little amount of work which the House of Lords has to do. His lordship has not, or at any rate we have not, forgotten who it is who is always said to be so ready to provide work for idle hands. Whether the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Archbishop of Canterbury have forestalled, or been prompted by, the suggestion from this awkward quarter of activity to the idle, it would be idle, and certainly very scandalous, to inquire. But there is work, from whatever source their inspiration is drawn, before the Peers in the rival Ecclesiastical Courts Bills which are backed respectively by the great Protestant Earl and by the Primate. They are, we suppose, rival measures, but they have a family likeness; their face is different but not discordant, qualis decet esse sororum. And in one respect the clerical measure has the advantage of the lay Bill. Lord Shaftesbury's Bill weighs eight ounces, while the Archbishop's pulls down the scale at four; and though the chief victim, the criminous clerk, may think that a cat-o'-nine-tails is worse than a whip with four thongs and a-half, his anticipation of a milder castigation from his spiritual fathers must be modified when he learns, as he will learn, that the punishment comes to much the same thing if, as is the case, the penal provisions of the longer measure are all embodied in the shorter one. As mere measures of reforming the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and substituting one set of officials for another, and of simplifying and condensing details, there may be distinctions between the Tweedledum of the Spiritual and the Tweedledee of the Temporal reformer. But the House of Lords, after the experience of many failures in such attempts to get a good Church Discipline Bill, may well be trusted to leave this matter as they find it.

Paulo majora. There must be a reason for Lord Shaftesbury's measure; it cannot be for nothing that a fervid advertisement appears every day from the Protestant Institute, urging signatures in its favour. The clients and customers of Low-Church booksellers such as Messrs. Nisbet and Seeley must have some warmer inducement than the wrongs which they suffer from provincial Chancellors to feel any interest in this Bill. A glance at it reveals the secret. The object of the Bill, though it is not announced on the back, is to simplify proceedings against criminous clerks. It provides a short and easy method with the parson; and it gives a very substantial existence to the aggrieved parishioner. When we say it, we must not confine ourselves to Lord Shaftesbury's Bill, for the Bishops' Bill is, as might be expected when bishops legislate against the inferior clergy, much the same. We extract from the two measures what we conceive to be their essence:—

> Any three members of the Church who are inhabitant householders of the diocese within which the offence is alleged to have been committed can institute proceedings against a clerk for having offended against the laws ecclesiastical, i.e. against any of them.

This clause covers, and indeed names, offences moral, doctrinal, and ceremonial. If any three old women think that the parson swears or drinks, or choose to dislike his sermons, or object to his bowings and crossings on the one hand, or to his omission of the Saints' days on the other, said three old women, being inhabitant householders, but not being required to be even in name or by profession members of the Church, may, if they please, bring any beneficed clergyman to certain ruin. This is the Rehoboam form of the tender mercies extended by Lord Shaftesbury to the Rationalists and Ritualists.

Solomon is of course milder; the Church, in the person of the bishops, is of course more tender to her erring priests:—

> If a written information be given to a Bishop that a clerk has been guilty of teaching or maintaining unsound doctrine, or of any offence against the worship, doctrine, discipline, or government of the Church, and such information be signed by five beneficed clergymen of the Church, the Bishop shall authorize a suit to be instituted in his court by such five beneficed clergymen against such accused clerk.

But—

> All suits involving any question concerning the due administration of the Sacraments, or other rules and ceremonies, or involving any question concerning the ornaments of the Church, &c., may be instituted by three members of the Church who are inhabitant householders of the parish within which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

These, then, are the simplifications proposed by the rival Bills—and the distinction is not very important. Lord Shaftesbury proposes to allow any three resident householders residing within the diocese, but without any other qualification either of sex, churchmanship, or interest in the matter, to institute, of course at their own expense, any suit they may please, on any charge they may invent, for any breach, which they may conjecture, of any law of the existence of which they may persuade themselves, against any clergyman of whom they may have never heard, but who may have been denounced to them by any drunken or profligate person in his parish. The Bishops' Bill draws a line; doctrinal charges are only to be preferred by five clergymen. But these five clergymen may be any five clergymen. Suits involving questions on ceremony and ritual may be brought by three householders, but they must be aggrieved parishioners; while Lord Shaftesbury extends the privilege of prosecuting the priesthood to the whole diocese. The raison d'être of these facilities accorded to the prosecution, or persecution, of criminous clerks by the proposed Bills is plain. In either case it is sought to increase the facilities of such persecution by diminishing the present securities against frivolous, vexatious, and unjust suits. At present the law entrusts the bishop, not only with the discretion of instituting the suit, or at least with the opportunity of choosing whether he will sign letters of request authorizing others to prosecute, but also entrusts the bishop with the still more disagreeable duty of paying the costs of the suit.

The Bills now before the Lords—both the Bishops' and Lord Shaftesbury's—relieve the bishop of the diocese both from the responsibility of commencing (or authorizing) proceedings, and also from the privilege of paying for such proceedings. It is no great wonder, therefore, that this relief accorded to their pockets should influence the bishops in accepting this remarkable reform. The other side of the question—that the bishop of the diocese is, if in one sense the natural enemy of the inferior clergy, on the other their natural protector—scarcely seems to have presented itself to the episcopal mind. A criminous clerk is a being no doubt to be hunted down without mercy or law; and a clerk unjustly accused, unfairly delated, and exposed to the vengeance of a joint-stock subscription company, which has subscribed 50,000*l.* for the express and avowed purpose of prosecuting to the bitter end any doctrine or practice which Lord Shaftesbury dislikes, is an animal not worth a moment's thought, that is, not a moment of a bishop's thoughts. For this is the end sought, and these are the means for purifying the Church and securing uniformity in doctrine and discipline which both the Bills now before the Lords seek and ensue. Simplify legal processes, and by simplifying invite them. Let there be simultaneously a hundred suits instituted against the leaders of free thought, or the leaders of advanced ritual. Let any three inhabitant householders of Saffron Hill, backed by the 50,000*l.* of the Church Protestant Defence Institution, or whatever the society expressly organized to prosecute Ritualists is, bring their suit against Mr. Mackonochie. Let any five beneficed clergymen, Simeon Trustees, or Disraelitish Deans, sign a written information certifying that the Dean of Westminster, or Mr. Bennett, or Dr. Pusey, or Dr. Mansel, or Dr. Temple, has been guilty of maintaining unsound or erroneous doctrine, and as the bishops have neither to pay for the suit, nor to decide whether the suit should be brought, let it be brought. The bishops do not pay, so they do not care. The peace of the Church, the justice of the case, the duty of preventing scandal, oppression, or wrong—this is not the bishops' affair. It is nobody's affair. It is, to be sure, in other social departments a matter of public policy not to allow people to subscribe private funds in order to carry on vexatious suits against a man's estate and property. But ecclesiastical champerty is rather a thing to be encouraged. Ecclesiastical prosecutions can work under the accepted commercial principle of limited liability, and the especial excellence of the proposed facilities for prosecuting criminous clerks consists in this, that for the future the expenses of the prosecutions are brought down to the minimum, while those of the accused are certain to be raised to the proper pitch of ruin. On the one hand are the three inhabitant householders, or the five beneficed clergymen, backed by the 50,000*l.* fund; on the other is the perpetual curate backed by his pew-rents. It is quite true that the prosecutors may be called upon to give security for costs; and in the highly doubtful event of a judgment in favour of the accused, the three or five excellent people who have acted on account of the brethren may have to pay costs "as between attorney and client." But what of the criminous clerk in the meantime—the unfortunate who has preached doubtful doctrine on the exact size of the ark, or who is thought to have bowed once and again when mentioning the name of St. Bartholomew? First, he has been suspended from all office and function as soon as the suit was commenced, and the spiritual duties of the parish have been performed by a clerk nominated by the bishop and paid by the accused incumbent. With pockets thus sweated at starting, he stands very little chance against the unlimited credit and all but unlimited resources of the prosecutors. The aggrieved parishioner has certainly managed to turn the tables; and if either of these measures passes, to harry a parson out of his living and his last shilling, under the pleasant fiction of seeking the peace and purity of the Church, will be a sport superior in interest to duck-hunting, and nearly equal in fun and dignity to a bull-baiting, where the danger is all on one side. The worst of such Church reforms is that the sport will only last for a generation. No doubt the three inhabitant householders and the five beneficed clergymen will be able to worry and ruin a good many rectors and vicars of the existing generation. But the supply of this sort of game will soon be exhausted. No man, either of fortune, or education, or self-respect, or common prudence, will ever enter into a religious system of which this, or anything like this, is to be the disciplinary code.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

The Suez Canal will probably be completed and opened for traffic by the end of the present year, and a Frenchman will have the honour of having conceived and carried out an undertaking which at least one Englishman declared to be impracticable. We should have thought that the engineer's principle that any work can be done for which money can be found was eminently applicable in this case; for the cutting of a canal through about a hundred miles of tolerably easy country is not to be compared to schemes which are certain to be brought forward whenever the public finds itself in a speculative mood. It is true that the cost of the works will greatly exceed the original estimate, although their dimensions are much less than was originally proposed, but that is an ordinary feature of joint-stock enterprise. The shareholders have the hope of a dividend, and the certainty that they have enhanced the glory of France. If the undertaking is commercially successful, its prosperity will be largely due to the passing of English trade along the canal, and we shall certainly not send our ships that way unless we find the route convenient.

The difficulty of keeping open this canal will perhaps be greater than the difficulty of making it. The work has been lately inspected by Mr. Fowler, the eminent engineer, and his report has been published in the Times. The first difficulty to be encountered was the formation and maintenance of the harbour of Port Said, where vessels will enter the canal from the Mediterranean. This harbour has been formed in the usual way, by carrying out into the sea lines of breakwater made of blocks of concrete. The liability of the harbour to silting up is unusually great, because a branch of the Nile, reaching the sea westward of this harbour, brings down large quantities of fine alluvium, which are carried along the shore and towards the western breakwater, and penetrate through that breakwater in its present imperfect state. Supposing the breakwater to be made impermeable, a bank of sand will then begin to be formed outside of it, and as this extends it may possibly become necessary to carry the breakwater further out to sea. But if the breakwater be rendered solid, and perhaps lengthened, and if the harbour be diligently dredged, there is no reason to apprehend that the mouth of the canal will not remain accessible from the Mediterranean. The danger from moving sand, however, threatens the canal as well as its port, although the cause of motion would, as regards the former, be not water, but wind. It has been assumed, on insufficient knowledge of the locality, that the sand of the desert would be blown into the canal in quantities utterly unmanageable. If the whole distance of the canal from sea to sea had been carried through a desert composed of fine drifting sand, it would have been hopeless to attempt to keep the canal open. But the only portions of the canal that are liable to be thus affected to any extent worthy of consideration are of a total length of only seventeen miles. It is hoped that, as regards these portions, the drift will be in some degree controlled by the planting of trees and shrubs on the sides of the canal. But it will be necessary to use powerful dredges to keep these portions of the canal clear from sand.

The width of the canal at the surface is in some portions 196 feet and in others 327 feet. The width at the bottom is throughout 72 feet. The depth is 26 feet. The narrower width of surface and steeper slope have been adopted in deep cuttings to effect the greatest possible saving in quantity of excavation. The length of canal thus constructed is only 22 miles. The remaining 77 miles are constructed with greater width and gentler slope. The canal passes for 5½ miles of its course through Lake Timsah, and for 23½ miles through the Bitter Lakes. In these sections only a portion of the work of excavation has to be done in consequence of the low level of the ground. The distance of the Bitter Lakes from Suez is 22 miles. The superficial area of these lakes is 100,000 acres. In the summer months, when evaporation is greatest in these lakes, their connexion with the tidal Red Sea will produce peculiar currents and hydraulic phenomena. Mr. Fowler thinks that the current caused by evaporation and tide will approach or exceed two miles per hour. He also thinks that, in order to supply evaporation and other waste of water in the Bitter Lakes, the canal should have been constructed of enlarged dimensions between these lakes and Suez "if the resources of the Company permitted." He thinks, again, that the slopes of the canal should be protected throughout its length against the wash of passing vessels, wind, or current, by stone-pitching. It is to be observed, moreover, that large vessels cannot pass one another with the present dimensions of the canal, which are, as has been stated, 26 feet of depth to a width at bottom of 72 feet; and thus it will be necessary, on any considerable development of traffic, to provide passing places or to widen the whole canal. It seems that the absorption of water by the soil is typical of the process which is likely to be undergone by the money of the shareholders. Yet there is reasonable prospect of large traffic, provided that the canal can be maintained in full depth and efficiency, and that the charges made to ships using it are moderate. Under these conditions the steam passenger and mail traffic between Europe and India will be likely to pass along this route. Sailing vessels which would require steam-tugs, not only through the canal but also down the Red Sea, would not find advantage in using it. It is possible that enterprising firms or companies may construct sailing vessels with auxiliary steam power specially adapted to the canal and the Red Sea, and that thus the large traffic round the Cape of Good Hope may be diverted for the profit of the shareholders in the undertaking. It seems on the whole that expense is certain and profit doubtful; but the operation, like that of the French surgeon, if not advantageous, has been very brilliant. Not the least of the difficulties of the work has been to secure a supply of fresh water both for those who made the canal and for those who will hereafter use it. With this object, a fresh-water canal has been made from the Nile at Cairo to Suez, a distance of about 70 miles, and iron pipes have been laid along the navigable canal.

The engineering interest of this work, great as it is, is surpassed by the interest which attaches to it commercially and politically. Before the famous voyage of Vasco da Gama in 1498, the trade between Europe and the East passed from the ports of the Mediterranean across the desert to the ports of the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. When Da Gama, after doubling the Cape of Good Hope, sailed across the Indian Ocean and reached Calicut, the Arab merchants whom he found there cursed him as the destroyer of their trade. From that day to the present the trade of Europe with the East has passed by the route which Da Gama traced. Now it seems likely to return into its ancient course, provided that the canal can be kept open and in working order without disproportionate expense. The political questions which the completion of this enterprise suggests are so embarrassing, that it is perhaps as well to leave them undiscussed. Whether the road across Egypt to India passes by land or water, it is equally important to this country to secure it, if possible, in the event of war. The proposals which we hear for making the canal and its ports neutral territory are open to the objection that such an arrangement is likely to be respected only until a strong Power feels adequate inducement to its violation. The control of the Mediterranean mouth of the canal would rest with that European nation which found itself able to hold superiority on the sea. The control of the Red Sea mouth would, unless we managed our affairs very badly, rest with us. We could prevent other nations using the canal, and perhaps they could prevent us. The peaceful triumph which M. de Lesseps has gained over some English engineers who declared his scheme impracticable may remind us that the country in which he has worked has been the scene of warfare waged between France and England with earnestness proportioned to the value of the prize contended for. The importance of the expedition of the First Napoleon to Egypt was understood by our Government, which bent all its efforts to oppose him. The command of the Mediterranean was necessary to enable Napoleon's army to be properly supported from France, and all hope of gaining that command vanished when Nelson destroyed the French fleet in Aboukir Bay. Yet this stunning blow received at the outset of the enterprise did not prevent the French from maintaining themselves for the next three years in Egypt. Napoleon, as we know, returned to France, which in his absence hardly maintained herself against the attacks of combined Europe. Dessaix followed Napoleon home, and bought for his general with his own life the victory of Marengo. Kleber perished in Cairo by an assassin's hand. Thus the French army in Egypt was left without a leader, while one English army landed at Alexandria, and another came from India and landed at Suez, and both besieged the French in Cairo. When the French garrison surrendered, it marched under escort of English troops to the coast for embarkation, while among the boats which bore its baggage down the Nile was one laden with the body of the murdered Kleber. That procession perhaps might have competed in picturesque effect with some of those of which we have lately read elaborate descriptions. The English nation did its utmost in its cumbrous way to effect the expulsion of the French from Egypt, and it succeeded. The generals employed in the campaign were applauded and rewarded, and they deserved the honours and emoluments which they received, not the less because the campaign was totally unnecessary. The French general had entered into a convention for the evacuation of Egypt, which the English admiral refused to ratify. The war accordingly proceeded. The English nation gained a great deal of honour, and, no doubt, spent a vast sum of money; and this perhaps is what M. de Lesseps and his co-adventurers are doing upon nearly the same ground.

It is interesting to refer to these fierce conflicts of bygone times, for the sake of the contrast they afford to the harmony which now happily subsists between Frenchmen and Englishmen in Egypt. The skill, energy, and perseverance of M. de Lesseps are applauded as heartily in this country as abroad. If we speak dubiously of his commercial prospect, it is only because we have grown thoroughly accustomed among ourselves to associate grand and beneficent undertakings with poor returns to shareholders. As regards political difficulties, we prefer on this occasion to say nothing, except that they are certain to be surmounted if France and England take the same side in reference to them.

THE LORDS ON THE SCOTCH SCHOOLS BILL.

THE Scotch Schools Bill has got safely through the second reading. It may be presumed therefore that the principle of the Bill has been accepted, and that in some shape or other it will become law during this Session. Judging, however, by the criticisms to which it was subjected on Friday night, it would appear that just at present the Lords do not mean to let it leave them peaceably. But they have little else to do just now. Before the 12th of April, when it comes to be considered in Committee, the spirit of discontent may have passed away. Other channels will have been opened up for the surplus energies of the peers, and they will probably be less eager in spying out faults in a Bill about Scotch Parish Schools. Scotland affords but poor Parliamentary sport compared with England or Ireland. A round or two on the Irish Church, or a day with the University Tests, will be much better fun as the season draws on. Life Peerages will be started shortly after Easter, and a single shot at such an object will be worth any amount of practice at a trifling matter concerning the teaching of half a million Presbyterian children. It is all the difference between deer-stalking and rabbit-shooting, and it is only natural that the peers—and especially Lord Airlie—should prefer the nobler pastime. If this be so, it is more than likely that the Bill may slip through Committee comparatively unmolested. The steam, we imagine, has been blown off on the second reading, and the future progress of the measure will be easier and less noisy in consequence.

At the same time, the process of blowing off the steam was not altogether satisfactory. It seldom is. The debate was remarkable for nothing except the strong "anti Scotch" character which it developed. It is clear from the tone of the discussion that, whatever may happen in the Commons, the Lords are determined to look upon the matter from an English, or rather a Pall Mall and Privy Council, point of view. Lord Abinger struck the keynote in his diatribe against a most deserving class of men, the Scotch schoolmasters. He "particularly objected to the associated schoolmasters, who are nothing more nor less than a trades' union," being represented on the Board. He objected to the Universities being represented, and wished, with true Tory generosity, to pay everybody connected with the Board, and make it comfortable all round. The Scotch people probably would not object to this proposal, but, being a frugal folk, they prefer to do it in their own way, as efficiently, and at a third of the money. Lord Airlie followed suit, and combined a lofty disregard of Scotch feeling on this matter with utter ignorance of what he was talking about. It would be a curious and not uninteresting matter of speculation whether Lord Airlie prepared his own speech or got some Englishman to do it for him. It is hardly possible that an intelligent young nobleman, who is always in Scotland from the 12th of August till October recalls him from the forests of the North to the coverts of the South, should know so little of the state of education in the former country as to say that "prior to the introduction of the Revised Code the acquaintance of the scholars with the 'Three R's' was much inferior to that of English children of the same age." We should like to know where he got this piece of information. The Revised Code, we always understood, has never been introduced into Scotland in full. Payment by results has not yet crossed the Tweed, and the Scotch certificated teacher is still paid according to the value of his certificate, as the English teacher used to be before Mr. Lowe was in the Council Office. The current of popular feeling in Scotland is so strong against the Code that the whole bureaucratic force of the Council Office has hitherto been unable to stem it. The Commissioners report against it, and show in an elaborate argument that some of its leading provisions are destructive of all the traditions of Scotch education. We shall have more to say on this presently. Meantime, however fondly Lord Airlie, or his English adviser, loves the Code, he may rest assured that, so long as Scotland sends up Liberal members to the House of Commons in anything like the present ratio of fifty-three to seven, it will never be introduced into Scotland in its entirety. The Duke of Argyll took the trouble of putting Lord Airlie right in this matter of the "three R's." It was hardly necessary, because in the early part of his speech the noble lord had put himself right. In a carefully-prepared contrast between the ignorance and improvidence of the English labourer and the intelligence and prudence of the Scotch, he drew a graphic picture of the latter. He described him as a man who "reads the newspapers, corresponds with his own class, knows the rate of wages elsewhere as well as the farmers do, and if he finds that he can obtain in another part of the country 1s. 6d. or 2s. a day more than he has where he is located, he emigrates to that district. So much for the influence of education in Scotland." In other words, the Scotch labourer, according to Lord Airlie, reads, writes, and casts up accounts, and the English labourer can do none of the three. Yet the knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic is superior in England to what it is in Scotland, and more general! Lord Airlie is Scotch by birth, and the Scotch are proverbially logical; but surely such logic as this has more of Ireland in it than of Scotland. England, however, is more to his lordship's taste than either Scotland or Ireland. He, or at least his speech, is wedded to the Privy Council and the Revised Code. He little knows how unpopular these two institutions are in Scotland, or how unpopular he makes himself in that country when he says, as he is reported to have said, that he would prefer to see Scotch education placed under the immediate control of the Privy Council than under a Scotch Board; and when he wishes to know why a different principle is to be applied to the people of Scotland from that applied to the people of England. Such expressions of opinion might have been expected from the Opposition leaders. But to do Lord Cairns and the Duke of Marlborough justice, they know their subject and the Scotch people better. They admitted that the proposal for a Scotch Board was acceptable in Scotland, and indeed indispensable; and if they spoke through the mist raised by the more dogmatic section of the Established Church, and complained about the secular character of the Bill, they only obeyed their brief. This was to be expected. But how came it that the Duke of Argyll, who was so eminently Scotch on the first reading, was so Laodicean on the second? He blew neither hot nor cold, and seemed almost ready to surrender to Pall Mall. He gave up the appointment of University representatives on the Board; he gave up the schoolmasters, and seemed willing to nominate a Council of Education for Scotland, consisting of country gentlemen and municipal dignitaries, neither of whom know anything about the subject. Lord Abinger's three salaried officials would be better than that. Both the Duke, however, and the President of the Council, who seems to have very fairly mastered the subject, stood up staunchly for a Board of some sort in Scotland. And in so doing they merely re-echoed the opinions that have been expressed from one end of Scotland to the other.

The inhabitants of that peculiar country are apt to form prejudices, some of which are reasonable—if we can speak of a reasonable prejudice—and some are not. But among the first class none is more deeply rooted than this—that they decline to have their education managed in England. Such a proposal, they say, implies one of two things; either that they are identical with the English, or inferior to them. But they will not admit either alternative. Their Church—so they consider their law, their education, their traditions, the physical condition of their country, the influence of their resident gentry, the relations of their squires to their parsons, and of both to the people, and, in short, the various causes which tend to mould the character of a nation, are all different from those which are at work in England. And identity, they say, is not produced by such a catalogue of differences. Are they then inferior? In the matter of education they will not admit their inferiority. They say, and not without some show of reason, that they have had a national system of education since 1696, and even before it, and have reaped the benefits of this system for more than two centuries, while England has only awakened to the knowledge of the widespread ignorance of its inhabitants within the last half-dozen years, or indeed within the last half-dozen months. "The distinguishing character of this system of education," to quote the words of the Home Secretary, in a recent speech made by him in Scotland, "is this—that the means of obtaining the best education in the country should be given to the child of even the humblest peasant in the country. From the humblest national school boys issue who go at once to the University, and who obtain the benefit of the University, and are therefore able to compete for the greatest honours and the most profitable employments in the State and country. This is the honourable distinction of Scotland." The Scotch people endorse this statement, but the Committee of Council does not. Hence it is that the Committee of Council is abhorrent to the people of Scotland. And if the inhabitants were polled to-morrow as to their preference for Scotch or English management of their schools, not a dozen votes, including Lord Airlie's, would be given for the latter. It would be no difficult matter to bring forward proof of this feeling. The Scotch papers are full of it; the laity and the schoolmasters ring the changes on it at every public meeting; and even the Churches, which agree on nothing else under the sun, are at one upon this point. The following sentences from the speech of an influential man, delivered no longer ago than last week, may be taken as conclusive:—

> I have the strongest possible objection to a London management. I would accept almost any Board, however constituted, rather than have our education in Scotland left to the tender mercies of the Privy Council. All the time I had anything to do with the management of the education in our Church, we had to fight every inch of ground in getting the members of the Privy Council to comprehend that there was anything in Scotch education that was peculiar. They had the idea, and would force it upon us, that our elementary schools in Scotland should be like the elementary schools in England—merely to teach "the three R's," and nothing more. They could not be brought to take in the necessity of our elementary schools teaching the elements of a classical education, with a view to prepare promising students for our colleges. They could not be brought to take in that. We had to fight every inch of ground on that point; and on various others we had the same difficulty. For example, look to the Revised Code. It has proved unworkable in our schools. And then the Duke of Argyll's Bill is overridden in this particular—they imagine that our elementary schools are just schools for those who cannot pay for the education of their children, and insist in making a distinction of classes in our schools. That is the very thing the Scotch system has repudiated from the beginning—the idea of classifying the children in our schools according to their means of payment. These are circumstances that make me very jealous of a London management.

These are the words of Dr Candlish in the Free Church Commission, and he, as perhaps the ablest and most liberal-minded man in that powerful body, may be considered as a fair exponent of the views of about a million of Scotch people. The leading members of the Established Church, who represent about another million and a half of the population, expressed opinions almost identical. Yet, in the face of such representations from two millions and a half of his countrymen, a Scotch peer rises in the House of Lords to ask why there should be any distinction between English and Scotch elementary education. Is it too much to say that Lord Airlie combined a lofty disregard of Scotch feeling with utter ignorance of his subject?

What, however, is the practical result of this discussion on the second reading? Nothing, except that it shows the want of sympathy between the Scotch peers and the Scotch people, and it raises grave doubts as to the propriety of introducing in the House of Lords a Bill which concerns the welfare of so many Scotchmen. The genius of the place is not friendly to Scotland. True, the discussion did not openly attack the principle of the Bill, which is the establishment of national unsectarian education. But it gave cause to fear that this principle will not be fairly carried out. The Scotch, if left to themselves, will carry it out thoroughly. And English, or still worse, ignorant Scotch, peers should not be permitted to weaken it by contact with English prejudice, or to embarrass its working by the application of English machinery.

SPEECHES MADE EASY.

WE confess to have been afflicted with a profound sense of melancholy by a discovery which we have recently made, and which has given a shock to our faith in human nature. We have frequently listened (as who has not?) to those dismal utterances which are forced from some wretched human being for the entertainment of heartless fellow-creatures at moments which should be specially favourable to general benevolence. After dinner, the affections of mankind are generally supposed to be at their warmest; and yet that sacred period is still sometimes selected, in compliance with an ancient superstition, for forcing dumb animals to speak. There are persons, it is true, endowed with the rare faculty of making speeches on such occasions which are agreeable and even eloquent. But the general herd are unable to do more than stutter through a few commonplaces; and the amusement derived from their sufferings seems to be as uncivilized as the mediæval enjoyment of professional fools. Yet we have hitherto clung fondly to one belief; we have held that the victims were genuine sufferers; not indeed in the sense of being really unwilling to speak, for the reluctance habitually expressed is too palpably of the nolo episcopari order, but we supposed them to be so far genuine that their nonsense was their own. We imagined that they were under the strange delusion that they could really make good speeches, and were only undeceived when they could scarcely restrain a yawn at their own portentous dulness. Our eyes have been opened. Ladies' hair, as we know, is not to be depended upon; sermons are not always the production of the preacher, but have been bought for 1*s*. 6*d* apiece; and now it appears from a little manual which we have received, that even after-dinner speeches are occasionally crammed by rote from a printed book. When a man says that he never expected to be wanted to speak, we know that he is indulging in an excusable fiction; for after-dinner speeches, like all other speeches, are best when they are only in part extempore, and we may forgive a man for providing himself with a few hints beforehand; but that a person should deliberately buy a shilling book and of malice prepense get up a string of appropriate platitudes for any given occasion certainly throws a melancholy light upon the degree to which art has supplanted nature. A cursory examination of the pages of a manual published for this purpose is enough to show us what wretched humbugs must be some of the orators who appeal to our mercy.

Suppose, for example, that a gentleman rises to propose the health of the Queen. He professes to be bursting with loyalty, and declares, to show his artlessness, that he "will not give the toast in a formal manner." Immediately afterwards he dashes into the most splendid series of metaphors, and finally declares, as he warms to his subject, that when a Queen is "the model of all that woman should be, then her influence, like the sap, rising within the trunk and from the core of the oak, permeates the whole tree and circulates to the utmost extremities, and the influence of the Queen sitting upon the throne is felt, I may say, by every mother in every cottage throughout her dominions." It is a terrible shock to our sympathies to know that this magnificent burst of impromptu eloquence comes straight out of a printed book. Presently the eloquent chairman proposes the army, and remarks that "that extraordinary expedition to ——, extraordinary in its details, extraordinary in its success, has been remarkable for many things; but signally, and above all else, it has been remarkable for the wisdom, the foresight, and soldier-like ability with which our troops were conducted." Could we really believe that the oratorical impostor was merely filling a blank form, with as much calmness as though it had been a post-office order, in this glowing burst of rhetoric? This example illustrates one difficulty which cruelly besets the compiler of the manual. If he keeps to safe generalities, he will scarcely suit the more ambitious orators; if he goes too much into detail, the use of his book becomes necessarily limited. We find many specimens of both causes of perplexity. Here, for example, is a fragment of an electioneering oration:—

> Those gentlemen who call themselves —— are simply theoretical —— sham ——, as I call them. To whom we are indebted for —— and ——? To —— and the ——. These men were called bigoted ——, but they are no such thing. To whom are we indebted for ——? Not to quasi and theoretical ——, but to ——, who, after due consideration, consented to give it. We are not indebted to the —— of the present day for the ——, but to the ——; the —— is in nearly every man's hand.

There would be a certain difficulty in filling up these forms; perhaps on the hustings it would generally be enough to make an inarticulate sound and leave them to the discretion of the reporters. In that case the speech is tolerably ingenious: the opposite fault would certainly be more perplexing. An unfortunate man who has to return thanks on being made mayor—certainly an embarrassing position—is told to begin with a story, "Once when I was travelling in Spain." This would be a dangerous pitfall for an unwary orator who had never been abroad; but it would be worse for a man to find himself accidentally impelled into the declaration, after some safe platitudes about generosity and justice, that "when I last saw the heir of the ——, he was standing beside his grandfather in the ball-room; and I thought, as they stood side by side—bald age and sturdy, hopeful youth—I thought there stood the last representative of those knightly ——s who for the last —— hundred years had their home upon these hills." The sentence is so beautiful and pathetic that we fear a simple-minded farmer might be irresistibly tempted to apply it to some —— who wasn't at all knightly, and had not a grandson, and had only just come to these hills, if there were any hills. Such speeches, we presume, are meant for imitation rather than appropriation; but the persons most likely to use the manual would hardly be grateful for forms which save them so little trouble.

It is, of course, in regard to weddings that our manual comes out strongest, for in such cases a man does well enough with platitude pure and simple; but the light thrown upon the manners of a certain class is truly melancholy. The first speaker has in cold blood to prepare the following imitation of rollicking joviality:—

> I love a wedding, and during the now somewhat lengthened progress of this pilgrim—and I've had my fair share of bunions, I can tell you;—ah! you may laugh, of course you may—everybody may and ought to laugh on a wedding-day; but, as I have just observed, I love a wedding, and I have been to many, and hope to go to many more.

After which he is directed to indulge in some hideous jocosity about what he calls "popping the question." We can hardly conceive any human being laughing at the remark about bunions, but there is even worse behind. We say nothing of the wretched bridegroom who has to quote a stanza about "Hymen's gentle bowers," but it seems to be an existing custom in these islands for a spinster aunt to stand up and make a speech, with a ghastly affectation of playfulness about telling her age. She makes fun of Mr. ——, who is presumed to have said something—we don't know whether he has to be taken into the plot—about a wedding breakfast being a "fine matrimonial field." She chaffs him accordingly in these graceful terms:—

> Why has not Mr. —— taken his partner? I am afraid he is —— or he would before this have proved to one of the many bridesmaids he has met with of late, that to act as a bridesmaid was a stepping-stone to marriage. I am sure I have met him at —— weddings during the last —— months, and he has never proposed to me or "any other lady." I am afraid he is a little gay deceiver, one of the men that "won't propose."

And after a good deal more badinage of similar elegance, she concludes with the sentiment, for the manual is much given to poetry—

> Ah me! when shall I marry me?
> Lovers are plenty but fail to relieve me.

The spinster aunt is the kind of lady whom Mr. Dickens might have introduced at Miss Pecksniff's marriage, though we confess that we could scarcely have believed in her existence in real life. What sort of person would learn the spinster aunt's speech by heart, with the view of repeating it afterwards, is a question which we would suggest to the next Commission on female education.

A curious feature of this manual is a series of pious ejaculations which are thrown in at the end of the speeches, and which we imagine represent the sentiments which people were supposed to bring out after dinner at some period of the dark ages. Thus, for example, after a speech on the navy, a man may add, "The British navy—the world's checkstring"; or he may exclaim, "Our foes well tarred and our tars well feathered." After some eloquence about the Church, he may add, though we doubt whether the observation would be considered generally as well-timed—

> Some to the church repair,
> Not for the doctrine, but the music there;

or he may observe sententiously that the "union of Church and State is not to make the Church political, but the State religious," an aphorism which may be commended to Mr. Disraeli's attention. He may on other occasions utter the thrilling prayer, "Our altars and our hearths, may we die to preserve them"; on sporting occasions he will indulge in the aspiration, "May the horns of the buck never disgrace the sportsman's brow"; or if, like Sam Weller, he has a turn for poetry, he may exclaim

May strength the sportsman's nerves in vigour brace;
May cruelty ne'er stain with foul disgrace
The well-earn'd pleasures of the chase.

These verses throw some light upon the mysterious problem as to the authorship of the verses generally enclosed in Christmas bonbons. We may remark, however, that the sporting speeches are decidedly the best, for the compiler has there taken the comparatively safe line of quoting from some commonplace book. The orator of a pigeon club, for example, begins by proving from Isaiah that blue rock pigeons were domesticated in Palestine, and proceeds to observe that "before Pompey's civil war, L. Ascius, a Roman knight, used to sell a pair of pigeons for four hundred denarii, 12*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*" This is a safe and unexciting kind of oratory, though it has the disadvantage that it can hardly be said twice. A gentleman who had once made that remark about L. Ascius would be hard up at the next meeting.

The manual is perhaps interesting in one respect to the philosophical inquirer. It shows how long customs may linger in certain social strata, which have long been pronounced intolerable by civilized beings. There are occasions on which a man has still to make speeches to fishmongers' guilds and on other solemn occasions; but we have succeeded in banishing this distressing practice from our ordinary life. If we are forced by unavoidable circumstances into oratorical display, we do not torment our neighbours by an ambitious attempt to diverge from the humblest commonplaces. Yet amidst our boasted civilization there lurk dark places where the practice is still maintained, and, if pagan superstitions are tolerably extinct, people still sacrifice to certain gloomy deities supposed to preside over the "festive celebrations" of the penny-a-liner. Indeed the bondage is so severe that it becomes necessary for the performers deliberately to rehearse their parts and to cram themselves beforehand with these grotesque imitations of eloquent addresses. We would fain hope that the increasing lights of education may gradually dispel this dreary superstition, and that the spinster aunt, if she really has an existence outside the imagination of the compiler, may speedily become a thing of the past.

THE NEW RIFLE.

THE last Report of the Select Committee on Breech-loading Rifles must be considered as satisfactory to all but the disappointed competitors. It will be recollected that the subject was taken out of the hands of the Ordnance Select Committee at the request of several inventors, and handed over to a Committee, consisting of Lieutenant-Colonel H. C. Fletcher, Scots Fusilier Guards, President; and four members—Captain J. Rawlins, 48th Regiment, Captain W. C. Mackinnon, 3rd Regiment, Earl Spencer, K.G., and Mr. Edward Ross. The Secretary was Captain R. W. Haig, R.A., an officer whose special scientific abilities rendered him well qualified for a task which he subsequently had to relinquish on account of a severe and dangerous illness. The Committee was originally appointed to award prizes for the best military arm and the best ammunition. The conditions laid down by the War Office were too narrow in their scope, and excluded from the competition many promising arms. This was an unfortunate proceeding, and on December 10, 1867, the War Office decided that the Committee's inquiries should be extended so as to include many of the rejected weapons. The experience already gained showed that accurate shooting had not been sufficiently considered in the arms sent in for competition. None had reached the standard laid down by the War Office, and it was known that muzzle-loaders had done so without difficulty. It was, however, clear that the different systems of closing the breech could not affect the shooting where metal cartridges were used. So it was determined to separate the problem into its component parts—to find a barrel that would shoot well, a breech apparatus that would be simple while it worked well and quickly —and then to put barrel and breech apparatus together to make the new arm. A few isolated attempts have been made to throw doubts upon the wisdom of the Committee in adopting this plan of action; indeed some manufacturers seem to think that new arms are adopted solely for the benefit of the trade. The best proof that the Committee were right is to be found in the fact that the British Service is now in a position to obtain a rifle of extraordinary simplicity, strength to stand use and abuse, accuracy, speed in firing, and destructive effect of bullet, besides giving one of the best effects in a military arm, a low trajectory to its bullet.

The barrel found to fulfil best all the conditions demanded was that of Mr. Henry, whose breech action was also very good, second only to the Martini, which has been adopted. Mr. Henry's rifles have long been well known, and perhaps nothing can show the fairness of the Committee in a more favourable light than their going out of the country for a breech action, at the risk of offending inventors and suffering from the criticism of the English press. Mr. Martini is, we believe, a Hungarian by birth, though his factory is in Switzerland. If our English gunmakers were to be surpassed in any part of their trade, we are glad that the victor comes of the nation which has so long received the sympathies of this country in its struggles for liberty and constitutional government.

The experiments to determine the best kind of barrel would have been endless had not the Committee started with certain fixed data drawn from the results of previous trials. Those data were—a length of 35 inches, as laid down by the War Office, which had fixed the total length of the arm at 51 inches. The weight was to be 4 lbs. 6 oz., and the calibre ·45 of an inch, because previous experiments had shown this to be the best for most purposes. Colonel Dixon, R.A., and Colonel Boxer, R.A., supported the claims of a ·5-inch bore, and the Committee tried a barrel of this size made at Enfield, but were only confirmed in their previous opinion. The cartridge case was also decided to be upon Colonel Boxer's pattern, for none other had shown itself to be possessed of so many advantages. The weight of the bullet was fixed at 480 grains, that of the powder at 85 grains. All the barrels except two were fitted with Mr. Henry's breech action. The exceptions were the Enfield ·5-inch barrel, which had the Snider action, and one supplied by Mr. Westley Richards, with his own mechanism attached.

As the various barrels came in they were put through a long series of tests for accuracy, penetration, flatness of trajectory, and to a further one not laid down in the programme, and only applied to the most successful in other respects. A rifle, fired very frequently and rapidly, becomes too hot to touch, and when we say that the Committee were in the habit of dipping the Henry barrel into water to cool it, no one can doubt that an additional and severe test was applied. The series of shooting included practice at 300, 500, 800, 1,000, and even at last 1,200 yards, in rounds of 20 shots each. During the old competition reported upon February 12, 1848, the Henry rifle had shown excellent qualities, marred only by occasional strip shots. Since then the inventor had improved his ammunition by the use of hardened bullets, and a small beeswax wad at the base of the bullet enclosed between two jute card wads. Much credit is due to Mr. Henry for the ammunition as well as the barrel, and his name will be connected with both the one and the other. The barrels of seven different competitors, besides one from the Royal Factory at Enfield, were brought forward. Mr. Lancaster submitted two descriptions of barrel and four of ammunition. The Committee only publish the result of one, "the other combinations not being sufficiently satisfactory to warrant a continuation of the trial." For comparison, then, the Committee give tables of practice with the ·45-inch Enfield and ·5-inch Snider Enfield, the Henry, Lancaster, Rigby, Westley Richards, and Whitworth. Of these, the Rigby, Westley Richards, and Whitworth were rejected before arriving at the 1,000 yards' range; and the Henry surpassed all other competitors—the average mean deviation of two barrels, each making five targets of twenty rounds each, and being cleaned after each target, was only 2·62 feet. It was fired at iron plates, gabions, sap rollers, and even at the warm carcase of a horse. The penetration was remarkable, the wounds inflicted extremely severe. Long hardened bullets fired with plenty of powder smash bones and tear flesh to a degree hitherto unequalled. Though the hole made by the bullet on entering the body of an animal is small, it is enough to let life out at; and the wound made on its exit is terrible. All these excellences, combined with resistance to wear and tear, both inside and outside, amply justified the Committee in adopting the Henry barrel with the Boxer-Henry ammunition.

If the trials of the barrels were severe, the breech mechanism was not allowed to escape on easier terms. Two dangerous accidents having occurred with bolt guns, the Committee feel themselves justified in rejecting all arms on this system. "The rifles were so much damaged by the explosions that it was impossible to determine exactly the causes of these accidents." In one case "the bolt only escaped being driven back in the firer's face through its being bent upwards by the explosion, and so becoming jammed in the shoe of the breechblock." The Committee carefully examined the different systems, rejected some of them at once, and fired twenty rounds a-piece out of the others. Then sand was thrown over them, to represent the effect of sand-storms in India, and, we might add, the dust of the Long Valley at Aldershot. Cartridges purposely damaged were next fired, to test the escape of gas. Though the well-trained soldier always protects his rifle from rain, it may sometimes be exposed, so the Committee put the arms through a long course of firing, leaving them to rust between whiles, and even accelerated the oxidation by putting them in rain or in water. Some of them failed under these tests. The Martini worked as well as ever; the whole apparatus was apparently as good after firing a large number of rounds as when it was first newly tried. Indeed, nothing could upset the imperturbability of this breech action, which has no hammer, and is thoroughly protected against wet. It went through tests with purposely defective cartridges, and showed that nothing could burst open the mechanism. Furthermore, the apparatus is wonderfully rapid in its action. Twenty rounds have been fired in forty-eight seconds with the Martini action, and if the men do but shoot straight and low enough, neither cavalry nor infantry could approach near enough for the delivery of a successful charge. One by one defects developed themselves in all the breech actions except those of the Henry and Martini, and henceforth it was a neck and neck race between the two. Improvements, suggested either by the Committee or the inventors, were made in both, and the Martini was found to be the better of the two. Both systems showed themselves equally safe. They were equal in strength.

In number and simplicity of parts the Martini had the advantage. It contained only thirty parts, while the Henry had forty-nine. The Martini, which has no apparent lock, but acts without hammer or cocking, was, as a natural consequence, superior in speed of firing, though not much so. It is also cheap to manufacture. After balancing all that was to be said on either side, the Committee decided on adopting the Martini breech action, and nothing now remained but to fit Henry barrel to Martini breech, and try whether the compound system would fulfil all expectations. The arms were made, the trials with them proceeded, and ended in satisfying the Committee and the numerous visitors that the new rifle was all that could be desired. They therefore recommended its adoption, under the name of the "Martini-Henry" rifle. The ammunition was to be called the "Boxer-Henry." Even at the last moment objections were made to the size of the chamber. Parts of the interior of the breech action were said to be exposed to a severe strain. The Committee substituted lead for the stronger metals, yet the parts stood, and showed no signs of being damaged. At last they were told that the chamber was too small, so they enlarged it, and found that no deterioration in shooting was apparent.

Thus, then, it is clear that every conceivable test has been applied to the arm, every objection met and proved to be without foundation. What remains but to manufacture an ample supply, and put 30,000 or 40,000 into the hands of the troops as soon as possible? It will hardly be believed that Mr. Cardwell has ordered 40,000 new Snider-Enfields to be made, and, we believe, 100 Martini-Henrys of the old large bore. Not old arms to be converted, be it understood, but everything new—stock, lock, and barrel. So we are practically ignoring for the present the labours of the Committee, and increasing the number of obsolete arms. There seems to be a positive fatality about these matters. It is pretty well known that the officers of the Committee wished to have a shorter barrel, and therefore a more convenient and, they believe, better shooting arm. Their wish has been overruled in order that the prodding power of the bayonet may not be lessened. They have spent many months in experiments, and selected an arm tested in every possible way. What must be their chagrin when they see a large order given for rifles that were nowhere in the competition, while the weapon of their choice is to be brought before a new tribunal of ignorant and prejudiced privates.

REVIEWS.

THE BISHOP OF ORLEANS ON EDUCATION.*

THIS is really a charming as well as a very sensible little book. The Bishop writes with a hearty interest in his subject, based, as he informs us, and as is abundantly evident from his treatment, on a large experience of his own. And he writes without pretence or affectation of any kind. To say that there is no superfluous verbiage, or that the style would not have been improved to our English taste by some exercise of the art of compression, would be to say that the author had forgotten he was a Frenchman; and this Mgr. Dupanloup never does forget. Neither, again, can it be exactly said that there is much in the volume which is altogether new. On so hackneyed a theme as the education of children it would be difficult to be very original without, like Rousseau, starting a paradox. But inasmuch as there are few subjects on which so much nonsense is talked, or on which people are so fatally prone to ignore in practice what their common sense constrains them to admit in theory to be true, we may well be grateful to a writer who can clothe old truths in a new form, and whose eloquence, as well as his position, is sure to win attention for what he has to say. It may perhaps be a satisfaction to some of our readers if we add at the outset that, while the Bishop, as is natural, regards education throughout from a religious point of view, there is hardly a word that the most rigid Protestant, as such, could object to. There is, so far as we have observed, only one allusion to the confessional from the beginning to the end of the book, though the sins and temptations of childhood and youth, and the method of combating them, are elaborately discussed. In making the moral and religious significance of the early years of life his point of departure, and insisting that all education which deserves the name must be based on the principle that "the boy is father to the man," Mgr. Dupanloup has no doubt given the true and only adequate explanation of the high importance he attaches to the training of youth. It was precisely from their failing to discern this that education, in any such sense of the word, was for the most part so utterly neglected among the ancients. Their conception of morality as distinguished from political obligation, and indeed of personality, was so faint and uncertain, as compared with that of Christian society, that the years before the toga virilis was assumed had little of grace or interest in their eyes. They wished indeed to train good citizens, but the notion of training good men was foreign to their idea of life, and it was time enough for the boy to learn his civic duties when he had done with school. The opposite and modern view is expressed forcibly, if somewhat rhetorically, in the following passage, where our author lays down the leading principle of his treatise:—

De quoi est-il, en effet, question? Il importe tout d'abord de le bien comprendre. Voilà un enfant il faut l'élever; mais qu'est-ce à dire et quel est cet enfant? Cet enfant, c'est le genre humain; c'est l'humanité tout entière; c'est l'homme: rien de plus, rien de moins. Il a droit à la sollicitude de toutes les autorités, à l'action et aux bienfaits de tous les pouvoirs sur la terre. Il a droit à tous les respects et il les doit à son tour. Toutes les autorités divines et humaines: le Prince, le Prêtre, le Père, l'Instituteur, le Magistrat, la Famille, la Société, l'Église, sont institués pour lui. La Discipline morale, l'Enseignement, les Lettres, les Sciences, la Religion, tous les prix du travail et de la vertu, la Providence enfin, tout est ici-bas pour lui: parce qu'il est lui-même ici-bas de Dieu et pour Dieu! Voilà pourquoi tout en ce monde doit travailler à son Éducation, tout doit concourir à l'élever, tout doit faire ou favoriser cette grande œuvre.

As he elsewhere defines it, "to cultivate, exercise, develop, strengthen, and refine all the physical, intellectual, moral and religious faculties of the child" is the proper work of education.

There is one obvious, but often unheeded fact, which cannot be too emphatically insisted upon, and which Mgr. Dupanloup is careful to urge from the first, that no system of training can be really successful which is not conducted by those who like both their pupils and their work. He tells us again and again of the "affection and respect" he has always felt for the boys entrusted to his charge, and that the long years devoted to their care have been the pleasantest, though the most laborious, of his life. That "one must be interested in their welfare, one must love them and win their love," to be able to do them any good, is the verdict of all experience, and their various characters cannot be moulded without the action of genuine sympathy. "C'est précisément l'inexpérience, la faiblesse, les innombrables périls et surtout les défauts de ce premier âge qui intéressaient mon cœur." And there is sound good sense in the remark that no children are more hopeless to bring up than those without passions and without faults. You cannot educate a child without or against his will, for it is the business of education, as of medicine, to follow and aid the processes of nature, not to thwart them. "What children do by force, and without any taste or will of their own, profits them nothing." And the Bishop avows that with all his horror of "spoilt children"— to whose mismanagement by foolish mammas, who say "je m'occupe à gâter mes enfants," he has devoted a sensible and very amusing chapter—he cannot feel quite satisfied with children "who have never used their liberty against" him. We suspect he is right enough there. It has often been observed that fondness for children is a very common characteristic of the higher minds among a celibate clergy, and the Bishop is a conspicuous instance of it. He even goes so far as to apply to the age of childhood St. Paul's famous description of charity, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians. But it must not be inferred from this that he advocates any mere weak and maudlin method of treating them, or that he shares the Palmerston heresy of their being all born good. On the contrary, a considerable part of the volume is occupied with examining the three leading manifestations of "original sin" in the nascent mind, according to the Scriptural classification of the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. His suggestions as to the regulation of their various tendencies, and the different treatment which different characters require, are marked by moderation and good sense. The strong recommendation of athletic exercise for boys as a healthy check to moral as well as physical diseases, may seem superfluous to an English reader, or rather he might, under present circumstances, desire a caution against excess in this matter. But all that we know of French schools points to the importance and urgency of the requirement the Bishop dwells upon. Whether he has sufficient grounds for his severe censure of the moral condition of several of the public schools, against which he earnestly warns parents, we are hardly in a position to judge. "Les écoles publiques qu'on connait, je devrais dire ces gouffres," is strong language, but it may be justified by facts, and he appears to speak from personal knowledge.

The author does not, however, confine himself to the moral aspects of education. He seems to have given equal attention to its intellectual side, and on this point he has a good deal of fault to find with the course ordinarily pursued in schools. What he says about it will apply in the main to English as well as French systems of mental discipline, and there are certainly many educational reformers among ourselves whose conclusions tally pretty closely with his own. There is a pretty general agreement with him in condemning the foolish plan of oppressing the minds of very young children with a ponderous memoria technica of names and dates and rules, which can suggest no corresponding ideas; but even now practice still lags far behind theory. What Mgr. Dupanloup calls "the liberty due to the intelligence of children" is as yet very imperfectly apprehended. One point which he repeatedly dwells upon is so little noticed, that our common practice implies an entire ignorance, if not a persistent denial, of its truth. Yet it surely is true that to overwork the brain during the early years of boyhood, say before twelve years old, often results in paralysing, or seriously enfeebling, the intellectual faculties for life. We quite share the Bishop's disgust at the way in which many schoolmasters force on a few "prize boys"—generally to the partial or entire neglect of the rest—"by incessant labour for many months all day, and part of the night, for those brilliant examinations" which gain éclat for the tutor, and too often permanently damage the successful candidate. It is another phase of the same vicious system, which he rightly protests against, to crowd fifty, sixty, or even a hundred boys into the same class; and here at least some of our English public schools are, or very recently were, in some way much implicated in the charge. The rule introduced by the present Head-master of Uppingham, of never placing more than twenty-five boys in one form, is said to have had a good deal to do with the position his school has won for itself at the Universities. In giving us the result of his experience on classical studies, the Bishop is again in substantial harmony with many among ourselves. He is far from seeking to depreciate the value of the classics, but he thinks the study would be pursued more effectively, as well as more rapidly, if it were not commenced so early; and especially he protests against "the simultaneous study by very young children of two difficult grammars, the Latin and the French." That particular fault is indeed avoided in our schools, because the Latin grammar is supposed to supersede the necessity for learning the English, but it may be questioned if Latin and Greek are not generally begun too soon. According to Madame de Maintenon, the Dauphin "at five or six years old knew a thousand Latin words, and when he came of age, not one." That is an extreme case no doubt, but there is much force in the Bishop's warning against making young boys study the learned tongues and mathematics without any taste or aptitude or preparation for the work, and before the right time. His own scheme is that from eight to ten or eleven they should receive "a sound primary instruction," and then till sixteen or seventeen go through their "course of humanities," to be followed by the study of philosophy and science. So very much in matters of education must always depend on circumstances, national, social, or personal, over which the educator has no control, that it is impossible to lay down any universal law on the subject. We are disposed, however, to agree with Mgr. Dupanloup as to the advisableness of deferring the commencement of classical instruction till a later period than has been hitherto the ordinary usage, and that both because the same amount of knowledge may thus be acquired in less time, and because it will be more readily and intelligently acquired from not being, as the first two or three years of school-work very generally are now, mere forced labour against the grain. The present custom of admitting boys to scholarships at many of our public schools by competitive examination would of course be materially affected by such a change. And we must confess ourselves more than doubtful whether any system of competitive examination at so early an age is not a serious evil. Cramming is bad enough at any time, but overloading the brain at nine or ten years old is more than an intellectual mistake. It often, as we said before, injures both the bodily and mental faculties for life. Rousseau's paradoxical notion that boys should learn nothing till they are thirteen has been justly ridiculed, but it was, after all, only a recoil from a hardly less vicious theory which he saw in full operation round him. We may easily correct the latter without adopting the absurdities of Emile.

Mgr. Dupanloup's book is written in a pleasing and popular style, and is intended, if we may judge from the highly ornamental "get up," to lie on drawing-room tables. The constant quotations from Scripture, and from various authors ancient and modern, especially Fénélon, are perhaps also multiplied—rather too freely we are inclined to think—with a view to arresting the attention of lady-readers. But others besides French mothers may examine it with interest and profit. We give one passage from the chapter on the "classification of defects," both as a fair specimen of the general tone of the volume, and as indicating the nicer discrimination of shades of character which is one of its distinctive features:—

> On rencontrera par exemple dans un jeune homme un inexplicable mélange de frivolité et de sérieux, de vanité et de raison, de douceur et de dureté, de lumière et d'aveuglement sur lui-même, de noblesse d'âme et de misère morale: la fermeté de l'esprit et la faiblesse du caractère; la rectitude du jugement, la droiture et la bonté du cœur, avec la mollesse de la volonté et l'insensibilité de la conscience: natures, dont les contrastes stupéfient l'observateur attentif tant elles sont extraordinairement fortes et extraordinairement faibles; profondes et légères; tendres, et tout à coup sèches et dures; d'une franchise quelquefois admirable, et capables néanmoins d'une telle dissimulation, qu'elle semble avoir la simplicité et le sang-froid de la candeur; d'une intelligence vive et claire, et d'une conscience si obscure qu'elle semble éteinte; d'une reconnaissance dont la sensibilité et le bel esprit se partagent l'expression, et qui peut tout à coup faire place à l'apparence la plus ingrate; ou bien encore, pas de caractère plus ferme, qui affecte plus de prétentions au courage, et qui ait plus renoncé en même temps à la force morale.

FERGUSSON'S TREE AND SERPENT WORSHIP.*

(Second Notice.)

THE subject of nature worship requires to be treated as a whole, as well as in a broad and philosophical spirit. It is of little use to pick out this or that isolated feature in the general veneration paid to lower forms of life, and to hunt up empirical proofs of its recurrence ever and anon among the monuments or the literature of race after race. What we want is some light to be thrown on the dawning of these mythological ideas upon the rude consciousness of mankind. What was their bearing, for instance, upon the primary idea of life in its creative or reproductive processes? what their relation to the more abstract and more spiritualized modes of faith and worship prevalent in later or recent times? Are these proofs sufficient to raise up the fabric of a real and distinctive worship at all? In selecting for exclusive comment and illustration the traces of "tree and serpent worship" as exhibited by these Indian monuments, Mr. Fergusson only breaks ground upon what is a vast and fertile field of inquiry. To the most casual student of the emblematical enrichments of these topes one prominent feature is the copiousness and the variety wherewith the mind of the artist has revelled amongst natural types. Conspicuous amongst the animal forms which uphold or decorate the structural masses at Sanchi and Amravati are the elephant, the horse, the tiger, even the lion—who can hardly have been indigenous to the place, but who in his very treatment bespeaks an alien, probably an early Greek or Assyrian, origin. In the superb gateways of Sanchi the elephant forms the capital, and among the rest, though far from most prominently, the serpent's folds seem to be represented in the convolutions of the end of the lintel, or cross rail, though these spiral forms might be otherwise viewed as the mere conventional finial to the moulding of the cross-beam. In sundry of the bas-reliefs the well-known naga or snake appears, sometimes with five heads, a kind of tutelar genius over the king or mythic personage of the scene, sometimes as the central figure in a small shrine or temple. Meaner personages have only one-headed guardians.

Along with this serpent symbolism that of the sacred tree enters largely into the general series of representations. Sometimes the tree is honoured with the chatta, or umbrella, the privilege of divine or royal rank. In its general form this tree resembles the mysterious conifer, so familiar to us in the sculptures of Nineveh and Babylon. In some cases it seems to be no other than the pipal or sacred fig. We are, after all, however, a long way from any evidence that would justify the theory of a distinctive worship of the tree and serpent as a mode of formal belief or cultus. Both tree and serpent may, it is easy to conceive, have been amongst the earliest agents in the genesis of faith in the rude intelligence. Each may have become, concurrently with other forms of life, media of power in raising the mind from the mere fetish to more abstract conceptions of the supernatural. The produce—and still more, in tropical lands, the shade—of the tree would kindle ideas of gratitude and reverence. The mystery and the beauty of form and action in the serpent, its supposed length of days, and the general fascination of its aspect would make it a type of what is occult, infinite, and eternal in nature. In its harmless varieties the snake connected itself with ideas of the Agathodæmon, the life-giving, healing, beneficent agency; while its deadly powers symbolized all that was malignant, subtle, infernal in the spiritual forces of the universe. These elementary principles may be traced underlying every early variety of religious development. Men of special learning have made it their task to accumulate proofs of their recurrence, and to analyse in some degree their variety and their import. The Baumcultus of Professor Bötticher, and the painstaking though ludicrously uncritical Worship of the Serpent of Mr. Deane, supplied Mr. Fergusson with abundant matter ready to hand in support of both branches of his hypothesis. His own industry, seconded by the hints or the suggestions of Indian officials or friends, has added a quantity of curious and often interesting lore bearing upon modern times and native usages. Yet what, after all, do we get from heaping up these desultory odds and ends of erudition? It would be as easy to multiply instances of local superstition and folk lore on behalf of many another object in nature than trees and serpents. A thousand things may be held sacred in popular observance, and yet not be divine. Mr. Fergusson rushes with undue haste into the theory of deification. Even at this day the Brahmin reveres his fig-tree or his cow. Does he therefore worship them? The Druids had of old their sacred oaks and mistletoe. Yet all we know about them points to their worship being addressed to deities of so strictly personal a form as to suggest to Diodorus and Strabo a comparison with the Roman Pantheon.

On the subject of the Druids Mr. Fergusson set himself strongly against the current of general opinion, and thus casts away the support which his theory might otherwise have derived from popular tradition or prejudice. He is an entire disbeliever in the Druids. It is a settled principle with him that the Druids had no traceable footing in this country, save perhaps in some detached spots upon the borders of Wales, and that none of the great stone structures of early Britain, like Avebury or Stonehenge, had the slightest connexion with their religion or race. On this point we can do no more at present than refer the reader to Colonel Forbes Leslie's Early Races of Scotland, where he will find not only the ethnological argument treated far more fully and dispassionately, but the megalithic monuments both of India and Europe viewed in a large and critical spirit wholly beyond that of the author of Tree and Serpent Worship. Mr. Stuart's Sculptured Monuments of Scotland will be found to bring much thought and learning to bear upon a question which we are not content to see dismissed after so crude and hasty a fashion as this. Mr. Fergusson has a golden chance in the obvious juxtaposition of serpent and tree in the second chapter of Genesis, and he, more suo, has a theory cut and dry for the occasion, though we hardly see how he makes out so straight and early a cut for his favourite worship from the "mud of the Lower Euphrates" to the garden of Eden. "The curse was not upon the reptile as such, but upon a form of worship which the authors of the Pentateuch must have regarded with horror, and which they thought it necessary to denounce in the strongest terms, and in the form they believed would be most intelligible to those to whom it was addressed." We doubt whether it will appear as intelligible in our day to any persons who have no foregone conviction upon the matter. Whatever impress of sanctity may attach to the "tree of life" can hardly be taken to denote a tree-worship in the proper sense. Certainly, least of all does the serpent appear in any relation indicative of an object of reverence. Anything like a duality or hostility of faiths is totally opposed to the whole spirit of the story. The literature of other nations has made us familiar with the wor king of the dualistic principle in the Oriental mind. In the Zend Avesta the principle of evil is even known as azhi dahâka, the "serpent." But in the part of the serpent of Paradise there is nothing in keeping with the relation of Vritra to Indra, or to the dualism of Ahriman and Ormuzd, who face each other almost as equals. The serpent who beguiled Eve, as Professor Max Müller has pointed out, is far from inviting comparison with the much grander conception of the terrible power of Vritra or of Ahriman. Nor is there the slightest sign, that we can see, in the text of the narrative that the curse is aimed at the worship or worshippers of the serpent. What do we really see but the embodiment of the evil will crushed under the supreme will of Jehovistic monotheism? We forbear to enter into the question of the date of this portion of the Pentateuch. Whether we take it to emanate literally from the Mosaic pen, and to reflect the exact state of theosophic development at the earliest period of distinct Jewish nationality, or to have undergone modification at the later recension of Ezra or others, the tendency of the passage is but to one effect. Can any one say that a pre-existent serpent worship is on either view indicated here, still more reprobated, "in the strongest terms"? It requires a singular critic to detect, on the first view, that same Moses denouncing here serpent worship "in the strongest terms, and in the way most intelligible to those whom he was addressing," who is found recording in Numbers his own authorized lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness. On the other view, it is still more strange to find at so late a date no stronger or more intelligible denunciation of a mode of idol-worship which is so emphatically stigmatized in the case of Hezekiah. Again, why is no curse pronounced upon the worship of the tree in conjunction with the serpent?

But who built these remarkable Indian monuments, which we are to look upon as the high places of tree and serpent worship? The answer, with Mr. Fergusson, is very simple. It affords him an opportunity of trotting out the ethnological hobby which has served to carry so large a portion of the History of Architecture. Show me a building, he proclaims in effect, and I will show you a Turanian. There is no question with him of blood or speech. Philological tests, whereby Schlegel or Bopp might seek to solve the distinctions of Aryan, Semitic, and Turanian, are things of naught. "The Aryan races are not builders." Now let us look this paradox in the face, with the monuments in question to enlighten us. In the particular case of Sanchi and Amravati we have no wish to dispute the fact of a (in the main) Turanian origin. It may well be that the great wave of Aryan conquest and civilization which spread so broadly its blood and speech and arts, not only over the Indian peninsula, but through the length and breadth of Europe, left here and there, as in this instance, a gap to be filled by a Turanian or Tamul-speaking race. But even here, on Mr. Fergusson's own showing, whatever of free and noble art pervades the handiwork of those Turanian Buddhists must be traced to the infiltration of Greek taste and skill, probably through the medium of the Greek kingdom of Bactria. With Athens and Corinth, Ephesus and Halicarnassus, before our eyes, are we to be told that the Aryans, though gifted in speech and letters, could never build? It is of no avail, it seems, for us to point to the unbroken stream of art pouring over Europe, with the Parthenon standing as its highest tidal mark, bearing down through the later classic and the middle ages what has been fondly deemed the glory of Aryan genius. The identity, if not the very existence, of the Aryan is swept away in a breath. Ethnologists and philologists alike are put to the rout. The fashionable and in part doubtless highly cultivated company who flocked to a recent lecture upon tree and serpent worship at the Royal Institution were treated to a solution of the whole problem, which we would fain hope seemed more lucid to them than it does to our own poor understanding. "The early Greeks were Turanians." From the report we do not gather what the later Greeks were, or what were the Greeks whom Pericles ruled, and for whom Thucydides wrote. Were Homer and Hesiod Turanians, or are we wrong in calling them early Greeks? From early times was there a building caste, and a talking and writing caste, and did the Aryan half, whose speech and writings show their intense appreciation of the glories of art, merely look on at the special handiwork of their Turanian brothers? Do we anywhere else meet with masterpieces of any art where the idea of that art is foreign to the genius of the race? Were Phidias and Ictinus Turanians? And what were the citizens who commissioned, impelled, and idolized the result of their architectural genius? Were they Turanians too? At what time and from what source did the Turanian element get so transfused into the veins of other nations of Aryan blood and speech as to rear the fanes of Canterbury and Cologne, Westminster or Amiens?

It is amongst ourselves, after all, that we are to look for the clearest traces of the irrepressible Turanian. The mystery which hangs over the date and origin of our megalithic monuments is summarily dispelled. One of Mr. Fergusson's strong points has always been the post-Roman date of all these structures, and he is now prepared to put his finger upon the primary model and wellnigh upon the very year to which the most typical of them may be referred. The circle of Stonehenge is a reproduction, by artists of the same race and at the same period, of the great tope of Amravati! What seems to Mr. Fergusson beyond all doubt is that the western and the eastern monuments were "being erected simultaneously, the western one to commemorate a martyrdom, the eastern to perpetuate the memory of the visit or enshrinement of a relic." In or about the year 400 A.D. he sees a Buddhist colony, with the plan of Amravati in their hands, uprearing the trilithons of Salisbury Plain. One point is specially adduced as "a curious coincidence." The inner diameter of the outer rail of Amravati is 195 feet, "precisely double that of the inner diameter of the outer circle of Stonehenge; exactly 100 Roman feet, or 97·6 English feet." It certainly is a curious coincidence with the measurements of Stukeley, whose eyes were wonderfully open to anything that might make for his pre-established hypothesis. But, in the first place, assuming the restored plan of the ruined Indian tope to be true to a few inches, our Wiltshire circle is, and probably was originally, far too rude and irregular for a diameter to be struck to any such nicety otherwise than by the most complex and precarious method of averages. If too we have recourse, with this end, to the official and unbiassed figures of the Ordnance Survey, we find the inner diameter in Sir Henry James's restored plan brought up by the scale to fully 100 English feet. There is not, then, much nearness in the supposed "coincidence." Conceiving, moreover, the space comprised within the circle of Stonehenge to have been filled with a lofty mound or cone of earth or masonry, how are we to account for the fact that no vestige of the mass remains; whilst the artificial mound known as Silbury Hill, and universally held to be of far higher antiquity, remains little impaired by time to this day? What, again, can we imagine to have been the purpose of the huge centre trilithons, or of what is called the "altar," which must have been buried within the bulk of the tope? Neither is anything here at all corresponding with the triple horizontal rails which at Sanchi and Amravati were dovetailed in from post to post between the ground and the upper course or cornice. The circle of Stonehenge, like all the British monuments of that class, exhibits a simple arcade of uprights and cross-beams of the rudest kind, and nothing more. As a plain question of art, again, who but a determined theorist, θέσιν διαφυλάττων, could conceive the rude, unwrought architecture of Stonehenge proceeding from the same hands, and indicating the same date as the refined and exquisite workmanship of Amravati? Who, save for the exigencies of his theory, would picture to himself a colony of "Turanian Buddhists" dropping down as from the clouds upon the downs of Wiltshire in the fourth or fifth century of Roman occupation, in the midst of a population accustomed to the arts, the usages, and the refinements of the conquering race? In a district so rich in noble architectural works as the relics thickly strewn over the soil of Wilts testify the West of Britain to have been, can we fancy recourse being had to the primitive carpentry of which Stonehenge is an example? Does it come, as Dr. Guest forcibly puts it, within the limits of probability that men who had for centuries been familiarized with the forms of Roman architecture could have built Stonehenge? If, moreover, we are to look to Amravati for the date of the model of the Wiltshire circle, where are we to find the prototype or correlative of Avebury, or Stenhouse, or Turnsachun, to which antiquaries with one accord assign a period older by many centuries, not to speak of the countless circles and cromlechs of Scandinavian and other lands? Nor is the mere bringing of his Buddhist artificers to our shores, or the dispersing them on the peculiar mission of their race, the only difficulty in the way of Mr. Fergusson. These mysterious settlers or voyagers, when their task is done, have to be accounted for, and that in the growing light which letters and civilization cast over an age midway between the Roman and the Norman invasions. If the Turanian tree and serpent worshippers who bequeathed to us these architectural puzzles came to us from the mouth of the Kistna, or fresh from the "mud of the Lower Euphrates," did they find their way back to their native haunts? They have, we may well complain, left far too much of their aboriginal mud sticking about all that concerns their memory. It may make Young India mightily hug himself to be told, by the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council, that the cherished primeval monuments of the land of his lords and masters are but poor reproductions, by a knot of his own Buddhist ancestors, of masterpieces of their native art upon the banks of the Kistna. Nor should we perhaps grudge him this enjoyment of the tune of triumph for which he has been called upon to pay the piper. It is not much else that he will get for his money, for we doubt whether the appreciation of fine toned paper, splendid type, and brilliant photographs has achieved much hold upon the native mind. The native taxpayer is, however, too far off, as well as too rich, for his consent to be taken into the account. Having swallowed the camel in the shape of ten thousand pounds laid out upon the Sultan's ball, it is hardly worth his straining at the gnat of a single thousand risked in giving us one of the most gorgeous books of an exceptionally magnificent season. We would not, for our part, look our gift-horse too grudgingly or critically in the mouth. Tree and Serpent Worship is a handsome ornament for the drawing-room, though it will hardly take a place of much prominence or value in the library of a scholar.

HENRY THE THIRD'S ENGLISH PROCLAMATION.*

ONE puts this pamphlet down with a heavy heart—with a feeling that there is nothing in the world that can be trusted. We do not mean that we cannot trust Mr. Ellis, for we believe that we can trust him; but then Mr. Ellis shows that, if he can be trusted, he must belong to a very small class indeed. It will be hard upon scholars if they are to come to the conclusion that not only translators and editors, but transcribers, makers of facsimiles, photozincographers, everybody in short, public and private, from old Somner and his brethren to the Record Commissioners and the Ordnance Surveyors, are all to be thrown into one common heap as untrustworthy. The consequences will be rather frightful, if we once understand that we cannot safely study any matter unless we have before us the actual original documents in their native parchment and ink; for to lay down such a rule would be, to most of us, much the same as forbidding all study at all. But really Mr. Ellis's researches lead us to conclusions not very different from what we have just said. Here is the famous Proclamation of 1258, familiar to every one who studies the history either of the English Constitution or of the English language, our one English Proclamation for so long a time before and after, our one native oasis in a howling wilderness of French and Latin, a philological and constitutional ewe-lamb to be tended with the most religious care—and see how many things it has suffered at the hands of many editors. As for translators, we have long done with them; in most cases it is not so much that they cannot translate as that they will not. But to transcribers and editors we are all driven more or less to trust, and one might expect that it would not be wholly impossible for a man to copy out and to print certain words, letters, and figures as he finds them before him. Yet here, as Mr. Ellis shows us, is our choice and precious document, edited as it has been over and over again, and always edited wrong. The only chance of accuracy seems to have been when German scholars have corrected English editors by the light of nature—when, without seeing the original, they have divined what the text must be, when those who had the text before them could not make it out. We respect them accordingly, and we thank them accordingly; but, as Mr. Ellis says, this is not a wholesome state of things. We ought to be able to read and transcribe and print our own things, and not to have to trust to the happy guesses of Dr. Pauli. Mr. Ellis goes, with a patience at which one stands aghast, through all the blunders of all who have gone before him, in editing this one short Proclamation. And the sum total is not small. And we are specially sorry to find that the last mistake is one of the worst. We did think that we might trust the grand series called National Manuscripts—that we might trust not only the photozincographs themselves, but the transcripts which were placed alongside of them. Sir Henry James and his works do indeed come off with very little damage; the reader is indeed reminded that the process of photozincography is not absolutely perfect and infallible; and that is all. But Mr. William Basevi Saunders, who "revised the proofs of every sheet of the facsimiles before they were printed," is by no means so lucky. Besides divers other mistakes, Mr. Saunders is convicted of this killing one. In the titles in the Proclamation "on" (= "in") is constantly used where we should use "of." "Henr' King on Engleneloande, Lhoauerd on Yrloand," &c. "Sim' of Muntfort, Eorl on Leirchestr" &c. Now whenever this "on" is found, Mr. Saunders reads "ov," seemingly meaning this for some otherwise unknown form of "of." This blunder Mr. Ellis exposes with some little glee. We remember very well, when the National Manuscripts appeared, being a good deal amazed at this same "ov." But we thought the photozincography must be right, and so we held our peace. And, moreover, we were not inclined to find fault. We were just then in the extreme of delight at finding from the National Manuscripts that we were right in maintaining nostro periculo against Mr. Froude that no Frenchman had ever pretended to hold "les estoilles," though many French kings had pretended to heal "les escrouelles."

But to return to our Proclamation. It was put forth by the famous Council of twenty-four, who drew up the Provisions of Oxford, and there can be little doubt that the idea of publishing it in English, the language of the people, as well as in the learned Latin and the polite French, was due to the enlightened mind of the great Simon. His own praises were sung in all three languages, and, whether he could himself speak English or not, he knew thoroughly well how important an instrument the tongue of the people was. In this respect the document stands quite by itself. It has no fellow for a long way on either side. We have seen it called the last English document—the last of that series which starts from the beginning of things and goes on to William's charters to London and to Deorman. We have also seen it called the first English document, the first of the series which is multiplying daily. It is neither the one nor the other. The one English Proclamation of Henry the Third is absolutely isolated, and belongs to no series either way. It stands quite by itself, a solitary witness of the exceptional wisdom of a solitary great man.

There is something wonderful, and certainly, in its kind, praiseworthy beyond all measure, in the way in which Mr. Ellis goes through the Proclamation and everything that has anything to do with it, not only through every detail of its grammar and spelling, but through the slightest appearances of the manuscript, and—by no means the lightest part of Mr. Ellis's labours—through the endless mistakes which have been made in copying, translating, and editing it. And, as far as we are entitled to judge, there is little or nothing in which we are not inclined to follow Mr. Ellis, unless it be in his scheme of pronunciation. Like all attempts at what we believe is called orthoëpy, the letters which are to teach us how to pronounce look much more frightful and much harder to pronounce than any real spelling, ancient or modern. Pronunciation is always more ticklish work than spelling, because we can see with our eyes what a thirteenth-century man wrote, wh[illegible] we cannot hear with our ears how he uttered it. Therefore [illegible] is that cautious men, who do not like to commit themselves, always like, whenever they can, to use the spelling of the period of which they write, and to leave each reader to pronounce according to his own theory. Still, as far as we dare venture to say anything, we should say that "Eorl" was not pronounced "Eerl." We think we can see signs that the initial "E" in Old-English really had the sound of the modern initial Y. "Eadward Eorl" is in Danish "Jatvard Jarl;" and such little signs as Shakspeare's "Yedward" and the Scotch pronunciation of "Yerl," look the same way. Then if "Eofesham" has become "Evesham," "Eoferic" is "York," and we need not say that one case in which a fuller form has been retained proves more than a hundred cases in which it has been lost.

English, we must remember, for this is the very point of the whole thing, was, when this Proclamation was put forth, purely a popular language, which the learned and polite might just know enough of to use for practical purposes, but which they would have disdained for any purposes of learning or politeness. We see the effects of this state of things in the very look of the document, as contrasted with either earlier or later English. "Hlaford" and "Lord" are both plain enough, and the modern form differs from the elder simply in dropping the letters which have ceased to be sounded. How comes the word to assume at an intermediate stage a form so uncouth as "Lhoauerd?" But we mark here the same odd change which makes us write "what" and "while" for the ancient "hwat" and "hwile," though we still sound the h in its old place. "Hl" has just in the same way got changed into "Lh." But this still seems to show that the aspirate, which so many Englishmen now find it hard to pronounce, was still sounded in 1258. Then again "Englaland" seems to slide gently enough into "England," but here we have the uncouth-looking "Engleneloand." Here however we really have a bit of philology, in the use of the Southern genitive plural.

Let us mark how thoroughly English our Proclamation is in its rendering of foreign names and titles. Any one who has any regard for the purity of any language is daily offended by the inconsistent vulgarisms into which the titles of foreign princes and nobles are changed. Nobody seems certain whether he is to say "Duke of" or "Duke de" or "Duc de"—we do not remember "Duc of," but we dare say it may be found in the Court Circular somewhere or other. But our Proclamation-makers, like Lord Macaulay, write English, and we get "Simon of Muntfort" and "Richard of Clare" and "Joh' Geffrees sune." The name which afterwards became Audley is here "Aldithel," which Mr. Ellis does not mark with an apostrophe, but which seems to want one, as the last syllable of "Ealdgythelege" is retained even in the modern form.

Mr. Ellis, as we have said, is great in pointing out the mistakes of those who went before him. When he gets to one Samuel Henshall, Fellow of Brasenose, who wrote The Saxon and English Languages reciprocally illustrative of each other (a book which we might have expected to find published Julio et Cæsare Consulibus, but which did appear in 1798), the fun of the thing becomes charming. The first few words of the document run thus:—

> Henr' þurz godes fultume King on Engleneloande. Lhoauerd on Yrloand,' Duk on Norm' on Aquitain' and eorl on An'iow Send igretinge to alle hise holde ilærde and ileawede on Huntendon' schir'.

Here there are some of Henshall's comments. "Fultume, or Fulture, from Fultura, Support." On "Lhoauerd" he tells "Lif-erth—Life-earth—Source of Life, or of Bread, Loaf, hence Bread is the Stuff, or Staff, of Life." One would hardly have thought it necessary to explain that "Holde" meant simply faithful men, lieges, but Henshall mistook it for whole, and he goes on to make the proclamation address itself to "all his whole servants of the Lord and allowed." Now, though the forms are a little odd, one would have thought that any one would have recognised in "ilærde and ileawede" the plain words "learned and lewd," that is, clerical and lay; but Henshall reads "not theilaerde and ilewede," and thus comments. On his "theilaerde," he tells us that it is "from theow, servants, hence modern thief, and the Provincialism, 'Do you thou me, i.e. call me a slave?'—in Lancashire dialect still theow." On the "ileawede" his comment is, "Allowed, lawful, Pacem Regis Habentes in the Law—neither Villains, or Thiefs—hence 'Alloy or 'Allay'—lawful money with a proportion of lawful base metal." Presently "rædes-men" is expounded to be "Read-men," which is interpreted "Men of Letters—Reading—Witens—or Wisemen." Lastly, kunericha, a word which is perhaps hardly extinct in Scotland, is translated "our King's Reach." All these things are very charming, and we are much obliged to Mr. Ellis for revealing to us the existence of Henshall and his works. It was certainly a masterpiece of ingenious blundering to see "servants of the Lord" in the "Holde ilærde," to get the word "Theow" out of the letters, and lastly, to identify "theow" at once with "thief," and with the pronoun "thou."

HIATUS.*

It is necessary to explain, what the title of this volume seems contrived to conceal, that it is a pleading for the introduction of art-teaching into education. It is a pity that a sensational title, and an affectation of the anonymous, should have been interposed between the reader and a writer who has so excellent and practical an object. It is a still greater misfortune that "Outis" should have clothed his pleading in an envelope which must confine the perusal of his argument to those who have a great deal of time, and very little taste. His argument is excellent. But the reasoning, which is here swelled out to a volume of 250 pages, would, if translated into English, form a pamphlet of 50. All beyond this is superfluous verbiage; not feathers which help the arrow to fly to its mark, but mere gaseous inflation which floats the idea out of sight, we know not whither. Mere diffuseness, a weak and watery style, is too common a case in this day of hasty writing to be charged upon one writer in particular. "Outis" is not diffuse from not having taken time. His laboured turgidity of language, overlaying, instead of expressing, the thought, seems to be the result of a deliberately adopted theory of style. The style would be a mistake even where the subject in hand was one of literary amusement. But the error makes itself perniciously felt as an impediment to success where the writer is the advocate of a practical proposal. That "Outis" should be guilty of such a violation of taste is indeed surprising, as he is earnest and enthusiastic in pleading for artistic culture. He is aware, too, that reverence is the moral quality developed by such culture, and that true wisdom is compounded of intellect and emotion. "The wise man," he says, "is beneficent and reverent because he reasons not alone from intellect and science, but likewise from the feeling of beauty and the emotion of love and faith." The man who can feel and speak thus has entered into the sanctuary, and should be preserved from parading himself in a style the windy conceitedness of which inevitably reminds the reader of the pompous strut of a Highland piper, or the self-complacent dictation of a Scotch professor. The defect of taste in the advocate will, it must be feared, materially damage the effect of his pleading.

It would be easy to make a quotation or two from "Outis'" pages of such rant that few sane persons would give the book a second thought. But such a proceeding would be as unfair as to describe a Greek play by giving extracts only from the choruses. Suppressing the inspired passages, and sinking the affectation of the general style, it will be found that the writer's ideas, as well on the particular aim of his argument as on education generally, are excellent. The practical result of his argument would be the universal introduction of "drawing" into every stage of education—schools and colleges alike—from the National School to the University. "Drawing" must be understood to stand very widely for the exact study and imitation of visible form—"form," be it observed, not "form and colour." For though colour addresses and stimulates the perception of beauty even more directly than form, the study of natural colours cannot be prosecuted critically as a part of general education. The melodies and harmonies of chromatic arrangement are, indeed, in themselves capable of being analysed by the intellect. They form a study which is capable of being made a fine discipline, not only for the eye, but for the mind and feeling. But there is not time or room within the ordinary curriculum for the introduction of a subject-matter which requires a long experience. We have too little time for satisfying the claims of form. Be this as it may, whether or not the intellectual cognizance of chromatic laws should be made a part of necessary education, there can be no doubt that drawing-masters' colouring as now taught in schools is simply mischievous. It is a dishonest pretension, not imitative of anything in nature. Pigments are laid on by recipe, without intelligent observance of the ever-varying aspect of natural colour under varying conditions. One wash is ordered for "distance," another for "middle distance," and a third for "foreground," while all the while the pupil cannot delineate one of those natural forms the colour of which depends upon the form. And his eye is debauched by the assumption that a few conventional colour-mixtures are the likeness of nature's colour.

Form, then, or beauty, as analysable into form, is the new study which should be introduced into education. New it is. For though it is true that very large sums are now spent upon the drawing-master, and that every "Academy" has its teacher of "drawing," yet the system is worthless, or rather worse. The art is discredited by making the study of it optional, to be prosecuted on half-holidays when nothing better can be done. We allow it to be taught by a class of men whose position in the school is invidiously below that of the tutors and other masters, even where they do not sink to the level of Thackeray's Gandish's Academy, with its misplaced aspirates, false accents, and contumelious indiscipline. The "drawing" thus taught is an imposture. Trees and skies and landscapes are put upon paper by boys who are incapable of delineating accurately the figure of a single leaf.

> What drawing-masters' teaching is in its plenitude and perfection it is difficult to define; but a few salient points may afford a general idea. First, it is strictly demagogic, relying on popular credulity. Second, it addresses two popular weaknesses; that of showing-off our children, and setting-off our rooms by (Third) producing brilliant pictures to be mounted, framed, and hung-up. Fourth, it utterly ignores proportion. I have seen and compared with the originals finished shaded copies where one dimension has been doubled, another trebled, and a third halved, and this under the direction of an eminent professor. Fifth, its perspective always abounds in supernumerary vanishing and measuring points; possesses independent horizons, a roving centre of vision, and a free unconstrained station-point. Sixth, it is not responsible to optics for the projection of shadows, and sometimes insists on objects showing a shaded face to the public, and standing on the ground without a shadow. . . . Its constant characteristic is an aspiration and resolution to colour, at any cost. It is true that University College and a few large schools have made drawing a dangerous reality by sincerely believing, with the old masters and the Royal Academy, that drawing is the grammatical basis of art, and by excluding colour altogether. Yet, seeing that the majority, whom the other kind of teaching addresses, know nothing about the old masters, the amateur colour-shops and small frame-makers are not as yet possessed with panic, nor in imminent danger of dissolution.

And the moral effects of the existing system upon the pupil are as unwholesome as the artistic. The boy who finds himself lauded and rewarded for what is often not his own work, and is always the most heedless and easy of his tasks, detects an advantage in idleness and deceit—idleness and deceit in which he has the teacher's complicity. What little he himself may have done towards his prize picture was done without any clear conception of what it was he was labouring to accomplish. He never can tell whether he may be lucky enough to achieve such a feat a second time. The intelligible criterion of an accurate imitation of nature has not been inculcated on his mind. He sees, indeed, for himself that the trees, plants, and rocks in his highly-praised prize-drawing bear no resemblance to the objects as he knows them in his botany or geology classes. But Gandish has explained the dissimilarity by instructing him that his production is "artistic rendering." And those mystic words grow up in the pupil's mind into a theory of art, which places it for ever among the hypocrisies and the make-believes.

But we should be conveying a very imperfect idea of "Outis'" argument if we left it to be supposed that he only urges the introduction of an art of drawing into education, as an accomplishment of a truer kind than the drawing-master's drawing now prevalent. It is true that drawing, as an accomplishment or faculty, has such obvious utilities that it is able to hold its own in our schools, even on the ground of these practical applications alone. That it is indispensable in civil and military engineering; in all branches of natural history; in manufacturing establishments; in upholstery, cabinet-making, cutlery; in the various requirements of the silversmith, jeweller, potter, glass maker, turner, carver, mason, and every manufacturing tradesman—these demands are sufficient to secure the art attention in every grade of school. The educational reformer who does no more than insist that Gandish's "landscape with figures" shall be replaced by a true delineation of natural objects, has a field of useful work before him. And a work no less difficult than useful. For the true and healthy view of art-teaching is even yet very far from having established itself among educated parents. And as for the hard-worked professional and commercial classes, with neither time nor interest for investigating the matter, we cannot expect that they should stoically withstand the temptation of the showy and specious, when the parents of collegiate schoolboys still continue under the same delusion. The Government schools have done, and are doing, excellent work, but "Outis" complains that in their eagerness to have the scheme pay, they are not above offering the false along with the true, and taking money for both.

But "Outis'" aim is at something much more comprehensive than even to oust the impostor, and to substitute for his accomplishment a true and useful art. He goes back to the first principles of all education. He is not content to show that drawing is a useful art; that it can minister to all the other arts in their turn; and that an early deficiency of eye and hand training cannot be supplied by any after teaching. He shows that art is not a mere accomplishment, which we may do without, but which it is better to acquire. It is not true to say that an education which omits art is good as far as it goes, but that if you would be perfect, you must superadd art. "Outis" takes his stand upon the broadest, and only tenable, ground—that of integral training. A one-sided training is not merely an incomplete training; it is dangerous. Leave savage nature alone, and her operations will be harmoniously consistent; but develop in her one element exclusively, and you make her a discordant organism, and, as such, less developed than before. The human mind may be described, speaking roughly, as having two elements—understanding and emotion. We must observe by the way that "Outis'" metaphysics are not so good as his mathematics. He boasts (p. 118) of his emancipation from metaphysical terminology—an inconsistency in one who has so severely censured Mr. Burchett for errors which appear to arise from the attempt to explain perspective without strictly mathematical language. Yet "Outis" talks (p. 96) of wonder and astonishment as "faculties midway between mental and emotional faculties, and common to both"! However, taking his division into "emotional" and "rational" as sufficient for the purpose, we may state his reasoning as being, that all our education goes upon an attempt to train and develop the rational, and that the emotional is left entirely uncared for. Hence an unregulated and insubordinate self-assertion on the part of the emotions. A prurient sensationalism, an itch for novelty, is characteristic of the modern mind. This mere energy without an aim is a restless appetite provoked by the absence of noble and sustained occupation for the emotions. The emotional side of our English character, neglected and untrained in the direction of nature, breaks out in monstrous and unexpected growths. It is not merely that all wholesome enjoyment of beauty is absent; it is that there is a greedy rush after excitement in all directions—in literature, in poetry, in sensational fiction, even in the exaggerative tone of conversation. Even about modern science there is a startling atmosphere unfriendly to philosophy and truth. "Outis" traces this characteristic passion in more than one unlooked-for corner, e.g., in the now favourite game of rehabilitating historical characters. Chemistry is in the same category of public favour as mesmerism, and for the same reason. The rationally consistent relations of chemistry—what makes it a science—are wanting in mesmerism; but the sensational excitement inseparable from the surprises of quick transformations is common to both. We must not pass over, inasmuch as it is illustrative of the completeness of this anonymous author's view, that he traces to the same morbid passion the rapid changeableness of the fashions of female clothing. It is because we have been brought up in insensibility to the beauty and expressiveness of the human form, that we contrive our dress without regard to this beauty, misrepresenting the machinery of motion, hinting joints where no joints are, concealing and cancelling what ought to be expressed. The fashion of dress is arbitrarily decreed; a uniform fashion alike for all. And the rapid changes which are inexorably exacted of all women who would avoid being pointed at for singularity, make dress no less than literature minister to the gratification of the passion for novelty, instead of the taste for beauty and truth to nature. In venturing this extension of his principle, "Outis" judiciously apologizes for his temerity. He is aware that it is safer to assail a nation's religion and politics than its fashions, and that he risks influence by venturing to carry principle into a region where reason is the most jealously excluded. However, he does not dwell, or lay any unnecessary emphasis, upon this exemplification of his argument. He is content to remind us how this want of æsthetic perception in the woman damages her influence for good. If the man is paramount in intellect on the plea of natural endowment, the woman, by the same plea, is paramount in the sphere of the emotions. Here she should lead, and he follow; as indeed she endeavours to do in the article of dress, but on the mistaken tack of a perpetual strain after the new, without any basis in the true.

Leaving the more striking manifestations of this indiscipline of the emotions, in the morbid forms of desire for the unnatural, the supernatural, and the pseudo-miraculous, we may observe the traces of the same cause in the more ordinary conditions of daily life. Commerce, machinery, the daily-enacted history of the globe, which is brought home to our doors at eight o'clock every morning, are constantly presenting a succession of fresh phases to the mind of the modern citizen of the world. His intellectual estimate of this flux of phenomena is as fluid as the series of the phenomena themselves. His conception is the Heraclitean one, of all things as in a constant state of flux and transition. His ever-roving intellectual faculties have no basis, no bond of union; they do not register themselves in emotions. For this intellectual weakness of the age, the remedy is to be found in the early training of the emotions to vent themselves upon their proper objects. The studious contemplation of nature, accompanied by exercise of eye and hand in faithfully delineating her structures, not only with a view to their functions, but with a view to their beauty of form and rhythmic motion, seems precisely to fulfil the conditions of the discipline required. An emotional susceptibility to this eternal result of all—beauty—would give a conviction of one abiding truth. The appetite for novelty would be replaced by the detaining solace of the beauty of truth, and our roving apprehensiveness would grow into close and deep converse with its objects. The dearth of enjoyment that the wealthy feel in the midst of their unceasing chase after the "something still that prompts the eternal sigh," would be supplanted by a perception of how much more there is around us than our intellect and emotions are prepared to entertain.

Nor is art-culture, as is often thought, a culture for the rich alone. While science and literature demand time and leisure, the sense of beauty, and the enjoyments arising from it, may be cultivated alike by all. Thus, while intellectual culture separates classes, æsthetic culture may become a bond of union, a common source of enjoyment which will do more to associate the human family than all the hypocritical flattery from the hustings which insults the working man with transparent falsehoods that he smiles at and despises. Nature has furnished an antidote to the inevitable necessity of hard labour and poverty, in the fields and forests, in the very gardens and parks which the rich cannot create without building up a beauteous landscape for the enjoyment of the poor man:—

When Gilbert White withdrew from literary bustle to his home under Selborne Hanger, he was not contracting, but enlarging his domain of thought and feeling. Here commenced the infinite supply of pabulum for his mental and emotional activities. Here was his deep mine of wealth. But the poorest Selborne peasant, with heart and head awake, had access to the self-same store. Burns, in his poverty, found out that he and his class had in possession "Joys that riches ne'er could buy, and joys the very best." He found also that Edinburgh gentry, for all their public recognition, frank, affable, familiar, as our own public talk to our working class, had no more, but much less, sympathy with him and his pursuits than had the pet ewe he had left at home in Ayrshire.

I met in a lane once, near Warwick, a man who was a letter-carrier, no scholar, but who had been for years in the habit of collecting wild-flowers and plants, plucked hastily in his daily journeys, and duly sorted and arranged every evening. They were not classed scientifically, but they were clearly distinguished nevertheless, and left each its own impression on the mind of the collector. He told me his work was not finished, nor was likely to be for what he saw, that he never wanted amusement, nor cared to frequent public-houses.

We may say he was a man of calm passions, satisfied with gentle excitements. We may say, but we do not know this. Were Buonarroti or Cellini men of calm passions, that they were satisfied with the gentler excitement of fine art? . . . . . Holbein was a man of a full habit, with strong passions, and a neck like a bull, but the pleasure he found in painting could restrain him.

Give the strong passions of these workmen of ours a chance of finding solacing exercise in the pursuit and contemplation of the exhaustless stores of beauty they and we all have access to, awaken and cultivate their emotions as well as their intellects, and do this when they are boys; the beer-house and card-table will decline.

If in the pursuit of his argument "Outis" is chargeable with a dash of quackery in exaggerating the curative virtues of his nostrum, his fault is, after all, a fault on the right side. There is a tendency in the arguments in favour of art-training to narrow the ground, and to plead for it as a useful or even necessary accomplishment. The educational reformer must learn to demand its admission into the curriculum on the much broader ground that training which omits it is imperfect, unwholesome, and sure to issue in morbid conditions of mind, just in proportion to the degree of impulse which it succeeds in giving to the faculties. "Outis'" pleading has this great merit, that it pleads the cause on this broad ground. The introduction of science into schools and universities is far from being yet accomplished, but it is on the way to be accomplished. As science advances towards its establishment in our educational course, the need of an accompanying æsthetic training will become more urgent. The introduction of art as an inferior and subsidiary branch will by no means satisfy its claims. Above all, the Universities must not be let off with the establishment of a stray Professorship of Art as an ornamental appendage, to discourse to young gentlemen on Continental picture-galleries just before the Long Vacation. Art must take its place beside the sciences—a co-ordinate, not a subordinate, place in education and in professional pursuit—as it did in Greece, as it did in imperial Rome, as it did in Italy in the sixteenth century, as it must wherever a certain grade of civilization is reached by a wealthy and flourishing community.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO.*

No persons can write more charming books of travel than naturalists who unite to knowledge of their special subject great general powers of observation, and a fair share of literary skill. Mr. Darwin's voyage in the Beagle is a model of what such a book should be; and Mr Wallace, whose share in supporting Mr Darwin's theory is well known, has written an account of his journeys in the Malay Archipelago which may be fairly put beside it. One circumstance about it is sufficiently significant. Mr. Wallace's journeys were spread over eight years, and more than six years have elapsed since his return, owing to ill-health and to the difficulties of arranging his large collections, amounting to over 125,000 specimens. Now it is obvious that had Mr. Wallace followed the example of book-making travellers, and tumbled out upon us voluminous masses of undigested diary and scientific disquisition, he might have composed a work from which the boldest reader would have shrunk in undisguised dismay. On the scale which some recent travellers have adopted, he would have filled a good-sized bookshelf. As it is, he has contented himself with two volumes of moderate size, of which he modestly says that they are "far too small for the extent of the subjects" treated. Certainly, if it had been his purpose to give us a handbook to the Archipelago, or an exhaustive disquisition upon its natural products, or even a full account of all his own adventures, the space would have been ridiculously small. But all general readers may congratulate themselves on his having aimed at a different mark, and sifted away the chaff before giving us the fine grain of his observations. The result is a vivid picture of tropical life, which may be read with unflagging interest, and a sufficient account of his scientific conclusions to stimulate our appetite without wearying us by detail. In short, we may safely say that we have seldom read a more agreeable book of its kind than Mr. Wallace's account of the Malay Archipelago.

The country is one which in many ways excites and rewards the curiosity of the naturalist. Strange birds and beasts haunt its forests, and innumerable insects creep and fly and buzz and bite the enthusiastic traveller. There, for example, are butterflies the very sight of which caused Mr. Wallace tortures of delight. When he first saw the Ornithoptera Crœsus, his heart began to beat violently, the blood rushed to his head, "and he felt much more like fainting than he has done when in apprehension of immediate death." The excitement produced a headache for the rest of the day. Still more affecting is his account of his first interview with another species, the great bird-winged butterfly, Ornithoptera Poseidon. He speaks with rapture of its golden body, crimson breast, and the velvet black and green of its wings, seven inches across. It is one thing, he says, to see such a beauty in a cabinet, and quite another "to feel it struggling between one's fingers, and to gaze upon its fresh and living beauty, a bright gem shining out amid the silent gloom of a dark and tangled forest. The village of Dobbo held that evening at least one contented man." One half forgets that the Ornithoptera Poseidon would not exactly respond to this almost voluptuous expression of delight. The larger animals are perhaps more adapted to astonish the general public, and to stare it in the Zoological Gardens. There is, for example, the cuscus, an animal which from its portrait seems to resemble a very large and bloated puppy fitted with a prehensile tail of portentous length. There is, on the other hand, a kangaroo whose tail is of degenerate size, the animal, like some would-be athlete, having taken to climbing trees—a calling for which one would have thought it singularly ill adapted—and having consequently fallen off in point of tail without gaining proportionately in claws. Elsewhere there is a frog of unusual liveliness, which is fitted out with enormous webs to its feet, and, on the strength of them, has taken to what it considers to be flying. There are pigs provided with tusks, which, as Mr. Wallace supposes, were once of some use to them, but, owing to the departure of their owners from that line of life in which Providence originally placed them, have grown into ridiculous spirals at the tops of their heads. Then we have the two great ornaments of animal society in these regions, though each of them is confined to a very narrow district. These are the Mias or Orang-utan, who in Mr. Wallace's pictures looks like a heartless caricature of an Irishman, with a railway rug in place of a skin, and whose legs and arms seem to have changed places; and the beautiful birds of paradise, whom Mr. Wallace alone of all Europeans has seen in their native wilds. Of the eighteen different species known he only succeeded in collecting five; but he can hardly speak without ecstacy of the marvellous beauty of these wonderful birds. The capture of the first, he says, repaid him for months of expectation and delay. "I thought," he says, "of the long ages of the past, during which the successive generations of this little creature had run their course—year by year being born, and living and dying amid these dark and gloomy woods, with no intelligent eye to gaze upon their loveliness; to all appearance such a wanton waste of beauty." And he anticipates with sadness the day when civilized man will disturb the nicely-balanced relations upon which the preservation of the species depends, and so cause "the extinction of those very beings whose wonderful structure and beauty he alone is fitted to enjoy." This alone, he argues, is enough to tell us that all living things were not made exclusively for man.

We confess to feeling a little more sympathy with our poor cousins, the Orang-utans. There is a most pathetic account of the childhood of one of Mr. Wallace's pets, whose mother fell a victim to his scientific zeal. The poor little Mias was still unable to feed itself, and though Mr. Wallace gave it rice-water from a bottle with a quill in the cork, and added sugar and cocoa-nut milk, the diet was scarcely nourishing enough for its needs. He nursed it, however, with never-failing patience. He let it play with his beard. He washed its poor little face, and though it made wry faces, it appeared to be grateful. He made it a ladder to play upon, and even rigged up an artificial mother with a buffalo skin, till it nearly choked itself with hair in trying to suck. He got a little monkey to play with it, to its considerable satisfaction, but at last the poor Mias baby was seized with diarrhœa, and after a temporary cure by means of castor oil, fell into an intermittent fever and died, regretted by all who knew it. Mr. Wallace's acquaintance with the rest of its family was unfortunately confined to qualifying them for post-mortem examinations. He obtained nearly twenty specimens—if specimen is not an offensive word to apply to so human a creature—the finest of which was 4 feet 2 inches in height, and 7 feet 8 inches across the extended arms. They seem to be singularly amiable and inoffensive creatures, rather awkward in personal appearance, but quarrelling only with such obnoxious monsters as crocodiles and pythons. According to native accounts, the Mias always gets the best of it on these occasions; and perhaps we may regret that so interesting a creature is likely to be extirpated as soon as the lovely birds of paradise.

In hunting down these and the many other specimens which rewarded his labours, Mr. Wallace was exposed to numerous hardships, and not a little danger. In the island of Aru, the chief home of the birds of paradise, he spent six months. For about six weeks he lived in a remote corner of the island, alone with two or three servants, and a primitive race of good-natured savages. The mosquitoes attacked his feet with peculiar appetite, and he was soon laid up with numerous inflamed ulcers upon those useful members. He was just able to crawl down to the river to bathe. The most gorgeous butterflies looked him in the face with impunity, and fluttered away from his grasp. Birds of paradise held their peculiar "dancing parties" in the trees, elevated their lovely wings, and vibrated their exquisite plumes. His servants shot some specimens for him; but some of these were devoured by the lean and hungry dogs of the natives, which would occasionally make a grab at the gorgeous plumage as soon as the operation of skinning was performed, and tear it to tatters before his eyes. Little marsupial animals, which correspond to rats and mice, ran about all night nibbling whatever appeared to them to be eatable. Four or five species of ants were ready to attack everything that was not defended by a moat of water, and one of them had the faculty of swimming. Huge spiders lurked in boxes and baskets and in the folds of his mosquito curtains, whilst centipedes and multipedes and scorpions were omnipresent. In short, he was constantly on the defensive to protect his various collections against the depredations of all the pests that swarm in the tropics. The natives gathered every evening and held long discussions about him at the tops of their voices. They easily settled that he was a magician, as he had provided fine weather immediately upon his arrival. But the question who he was and what he was doing was more insoluble. The general opinion was, that he would bring to life again all the animals which he had killed and preserved, as soon as he had returned home. It was well known that this had been done by certain mysterious invaders who had killed and carried off some of their ancestors, who were known to be now living in the land beyond the sea. Mr. Wallace was regarded with some suspicion for not having met them, and the more so as he professed to come from a country with so absurd a name as N-Gluug. "My country," said his leading examiner, "is Wanumbai—anybody can say Wanumbai, but N-Glung, who ever heard of such a name?"

The birds of paradise were doubtless an ample reward for the inconveniences of life amongst such primitive people and for the tortures of insects and ulcers. A more serious evil was the real danger of travelling amongst the treacherous currents and reefs of the Archipelago. In one voyage in a native prau his first crew ran away; he lost two more for a month on a desert island; rats ate his sails; his small boat was lost; he was constantly short of food and water, and was several times in danger of being driven out to sea without provisions, owing to the incapacity of his ship to get within less than eight points of the wind; he was thirty-eight days instead of twelve, the ordinary allowance, on his voyage home; and for seventy-eight days he had not a single one of fair wind. Similar troubles to these beset him on various occasions, and he suffered many disappointments from having to discover for himself the best centres for collection, and from frequently reaching them when droughts or bad weather made collection impossible. In spite of these varying troubles, he met on the whole with considerable success, and not the least charm of his book is the general impression which it produces that he was in thoroughly good temper throughout, and always disposed to take the pleasantest view of the men and things with which he was brought in contact.

IDYLS AND EPIGRAMS.*

A SINGULAR proof of the rich variety of treasure preserved to us in the Greek Anthology is to be found in the ease with which, at the appeal of apt translators, it yields itself to the composition of lesser garlands. It was a great feat which Major Macgregor achieved some years since in publishing his complete version of all the Greek Epigrams; but to disguise the fact that his present to the reading public was an embarras de richesses, likely to frighten it by its bulk and completeness, was a harder task, and one that needed all his taste, versatility, and fondness for his subject. Indeed, we suspect that to the smaller and choicer collections by Bland and Merivale, Booth, Burges, and the band of contributors to the Anthologia Polyglotta, must be attributed whatever hold the Greek Anthology has on the estimation of the general reader, or in fact of any reader who cares to see it in other than the original language. They admit of more variety, and of exercise of skill in arrangement. Just as fair hands exercise a seemingly capricious but never unsuccessful choice in making up bouquets from the undigested mass of flowers in the gardener's basket, so a poetic scholar, cognizant of the wealth and variety of blossom he has to cull from, contrives to make up new garlands from the original Anthology, without being indebted to or clashing with any rival or predecessor either as to plan or details. This is eminently true of Mr. Garnett, whose little volume, just published, deserves to have ὀλίγη τε φίλη τε inscribed as its second motto, so entirely does its quality represent the inverse ratio of its quantity. It is composed of some six score epigrams from the Greek, four or five idyls from Moschus and Bion, as many epigrams from Martial, and a score or more of Mr. Garnett's own composition, which last are either entirely original, or suggested by some line or couplet in the Greek Anthology. And of these materials is made up a delightful volume, in which we hesitate which most to admire—the bright, clear perception which has caught and transferred the pith and marrow of the Greek, or the refinement which has been employed in the twofold process of extracting the honey of the Greek, and leaving where it was the impure matter that clung to it, but was unmeet for the purged ears of modern readers.

With sufficient scholarship Mr. Garnett manifestly unites even greater poetic instincts. His imitations and paraphrases display a poet's sympathy with each airy conceit or bright idea of the original, which is a great security for his not erring from its spirit in his process of expansion; and even in his closer translations, while he often breaks up the Greek and re-forms it after his own fashion, he scrupulously renders an account of every point of his model.

* Idylls and Epigrams; chiefly from the Greek Anthology. By Richard Garnett. London: Macmillan & Co. 1869.

But he is not in bondage to the letter. Formal literality, less essential in this field than elsewhere, is held secondary by him to lively presentment of the general sentiment of the Greek. And hence his volume is as well adapted for the English reader, unversed in, but curious about Greek epigrammatic poetry, as for the scholar who, comparing copy with model, can test the faithfulness of spirit with which gems of Greek workmanship have been adapted for English use. Both will be struck, on its perusal, with a conviction that many fine thoughts and bright fancies in our Elizabethan poetry have been borrowed—as, if we continue to cherish the Classics, they will be borrowed again and again—from the ample stores of the Anthologia Græca.

For an excellent sample of Mr. Garnett's skill in recasting the Greek, so as to vary its idiom without losing a particle of its essence, we should cite, but for its length, Meleager's epigram "On a pet Leveret" (cxxvi., compare Jacobs. 120). We commend to those interested in such matters a comparison of the Greek and the English, and turn to a shorter epigram translated from Paulus Silentiarius, as equally suitable to our purpose. The Greek runs:—

> δηθύνει Κλεοφάντις· ὁ δὲ τρίτος ἄρχεται ἤδη
> λύχνος ἀποκλάζειν, ἦκα μαραινόμενος· > αἴθε δὲ καὶ κραδίης πυρσὸς συναπέσβετο λύχνῳ, > μηδέ μ' ὑπ' ἀγρύπνοις δηρὸν ἔκαιε πόθοις·
> ἆ, πόσα τὴν Κυθέρειαν ἐπώμοσεν ἕσπερος ἥξειν·
> ἀλλ' οὔτ' ἀνθρώπων φείδεται οὔτε Θεῶν. (Jacobs. xxviii.)

It is surprising how much force and neatness is imparted to the point of this epigram by Mr. Garnett's happy transposition of the second and third couplets, as well as by other slight deflections from the letter of the Greek:—

> The light I thrice have lit with amorous pains,
> So late she lingers, to the socket wanes:
> Another night to fruitless watch is given;
> Another perjury has scoffed at Heaven.
> Expiring flame, how happy would it be,
> Could my fond passion disappear with thee.

In the version, too, of a four-lined epigram by Agathias (lxxviii. Jacobs. 32), it is scarcely too much to affirm that the copy is more pointed than the original, although the sole liberty taken by the translator consists in rearrangement and concentration. The Greek is found in most selections. The English of Mr. Garnett is:—

> My wreath, my hair, my girdle gratefully
> To Venus, Pallas, Dian offered be:
> By whose concurrent favour I enjoy
> My wedded bliss, my chastity, my boy.

But these are not paraphrases; and Mr. Garnett leaves us in no doubt as to which he regards as his paraphrastic efforts, by marking such with an asterisk in his table of contents. Some of these are singularly lively and real, and introduce a point which none but an ancient Greek would detect on the surface of the Greek, although really it is there. We would instance an epigram by Philip of Thessalonica in which a rheumatic or palsied fisherman dedicates his tackle to his patron-god. This epigram is number xcv. in Mr. Garnett's collection (Jacobs. 22); and we quote the conclusion, in which the offering is summed up with a hint, which the paraphrase converts into an admission, that Peison offers what he can no longer use. These implements, says the Greek verse,

> Πείσων ὁ γριπεὺς Ἑρμῇ πόρεν, ἔντρομος ἤδη, > δεξιτερὴν, πολλοῖς βριθόμενος καμάτοις.

but the English imparts to the sentence a quaint, unexpected ending, known to scholars as a case of παρὰ προσδοκίαν.

> In fine
> All wiles I used unwary fish to hem,
> And all the colds I caught in catching them.

As we have already hinted, this liberty of paraphrase facilitates the realization in English of the bright points of a Greek epigram, without the impurity which often beclouded them. A comparison of the Greek of an epigram of much beauty, by Paulus Silentiarius (G. xlv. Jacobs. ix.), with Mr. Garnett's graceful paraphrase of it, would illustrate this contrast. In the English, as will be seen, there is no want of epigrammatic force; and all that is done is to substitute reticence and delicate allusion for the outspoken language which in the Greek repels, instead of attracting:—

> Thine eyes are dull as though released they were
> But late by Sleep, the mild imprisoner;
> Thy cheeks their hue, their comeliness thy tost
> Tresses, thy limbs their buoyancy have lost:
> The languors or the longings thou dost prove
> Of satisfied or of expectant Love.
> If those depress, a happy man was he.
> If these enkindle, happy will he be.

In fact, nothing strikes us so much, in the perusal of these versions from the Anthology, as the rare tact and skill with which their author brings out the charms, and suppresses the offences, of the Greek. We do not know his equal in throwing into a single line a neat and epigrammatic substitute for an unpresentable allusion. But, whether close or periphrastic, his translations are always animated by a kindred wit, alert to catch the spirit and realize the gist of the original. Witness this graceful and close rendering of an epigram by Marcus Argentarius, which has an interest, beyond its graceful expression, in its noting so early the predilection of the thrush tribe for grape juice, which has given rise to a French proverb:—

> Warble no more thy mellow melody,
> Sweet blackbird, from that knotty oaken tree.
> But where the clambering vine her tendril weaves,
> Come winging to the hospitable eaves;
> And chaunt uncaged, for that, thy race's foe,
> Fosters the bird-lime-bearing mistletoe.
> But this the purple grape, so duly thine,
> For minstrelsy should ne'er be scant of wine.

This one, too, from Antipater of Sidon, is in Mr. Garnett's neatest and happiest style. It is on the classical joke as to the voracity of Hercules:—

> Honey and milk are sacrifice for thee,
> Kind Hermes, inexpensive deity.
> But Hercules demands a sheep a day
> For keeping—as he says—the wolf at bay.
> Imports it much, meek browsers of the sod,
> Whether the beast devours you or the god?

The former of these epigrams, by its very idyllic character, reminds us to refer to the translations from Moschus and Bion, in the beginning of the volume, though it be but to notice that they nicely represent the grace and fine word-painting of those charming artists.

For the most part Mr. Garnett's work is characterized by careful study of the interpretation of his originals. In some cases—e.g., in the meaning of a passage in Antiphilus—we believe he is more to be followed than Major Macgregor, whose version is found in his Fifth Book, epigram 225. It is à propos of a superstitious old crone's resort to a mode of ascertaining the will of heaven which Major Macgregor apparently identifies with the "rocking-stone." Antiphilus describes her as "lifting the prophetic stone, trying it with her hands" (μάντιν ἄειρε λίθον χείρεσι πειράζουσα). Major Macgregor translates

> The stone
> Which at her feet, as Phœbus priestess lay,
> Tried with her hands—first one, then both—to sway.

This force can hardly be in ἄειρε, for which reason we prefer Mr. Garnett's version—

> Eubule, craving Heaven's will to know,
> Would poise a pebble—

which indeed the whole of the context supports. On the other hand, Major Macgregor has hit off the pun or play on the words κόσμος, εὔκοσμον in the twenty-third epigram of Marcus Argentarius more thoroughly than Mr. Garnett in his epigram (No. xxiv.). One or two other minor points of interprotation we would suggest for reconsideration. In the hundredth epigram, one by Mnasalcas, the force of λυγρὰ ξείνια in the fourth verse seems unrepresented. The epigram, in this version, runs—

> The crooked bow and arrow-spending case
> Promachus hangs up in this holy place,
> Phœbus, to thee. The shafts remain apart,
> For each is buried in a foeman's heart.

Might not the last verse run?—

> Dire guest-gifts, lodging in the foeman's heart.

In the same page, doubting whether ταῖς λιβάσιν καύσαις can refer to "rain," we should prefer "joying in the fountain's spray" to "leaping lover of the rain," although the latter, per se, would be applicable enough to the frog. And, again, at the close of a very prettily turned epigram of Paulus Silentiarius (xlvii.), Mr. Garnett, unless he reads in the last line ἐστὶ γὰρ ὁρκαπάτης, whereas all the texts we have seen have ἐστὶ γὰρ ὁρκαπάται, is wrong in attributing the last line to the male lover rather than the female. His version runs—

> Why dost thou weep? Lest thou shouldst leave me, dear.
> It was a lie, but one I loved to hear.

We submit that it should be so altered as to continue Eumenis or Lais's speech to the end of the epigram; as thus, perhaps, for want of aught better:—

> Why dost thus weep? Lest thou shouldst leave me, dear;
> For men deceivers ever were, I fear.

It is but just, however, after venturing these emendations, to express our sense of the remarkable accuracy of interpretation which characterizes the great mass of these translations, an accuracy often as much proved by a paraphrase that recognises some nicety of sense as if resort had been had to the strictest literality.

It is not surprising that one whose mind is so imbued with the spirit of the Greek epigrams should transfer some flavour of them, as well as something of their outward form, to his own experiments in the same vein. And it might occur to some, on reading the neat and graceful translation of Sannazaro's charming epigram, "Quæritat huc illuc raptum," &c. (given in p. 13), by the author's father (more famous as a philologist than an epigrammatist), that there is hereditary predisposition in this case, suggesting topics which familiarity with the Anthology renders it easy to mould into shape. At any rate Mr. Garnett's own epigrams, whether original, or suggested (as in the case of Nos. xiii. xliv. xlix. lxxi. and one or two others) by some lines or couplets in the Anthology, have very much the ring of the Greek, and in point of shape and fashion "favour" the fountain of all epigrams. In the translations it is not easy to decide how far their author is a humourist because he happens to turn in a lively style, such as is adopted in Ep. cxxxv. a jeu d'esprit, the credit of which belongs chiefly to Leonidas of Alexandria. But in the "Dresden Venuses," p. 23, we discover the discipline of long converse with the Greek Anthology influencing the graceful treatment of a comparison purely original; and in one or two others—e.g., xli., "Simplicity is best": lvii., a sort of Divorce Court epigram; and cxliv., "Time and the poet"—traces of a humour capable of as good things in this line as the best of contemporary wit. Here is another of these, "the Traveller and the Gorilla":—

> The gift by Nature boon supplied
> This pair unequally divide;
> The traveller's tale is far from small,
> The monkey has no tail at all;

an epigram in form and point as worthy of the name as that of Leonidas just referred to:—

> Menodotis's portrait here is kept;
> Most odd it is > How very like to all the world, except > Menodotis.

Our favourite among the "suggested" epigrams is "A Cupid carved on a Shell," for which an anonymous epigram in the Ninth Book of the Anthologia Palatina gave the cue. It is in the same delightful vein as what may be called the "gem" epigrams lxix. lxx., and has a very Greek-ish manner and finish. Another amusing epigram, with the author's name, R. Garnett, attached to it, forms what we count as his second "proem"—an invocation to all the gods to smile on the epigrammatist, and give him, as the fairies are wont to do at the christenings they honour, each their own special boon. This epigram, an excellent substitute for an introduction, ends:—

> And last, without which all were not enough,
> Vouchsafe, most potent Æolus, a puff.

We must end our remarks on his pleasant book with a reference to this introductory couplet, and assure him that, if he will but in his next edition append a table of references to the Greek, and so remove the only retarding influence to a prosperous voyage, his path will be so clear to success as to render the invocation of any number of Æoluses supererogatory.

PROFESSOR BONAMY PRICE'S LECTURES.*

PROFESSOR BONAMY PRICE has done well to republish his Inaugural Lecture as one of his Six Lectures on Currency. It contains a protest against a prevalent misconception as to the province of political economy, which cannot be repeated too often. This misconception is rarely expressed in words, but it maintains a tight and persistent grasp on the thoughts of writers and speakers on economical subjects. "They never seem quite able to escape the impression that political economy is a branch of politics." They assume that the political economist is simply the politician dealing with economy, and, in consequence of this, they assume further that whenever the politician has arrived at a definite economical conclusion, he has nothing to do but to carry it out in practice as soon as opportunity offers. It is only by the prevalence of this assumption that we can explain the amount of passion which often finds its way into economical controversies. Its presence there is not attributable to the mere heat of debate or to that desire of victory for victory's sake from which scientific writers are no more exempt than their neighbours. This will not explain the diffusion of the excitement beyond the professors of the science. Agricultural chemists may grow warm over the comparative merits of this or that manure, but the agricultural public feels no interest in the dispute beyond a placid desire to ascertain which will best suit particular classes of soil. Compare this attitude of mind with that which the public—agricultural and non-agricultural alike—consistently maintains on the subject of large or small farming. Observe the triumph with which writers of one school claim to have demonstrated that the gross production of the country is increased by one or the other system, and the despairing energy with which their opponents set themselves to disprove the alleged result. To what is this due but to the unconscious belief that when once the politician has ascertained what political economy has to tell him as to the fact, the question is finally decided. If it were equally taken for granted that the adoption of a particular manure would follow inevitably upon its being proved to make the soil more fertile than any other, those persons who believed that its use would be injurious to health would be equally anxious to disprove its fertilizing efficacy. They are not thus anxious because they know that in this case the increase of production will not be the only element taken into account. If the limits of political economy were defined with as much clearness as those of agricultural chemistry, this confusion would be at once removed. It would then be seen that, in the words of Professor Price, the suggestions of political economy are the suggestions "of a single department only. Its conclusions are not final, nor supreme. They may be over-ridden, modified, or rejected at the dictation of a yet more universal science, by the order of still wider and higher knowledge." It would be, for example, the proper function of an economist to estimate the effects of the law which enjoins the equal division of his land amongst the children of a deceased father on the cultivation of the land, and on the productiveness of agricultural industry in France—

> It might be his office to submit to the legislator that such a law of inheritance sentences France to small properties, to their frequent sale and re-sale, to insufficiency of capital for successful cultivation, to great difficulties of drainage and manuring, and the like; and on economical grounds, as an expert called in to communicate his professional knowledge, he would be entitled to propose the substitution of the free liberty of testation for the iron rule of equal division which governs inheritance in France. But what answer would he, as an economist, have for the Frenchman who replied that the law of equal division amongst children was implanted in the human heart by the Creator, and that it was a thousand times better not to offend against a moral feeling than to grow richer by its violation? He would be silenced, and he would have no ground for complaint; for his authority does not extend over the whole of human life. The teachings of his science have to be combined with the injunctions of other sciences, and it is the political man alone, the statesman, who is authorized to measure and compare the diverse recommendations of the several departments of knowledge. It rests with him to say what is the final resultant which comes out from the combination of all the considerations involved. And if the Frenchman's feeling about the law of nature to bequeath property equally among children is to be refuted, the refutation must be made by the philosophical politician.

It is not necessary that the politician and the political economist should never be united in the same man. All that is required is that the two characters should be kept distinct. As it is, the influence derived from the one is too often used to promote the objects of the other. Political feeling is found > intruding itself into the study of economical facts, imparting to them a bias from without, colouring the lessons which they teach, and applying them to political ends, to objects quite distinct from the purposes of political economy; and what is the inevitable effect of such a spectacle on the public mind? The political feeling is plainly discerned, even when the economist himself is unconscious of its influence. It is inferred that political economy is brought in to promote politics. The arrangements of the facts, the emphasis given to their several elements, the conclusions they are described as yielding, are suspected, and the final result is the feeling, which meets us on every side, of half respect for, half distrust of, political economy. The public does not bow down to the assertions of the economist as it submits to the utterances of a physician or a barrister. The true dignity of the science is defaced.

The remainder of the Inaugural Lecture deals with a second obstacle to which political economy is exposed. "In other sciences a truth once won is won for ever"; in political economy positions which "attain the quality of demonstration" are "denied or ignored as readily as if they were the hypothesis of an empiric." . . . "The error they were supposed to have dispelled resumes its possession of the public mind, just as if it were the infallible suggestion of instinct." The revived advocacy of protection and of an inconvertible currency in the United States are obvious instances of this truth, but Professor Price finds an equally pertinent illustration in the history of the "Mercantile Theory." The doctrine that wealth consists solely of money, or of the precious metals which are the raw material of money, "has taken its place among the barbarous ideas of the ages of darkness." "Tell a great merchant or banker of the City that he believes in the mercantile theory, and he will resent the imputation as an affront to his understanding." This statement forms a natural introduction to the special subject of Professor Price's remaining lectures. He asserts that the popular doctrine of currency is nothing more than the mercantile theory under a fresh disguise. "It may be consigned by philosophers to the limbo of nursery toys, but it lives on all the same, and is master of the mind of the City":—

> The doctrine that gold is wealth—the doctrine which Mr. Mill paints as an absurdity so palpable that the present age regards it as incredible, as a crude fancy of childhood—breathes in every line of the City articles of all our daily newspapers. Traders are exhorted to carry on their operations with confidence, and to send their orders boldly to China and Japan, for gold is coming in, and discount is sure to be low. But if Englishmen are found to be buying food and clothing and raw materials from abroad, and are paying for them in gold, the merchants are warned to prepare for a coming storm: panic is at hand, and a crisis imminent, for the foreigner is getting hold of the staff of life, and England is losing it. It is not one paper or two which is saying all this, it is all. Every City article is penetrated through and through with the belief that the importation of gold is a good thing, and its exportation a bad thing. The same thought, the same language, pervades every counting-house, and is heard on every exchange. The unhappy man who should say aloud that he was glad to see gold leaving England, would be gazed upon as a Rip Van Winkle, who had reappeared from the dead.

Professor Price proceeds, in the following lectures, to subject the phenomena of currency to an analysis of remarkable stringency. Whether his readers agree or disagree with his conclusions, they must one and all be struck with the luminous completeness of his exposition. There is never any uncertainty as to his meaning, nor any room for suspicion that he has consciously shrunk from testing a weak place in his system. In his hands currency loses all the obscurity which has hitherto surrounded it, and becomes intelligible, and even attractive. The secret of this agreeable revolution is told in a sentence. "The perplexity, the confusion, the inextricable tangle which have so long and so cruelly beset currency have sprung up from one great tap-root, the perverse importance attached to the quantities used of coin and bank-notes." There is the key-note of Professor Price's symphony, and it recurs again and again in every combination. The importance attached to the quantities used of coin and bank-notes is a "perverse importance." Substitute, he says, for this idea the true one—that for the sovereign and the bank-note, "as for all goods," the sole point of importance is the goodness of their quality —and the complications of currency flee away. Whether the amount of gold in the Bank cellar be small or large, whether the notes in circulation be few or many, is a matter of infinitely little moment, provided "that the sovereign is made of pure metal and has full weight, and that the bank-note will be paid on demand." Take care of the quality, says Professor Price, and the quantity will take care of itself. The public, he argues, has never any difficulty in getting as many of these tools as it wants and can pay for, and no legislation will make it use more of them than it wants. Anything that the State can do in the way of regulating the quantity of gold or paper in circulation is therefore, in his view, merely a work of supererogation. The only sphere in which the State can do either good or harm is that which concerns their qualities. It can take care that the sovereign shall be worth twenty shillings, and that the bank-note shall be convertible at par, and that is all. Up to that point its intervention is useful, and, in most cases, necessary; beyond that point it is needless, and at the same time innocuous. Thus, according to Professor Price's own conception, his main work is the demolition of all the legendary superstructure which has grown up round these simple instruments of exchange. He is the Cornewall Lewis of currency, and his book might almost be called "An Inquiry into the Credibility of City Articles."

In the lecture on "Metallic Currency" Professor Price puts the question, Can a country have too much gold? Yes, he answers, very easily. Gold is a tool, and, like other tools, it has to be paid for. It follows that needlessly to multiply tools is simply to lock up so much capital. A gardener must have a spade, or he will not be able to do his work; but, if he buys a dozen spades at once, he will have no return for the greater portion of his money until such time as the spades first taken into use come to wear out. It is so in principle with sovereigns. Gold-mining "is a very expensive affair; a great deal of timber and tools and gunpowder and wages is consumed in the business, and the country which gets the gold has to pay for all these things." Therefore, he contends, the question about the quantity of gold resolves itself into this—"How much gold does a country require, so as to make it worth its while to buy and pay for it with other commodities?" This depends on the number and amount of sales in which gold is employed. In other words, "the question of the distribution of the precious metals is, at bottom, a question of the commercial habits of different countries":—

A nation is not the poorer for possessing little gold, nor the richer for having much; and I earnestly beg of you to keep this truth in mind. The precious metals flow to countries of low civilization, of great political insecurity, which hoard money, and trade for cash; whilst they find small resting-place in lands of high commercial development, where property is safe, and the recovery of debts easy, and the owners of goods are willing to part with them for cheques and bills and other processes of deferred payment. There is probably no country in the world which, in comparison of the extent of its business, wants and uses so little of the precious metals as England.

In England, as Professor Price puts it in another place, gold is mainly wanted for "change"; and, when there is more gold than can be used for this purpose, it has to be idle, or to be exported to countries in which it is in more request. The number of bank-notes in circulation is determined by similar considerations. Paper is for many purposes a more convenient instrument than gold, and in so far as it is so bank-notes will find a public willing to use them. They must be of the right quality, of course—that is, they must be really convertible—because, if this condition is wanting, they will no more do their proper work than a bag of copper-gilt sovereigns would do the work of gold. But, given this, they will pass from hand to hand in numbers exactly proportionate to the transactions in which they are used. If more are issued than are wanted, they immediately find their way to the bank again. For a bank-note is nothing more than a banker's acknowledgment of a debt due by him to the public. Custom and convenience have created a special use for these acknowledgments. In Scotland, where one-pound notes are issued, they largely take the place of sovereigns; in England they occupy an intermediate position of their own. But in both countries they are merely another form of change; consequently the demand for them is regulated, as in the case of gold, by the number of purchases in which change is required. Thus a man living in London will use fewer notes than a man living in the country, and coming up to London for a month in the season. Why? Because the former pays his bills by cheques, while the latter, having only a country banker, brings up with him a store of bank-notes to pay for his London purchases. But, supposing the journey to London is put off at the last moment, the notes drawn out for the purpose are sent back to the country banker. Nothing that the Bank of England can do in the way of inflation will induce the man who pays his country bills by cheques to keep any stock of them in his house.

We have only touched on the cardinal features of Professor Price's theory, but the collateral discussions introduced into these lectures will be found equally interesting. In particular, the lecture entitled "What is a Bank?" is really a remarkable piece of exposition. The complicated system of English banking is reduced to first principles, and drawn out like a map before the reader.

PHINEAS FINN.*

REFLECTING on Mr. Disraeli's career, it would be rash to affirm that the professions of novelist and politician are incompatible. Mr. Disraeli, it is true, is like Juvenal's Greek. No trade comes amiss to him; no tour de force is too perilous or too extravagant for his courage and ingenuity. But Mr. Trollope is a steady-going, prosaic Englishman, and with the virtues possesses something of the ponderosity of that typically immobile character. On those who read to be startled, his performances will fall rather flat after those of the older novelist. He can go through a certain number of time-honoured tricks with variations, in the most unexceptionable manner; but he is not versatile and he is not brilliant, at least with the brilliancy and versatility of Mr. Disraeli. Nobody can draw a clergyman better, and he is perhaps the most trustworthy male lecturer living on the mental anatomy of young ladies. For these are subjects that seem to suit him exactly. For walking in dangerous places caution is more serviceable than agility. In dealing with women and with the Church an over-lively fancy is likely to become a snare. In either case a little wickedness and a little cynicism are expected of the novelist, but both must be duly watered with veneration and sentiment. If the infusion is too strong, he loses caste; if it is too weak, he loses readers. The proprieties must be observed, rust cælum; and yet the most rigid sticklers for them do so love a little naughtiness. It is a great triumph to be able to gratify their tastes without incurring their displeasure; and that triumph has certainly been won by Mr. Trollope. From time to time his men have been wicked, but the wickedness has never been very unseemly. Once or twice a lady has been on the point of transgression, but something has always intervened to prevent the catastrophe; and though he has been quietly laughing at the parson for any number of years, he has never yet laughed at him in a manner unworthy of the most exemplary church-goer.

* Phineas Finn; or the Irish Member. By Anthony Trollope. 2 vols. London: Virtue & Co. 1869.

But the light castigation, coupled with an implied reverence for their order, which is so admirably in place where women or the clergy are concerned, is not the style of treatment of all others calculated to create an impression when applied to a contemporary statesman. Epigrams levelled at the sex or the cloth cannot be too carefully toned down. It is dangerous to laugh outright at the imbecility of a bishop, the follies of a fashionable woman, or the pretentious silliness of a young curate. In the one case the writer is set down by a great many good people as an unbeliever; in the other, as a misogynist. His book is damned if he does not contrive to get some fun out of his subject; but it will be excluded from every decent household if he does not keep his fun under proper control. With regard to our statesmen it is different. From time immemorial a very considerable latitude has been permitted in this direction. Junius and Swift have been the most popular of our political writers. You may caricature to your heart's content; you may misrepresent, abuse, and insinuate, and the respectable will listen to you as eagerly as the ill-regulated. You are not generally supposed to be a person of peculiarly diabolical tendencies if you indulge in the wildest invective against Mr. Gladstone. You may call Mr. Bright Cleon, and Mr. Disraeli Zamiel, and you need add no qualifying clause whatsoever. In point of fact, if you throw mud at them at all, you had better throw it vigorously, or nobody will notice you. And if you can manage to bring a little personality in, you will show that you know your business as well as Artemus Ward's American journalist did, who wrote a series of letters in his paper ridiculing the appearance of a rival editor's sister, who had a cast in her eye. In one instance Mr. Trollope has availed himself pretty freely of the privileges accorded to a novelist in this direction, but for the most part he discourses of his political puppets with the same subdued chivalry and reverence with which he has for years recorded the sayings and doings of Church dignitaries and young ladies afflicted with the tender passion. Possibly the reason why he has allowed himself more freedom of speech than usual in his attack upon the Right Honourable President of the Board of Trade is to be found in the estimate—in some particulars the curiously inaccurate estimate—which he has formed of that gentleman's character. "He was gifted," says Mr Trollope, in introducing his victim to us at a private dinner-party, "with a moral skin of great thickness. Nothing said against him pained him; no attacks wounded him; no raillery touched him in the least. There was not a sore spot about him, and probably his first thought, on waking every morning, told him that he at least was totus teres atque rotundus." If this is the case, though the fact is certainly new to us, he is not likely to be very angry with Mr. Trollope for the liberties taken with him. If his skin is really that of a rhinoceros, Mr. Trollope may of course belabour him till Doomsday, and never raise a wheal. Otherwise Mr. Bright might have taken it in bad part that his after-dinner conversations and habits should be sketched, whether from life or from imagination, for the amusement of the readers of the St. Paul's Magazine. For Mr. Trollope is cruelly careful that the veriest child shall not fail to recognise his pet aversion under the alias he has given him. With historical and needlessly elaborate minuteness he describes his robustness, age, hair, height, gait, complexion, eyes, nose, lips, coat, trowsers, and waistcoat. "He always wore a black swallow-tail coat, black trowsers, and black silk waistcoat. In the house at least he was always so dressed, and at dinner-tables. What difference there might be in his costume, when at home at Staleybridge, few of those who saw him in London had the means of knowing." Our sympathies are artfully alienated from him by the assertion that he is slow to perceive a joke. His heaviness is portentous, and his rudeness incredible. He is dictatorial to his host, quarrelsome and overbearing to his brother guests, and sermonizes persistently after dinner. When he is gone, a Cabinet Minister hazards the reflection that in the bosom of his family he is likely to be oppressive, and the hero of the story fully concurs in it:—

His fault is not arrogance, so much as ignorance that there is, or should be, a difference between public and private life. In the House of Commons a man in Mr. Turnbull's position must speak with dictatorial assurance. He is always addressing, not the House only, but the country at large, and the country will not believe in him unless he believe in himself. But he forgets that he is not always addressing the country at large. I wonder what sort of a time Mrs. Turnbull and the little Turnbulls have of it?

Phineas, as he went home, made up his mind that Mrs. Turnbull and the little Turnbulls must probably have a bad time of it.

By the side of this bold effort of a master's hand the portraits of the other Parliamentary leaders are inoffensive and colourless. Very little of this peculiar kind of banter is expended upon any of them. They speak and act for the most part like the great vague divinities that they are to most of us, and, if once and again we are favoured with any of their tricks of speech or personal foibles, it is manifest that their chronicler is not sneering, but merely detailing eccentricities which he thinks it may be interesting to his readers to be made acquainted with. It is only the contemplation of Mr. Bright that acts upon Mr. Trollope as a red rag upon a bull. He fights neither with small nor great, but only with Mr. Bright. He puts dull speeches in his mouth—surely an unpardonable solecism; he represents him invariably as solemnly arrogant and devilishly cunning, and introduces an amiable lady sighing for his death:—

"My own impression is that nothing would save the country so effectually at the present moment as the removal of Mr. Turnbull to a higher and a better sphere."
"Let us say the House of Lords," said Phineas.
"God forbid!" said Lady Laura.

Mr. Bright and his brother statesmen are, of course, only the accessories to the story. Phineas Finn, unlike most of Mr. Trollope's works, is a novel with a hero, the impecunious son of a country doctor, who gets into Parliament at five-and-twenty, is in the Ministry a year or two afterwards, fights a duel, rides an unmanageable horse, is fallen in love with three or four times by ladies of rank, saves a Cabinet Minister from the hands of garotters, is as strong as a coal-heaver, and as handsome as Apollo. Besides all this, he gives up a place of two thousand a year, and blights his prospects for ever, by a punctilious conscientiousness. He falls in love with the most charming facility, and is proposed to by a lady of great beauty and enormous fortune, who has lately refused the Duke of Omnium. Though ambitious, and with the certainty of a brilliant career before him in the profession which he prefers to all others, he leaves London at the call of duty, at the end of the novel, to settle down in contented obscurity at Cork with a poor Irish girl whose only merit is that she is more deeply in love with him than the rest of her sex. His personal adventures are in many respects entertaining, and his love complications, like most love complications invented by Mr. Trollope, are rather above than below the average, being narrated with that soberness of fancy, coupled with a copious variety of detail, which so often gives an air of reality to the most ordinary creations. Nobody has relied more persistently upon these two sources of attraction than Mr. Trollope has done, and it may be questioned whether any writer in any age has known how to make a more effective use of them. Put a character in plenty of situations, and it will be very strange if he is not likeable in one or two of them. Mr. Trollope thoroughly understands the art of putting his characters through their paces. If you don't care much for any of his men or women for a time, you may generally hurry on with the conviction that you will see something or other to like in them directly. Unfortunately the converse is too often true. Approval fades into dislike, and interest into tedium. If the highest aim of the novelist were to report of men and things as seen through the medium of a colourless imagination, it would be the highest praise that could be given to a writer to say that his characters seldom pleased or repelled you very much, but that they were not the kind of people it would be very desirable to be acquainted with; for the same reflection would apply to a vast majority of the people you meet in real life. Only, unfortunately, we read a novel simply to be amused, while we associate with our fellows for a variety of other purposes. From a man of Mr. Trollope's powers we expect something more than the dexterous catching of a likeness. The periodic photographic school of novel-writing has its advantages. When once a tolerable proficiency is acquired, stories may be multiplied with amazing rapidity, none of them much better or worse than its predecessors. Provided each creature is tolerably like a human being, and has a different set of features from its companions, very little seems to be cared for grouping or the effects of light and shade. The last thing in the world apparently that is aimed at is the working out of a simple and harmonious whole. The multiplication of figures is the chief thing, and the system of continuing the story indefinitely to a certain extent baffles criticism. You can never say that the whole displeases you, because you can never be sure that you have got the whole. If the plan is pushed much further, clever novels bid fair to become as ephemeral as the daily papers. Several of Mr. Trollope's novels have risen beyond the level of Phineas Finn, especially one or two in which the clergymen and young ladies predominate. But, as regards the great mass of his stories, few of his admirers have any definite recollection of any number of them. If Phineas Finn is remembered a few years hence, distinctly from the other tales in which many of its characters appear, it will owe its vitality to its political sketches, which are now comparatively devoid of interest, while the recollection of the events recorded is fresh and the excitement gone. The future historian may refer to it to discover what was the material of which Mr. Bright's waistcoats were made, and what was the bearing of the other Liberal leaders of the time in society; but the deplorable fact that it does not contain a single specimen of the parson of the period will very likely prevent its being read by the unprofessional dabblers in antiquities, who will betake themselves to Mr. Trollope's novels principally for the purpose of unearthing that extinct and interesting national curiosity.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

AMONG the most interesting American publications are the periodical Reports of the officers at the head of the great Financial Departments, which differ in many important respects from similar documents in this country, and owe their principal value to these peculiar characteristics. The exclusion of the Executive Departments from that direct relation with the Legislature which exists universally in the constitutional Governments of Europe obliges the administration to adopt a different mode of communicating its views and enforcing the results of its experience; and the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and his chief subordinates generally contain, not merely the dry statistics and detailed practical information to be found in our own departmental blue-books, but also an exposition of the views and policy of the department which fulfils, more or less imperfectly, the purpose of the annual Budget speech under a Parliamentary Government. It is worthy of remark that the officials, almost without exception, take a position perfectly independent, not only of the Legislature, but even of the President; and that their Reports are not less distinctly opposed to the recent Message in favour of virtual repudiation than to the extreme protective policy and erratic financial legislation of Congress. This fact is probably ascribable, not to the original selection of men of sound economical views for these situations, but to that practical good sense and correct judgment which office seems generally to develop in American statesmen, even when their language, while filling what we should consider positions of almost equally grave responsibility in the Senate or the House, has been most extreme and unwise. And indeed the practical consequences of the economic system lately pursued in America, as they force themselves upon the attention of the chiefs of the Revenue Departments, can hardly fail to bring home to the mind of an able and intelligent administrator a strong conviction of its unsoundness and impolicy. Two Reports are now before us—that of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue * and that of the Comptroller of the Currency.† Both take a sound economical view of the situation of the country; neither appears to be the work of a trained and scientific economist. Facts, not principles, have satisfied them of the importance of those economic laws which Congress persistently ignores and defies. The Commissioner of the Revenue considers in detail the influence of the legislation of the last six years on the condition of the people, and brings out a series of practical results sufficient, one would think, to confute the subtlest advocate of Protection, and to surprise even the staunchest believer in Free Trade. The direct and immediate injuries inflicted on the consumer and on the producer, on the people individually and on the State, by the ultra-protective tariff of the Radical party, are greater and more obvious than we should have ventured to anticipate. It is proved beyond doubt that since the war, despite a large increase in particular classes of manufactures, despite the exorbitant bounties granted to "native industry," industry is worse off than it was in 1860 or before. The rate of wages has risen by 60 per cent., the chief part of which of course represents the depreciation of the currency; but all the commodities which the labourer has to purchase having risen in a greater ratio, the increase in his nominal earnings covers a real decrease in his practical remuneration. The man whose week's earnings used to purchase a barrel of flour now receives a dollar where he formerly got sixty cents; but at the end of the week he finds himself only able to purchase five-sixths of a barrel. The comparison is carried out through a long series of articles of large consumption. House-rent has risen as much as wages. The cost of a single man's board, in working-class boarding-houses, has risen more. A table comparing the earnings of families of various sizes with their expenditure on rent and daily necessaries shows, as might have been expected, that married men and fathers of families are the chief sufferers. The Report concludes that, on the whole, the unmarried skilled artisan is not much worse off than he was ten years ago. But a small family which in 1859 would have had a surplus of six or seven dollars weekly to pay for clothing, schooling, and luxuries, has now but half a dollar or a dollar, and the price of clothing and everything else has so increased that a surplus of ten or twelve dollars would not purchase more than the six or seven used to do. From the particular influence of recent financial policy on the working class, the Report proceeds to consider its general influence on production and commerce; and establishes, by crucial and various examples, two unquestionable facts, absolutely condemnatory of the measures that have brought them about. In the first place, the indiscriminate protection of all manufactures involves the taxation of all; for the finished product of one is the material of the other. The protection given to the lumberer has raised the price of timber to a degree which causes all the trades dependent on timber—ship-building, for example—to languish, and drives them to other countries where no such tax is levied on their raw material. The same result is traced in other cases. The second fact is, that American prices have been so enhanced as to drive the foreign customer to other markets, to curtail most seriously the export trade of the States, and to oblige them to pay for their foreign luxuries either in specie or in depreciated bonds. And finally it is shown that the very extravagance of the tariff defeats its own object, both as regards revenue and protection, by encouraging an enormous amount of smuggling. The quantity of cigars entered at the Custom-house has fallen in eight years from 800,000,000 to 30,000,000, under the influence of a duty of 150 per cent.; yet foreign cigars are used as largely as ever. The inevitable conclusion is, that some 700,000,000 must be smuggled in one way or another. Opium is taxed 100 per cent.; and opium, we are told, is sold at a lower price in currency than its market price, duty paid, in gold. That is, opium worth 100 dollars in gold, and paying a duty of 100 dollars also in gold, is sold for less than 200 dollars in currency, or 144 dollars in gold. Information like this, constantly repeated, can hardly fail at last to impress an American public. The sound advice of the Commissioner will not be the less acceptable to his countrymen because it is seasoned with a curious sneer at England, whose Free-trade policy he ascribes, "not to philosophic theory, but to enlightened selfishness." Why, who ever ascribed it to anything else? We adopted Free-trade because we believed it best for our own interest in particular, and for that of every nation in general; and we recommend it to others on the ground that it would advance their interests also—a doctrine which the Report appears distinctly to endorse. The Comptroller of the Currency has to deal with a more limited and less generally interesting topic, but the light thrown by his Report upon the working of an inconvertible paper money, and particularly on its incidental tendency to discourage and embarrass regular and legitimate trade, and foster an irregular and nationally unprofitable speculation, is in its way almost equally valuable. It also affords, indirectly, some curious hints regarding the peculiarities of the American banking system. Both Reports might be used with great effect as texts for a series of lectures on the various economical questions involved, and would serve as a mine of effective practical illustrations for the writers of Treatises on Political Economy.

A Thousand Miles' Walk across South America * relates the experiences of a young American gentleman who, with forty-five dollars in his pocket, a vigorous frame, and an ardent love of travel, set out from Massachusetts to travel in the Argentine territory and across the Andes. He shared of course the life and hardships of the rude races among whom he was thrown; travelled across the pampas with a Guacho caravan, faring as his comrades fared, or somewhat worse than they, and enduring not a little harsh treatment and some actual danger at their hands; and, finally, having landed at Buenos Ayres, re-embarked at Valparaiso, after crossing the entire continent of South America. He tells his story in a lively style, and, without concealing his toils and sufferings, or his honest pride in his achievement, is equally free from the boastful and the whining tone into one or both of which too many travellers, in describing their hardships, are prone to fall. It is characteristic in more than one respect of American manners and life that the adventurer, when he started on his perilous journey, was only seventeen years of age. Many English lads of seventeen might be found to attempt such an adventure, if any English parent or guardian could be induced or compelled to permit it.

Mexico and the United States †, though published in 1869, was evidently written during the continuance of the war between the Imperial Government, supported by the French troops, and the Republicans who adhered to Juarez. The direct story of the struggle, which is at best very imperfectly and incoherently given, and overlaid with exaggerated epithet and pointless comment, is brought down only to the period when the self-styled President was a fugitive, and his "army" consisted of a few scattered gangs of banditti. The tone and manner of the work, and the disproportionate space devoted to personal matters, irresistibly suggest the belief that it has been written at the instigation and in the interests of the two men on whose history and virtues it dilates at monstrous length—the Republican leader, and his representative at Washington, Señor Romero. Nearly half the volume is occupied with a biographical panegyric of these two persons, one of whom is known to the world only by the persistency with which he kept his name before the American public in connexion with proposals for loans to a fugitive "Government"; while the other has secured to himself, among scores of similar personages distinguished in the bloody annals of Central American revolution, an exceptional immortality of infamy by his share in the cruel fate of a prince whose chivalrous character had won the admiration and sympathy of Christendom. No part of the work bears the stamp of independent opinion or impartial judgment; from the first page to the last it breathes the "inspiration" of the Mexican Embassy at Washington.

The Story of a Trooper ‡ relates the experiences of a cavalry soldier in the army of the Potomac under the command of M'Clellan, and bears emphatic testimony to the corruption, rottenness, and mismanagement which pervaded the organization of that branch of the service. The North was at the outset subject to great disadvantage in regard to this arm, from the fact that the youth of the North-eastern States are altogether unaccustomed to horseback exercise, while nearly every Southerner is an accomplished horseman. But for Germans and Irishmen, the material for cavalry would hardly have existed. It required all that strict discipline, good officers, and conscientious organization could do to provide a cavalry capable of meeting the Southerners in the field. Yet, while the horsemen of the Virginian army were led by one of the most distinguished cavalry officers in history, supported by some of the best men in the South, the Federal Government is alleged to have given commissions to colonels who had never mounted on horseback, and to captains who had never held a sabre, and to have winked at the grossest waste, disorganization, and peculation in this branch of the service. It is not strange that such troops were utterly unable to check the daring raids of Stuart, or the dashing guerilla exploits of Mosby; or that, as the author avers, M'Clellan should have been afraid to trust his cavalry in action, lest it should be "gobbled up" by the regiments of Wade Hampton and Fitzhugh Lee. The Trooper does not bring his narrative further down than the final defeat of M'Clellan on the Chickahominy; and fails, therefore, to do full justice to a force which, under Sheridan, distinguished itself by the terrible havoc it inflicted on the enemy, and came off not discreditably in more than one actual engagement.

The Shakspeare Treasury * is another of the many volumes of extracts from the works of the great dramatist which it gives enthusiastic authors pleasure to write, and which no one who has the opportunity to read and the capacity to appreciate an entire drama will ever dream of perusing. The extracts are arranged under a variety of headings, and profess to illustrate the genius and knowledge of Shakspeare in every department of human thought, except only in his own especial art; to exhibit him as the philosopher, the preacher, the advocate of woman's rights, the strategist—anything and everything but the dramatic poet.

Recollections of the West † is the title of a not uninteresting collection of personal experiences in the Valley of the Mississippi and elsewhere some twenty years ago—a misnomer in part, as several chapters relate to the writer's adventures in Maryland, where he practised as a village lawyer. Like many other Americans, he appears to have sought his fortune in various directions and in all parts of the Union; now in Florida, now in Louisiana, now in Baltimore, as advocate, author, judge, and politician. Such a life must necessarily bring a man in contact with strange characters and expose him to various adventures, and its record, if not too prolix, can scarcely fail to be amusing.

Mr. Townsend's Analysis of Civil Government ‡ is in fact no more than an explanation of the constitutional system and fundamental laws of the United States, not unsuited for its limited purpose as a text-book for American schools, but hardly of a calibre to recommend it to English students, who would seek a fuller exposition of principles, and a much larger use of authorities and facts, to illustrate alike the history of the growth and development of the Federal Constitution, and the interpretation placed upon its more ambiguous provisions by the principal American jurists and statesmen. Mr. Townsend's work meets none of these requisitions. It gives neither illustrations nor authorities; it lays down in a very peremptory manner the constitutional doctrines now in favour with the ruling party, and lets fall not a hint of their extreme novelty, or even of the fact that they were ever questioned. Going far beyond Hamilton and Story in the assertion of Federalist principles, he never drops a word which could suggest to the reader that views directly opposite were held by men of fully equal authority—by Jefferson, and Calhoun, and Taney, as well as by the entire Democratic party both South and North. He even goes so far as to repeat the party gloss put by the Republicans upon the preamble of the Constitution, without a word that might send the reader to quarters whence he might learn for himself by what accident the phrase, "We, the people of the United States," found its way into its present context. The book, therefore, is calculated rather to mislead than to instruct an English inquirer.

Dr. Baird's History of the New School § is not without its value as an illustration of the working of the religious institutions of America, to which so much attention has been directed of late, and upon which so little real knowledge exists in this country. The book is in itself as tedious as an account of a somewhat minute and technical theological controversy, written by a bitter partisan, may be expected to prove. A dispute on the doctrine of Original Sin, in which the minority took a quasi-Pelagian, the majority an extreme Calvinistic view, led to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1838; and it is apparently in opposition to a project of compromise and reunion that Dr. Baird puts forth this bitterly hostile History of the New School. Its interest for the general reader lies in the evidence it affords of the tendency of voluntary Churches to quarrel and split up into sections upon comparatively minute points of difference—a tendency not to be overlooked when attention is called to the comparatively friendly terms and courteous interchange of good offices which sometimes obtain between distinct sects under the same system.

The *Law of Love is the somewhat curious title of a treatise on Moral Philosophy, written, of course, from a distinctly religious point of view, by Dr. Mark Hopkins. The Gospel in Enoch† may be called a continuous sermon on the two passages in Genesis and in the Epistle of St. Jude which relate to that patriarch; and credit must at least be given to the writer for considerable originality of ideas on a somewhat meagre basis of actual information.

The Reports of the Pennsylvania Hospital ‡—a series of medical and surgical papers on various forms of disease and treatment, on peculiar cases and operations—will no doubt have interest for professional readers; and the same, perhaps, may be said of the History of the Medical Department in the University of the same State.§

We have, as usual, two or three native and some translated fictions on our list. Casella, or the Children of the Valleys ‖ is a tale of the Vaudois persecutions; Seabury Castle ¶ is a species of novelette, with a religious moral, of which the scene is laid in English aristocratic life; and *Too True is an American "story of to-day." THE POSITION OF THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY.

THE Conservatives are at the present moment much in the position of people who are taking a well-deserved holiday. They have been hard-worked—perhaps a little over-worked—and now they can enjoy their ease. They have been undergoing a strain on their powers, trying to govern a country with the sympathies and opinions of which they know they are not quite in harmony, striving to make up by plodding, by profuse expenditure, and by general civility and amiability, for the want of a real command over affairs and a power to determine the current of political action. They have had but a weary time of it. It is very pleasant and very creditable to have a Conservative Government really in office, to give good things to Conservative bishops and Conservative lawyers, and to go down in state to grand dinners and puff off each other as wonders. But governing with a minority in the House of Commons is very laborious and disheartening, and place without power is not quite so great a treasure to its possessors as they hope beforehand it will be. And then the Conservatives had to undergo the great nuisance and tedium of being perpetually educated. They never knew what the Ministry of Lord DERBY or of Mr. DISRAELI wanted, what they thought or believed, or were to stick to or not to stick to. No Conservative could lay down his head on his pillow and feel sure that the next night would see him maintaining the same principles or the same opinions. There was much that was exciting, flattering, violently interesting in the appeals made to the party to show itself capable of everything, and determined to hold on and win in the race at every cost. But it was a great pull upon their strength and nerves and pluck. They bore up manfully, but they had much to endure. Now all is ease and pleasure with them. They have no difficult task to perform; they need not force their intellects to try to guess what on earth their leaders and they are after. They may sink back into a happy, dignified, sweet repose. Not only need not they let their minds grow, but they may let their minds go backwards as much as they like. They naturally enjoy themselves to the utmost, and make the best of their liberty. It was objected rather unfairly to Mr. HARDY, that he would never have made such a speech as he did on the Irish Church Bill if he had been in office. Certainly he would not; but what does that show, except that he took advantage of being free from the trammels of office to speak his real mind? He spoke as he thought when it was open to him to do so. He uttered the genuine convictions of a Conservative, not the compulsory sentiments of a Minister having to consult colleagues aware that office would be impossible to Conservatives if they did not make some overtures to Liberalism. If Mr. HARDY had been in office, he would have had to listen to the practical opinion of persons to whom he could not refuse to pay heed that not only is there an Irish question, but that this question is a very serious one. But directly he gets into Opposition, he can attend only to his own views and beliefs. He can blot out the Irish question altogether. He can tell himself and his admiring Tory friends that the whole story of Irish grievances is a piece of nonsense, and that if the priests were well snubbed and disorder sternly repressed, and the Irish given to understand once for all that they might howl as much as they liked but England would never pay them the slightest attention, everything would go on perfectly well, commerce would flourish, and the Protestant clergy would pursue with perfect success their work of latent proselytizing. It is difficult to conceive anything in public life more delightful than for a man who thinks such things, and has had to repress them, to be able at last to say them out; and for men who have been going through a weary process of education to be free to cheer to their hearts' content opinions so eminently belonging to the natural uninstructed state of the Conservative intellect. In the same way it must be like shade and a cool stream to a traveller in the heat when Lord JOHN MANNERS gets away from the position which his eminent friend created for him, and finds refuge in the humble sphere of a local Conservative dinner, which he can attend as a member of the Opposition. When at Edinburgh, Mr. DISRAELI must have astonished him, perhaps, more than any one else, by uttering the bold paradox that almost every great measure of recent years was due to him. It was very complimentary, but to act the part so strangely thrust on him was the difficulty. But he is himself again now. He can go in peace and comfort to gatherings of his party, can shout "No Surrender" as loud as any one, and feel at home with the sort of honest people who agree with him in thinking that a dinner to celebrate a Derbyshire election shows that the long-delayed tide of Conservative reaction is really setting in.

Some of the foremost men of the party declare that they are very glad, not only that they are out of office, but that they are succeeded by a Ministry with a strong command over the House of Commons. They know enough of the bitterness of having to work the Parliamentary system with a minority; and, in a patriotic spirit which is much to their credit, they are pleased to see that important measures are now to be taken up by men who have a fair chance of carrying them. They cannot, of course, go so far as to affect pleasure at seeing the Irish Church Bill so strongly supported; but there are many questions on the leading principles of which moderate and sensible men of all parties are either agreed or are ready to come to an agreement; and some of the Conservatives, of whom Sir JOHN PAKINGTON is the most conspicuous, avow that they think it very beneficial to have the settlement of those questions entrusted to men who have a good chance of settling them. Education, the treatment of criminals, bankruptcy, the institution of a public prosecutor, are among the many subjects as to which public opinion is ripe for action, and which excite no serious differences of opinion, but which can only be handled satisfactorily by a strong Ministry, because there is just enough doubt about them to paralyse the action of a Ministry which it would cost no trouble or regret to defeat. It may even be surmised that a very large portion of the Conservative party is secretly glad that even the Irish Church Bill has been supported by so clear and overwhelming a majority. There must be a sort of relief in finding that they have no duty cast on them of protracting a struggle which they now know to be useless. It is equally wrong, if it is wrong at all, to disestablish and disendow the Irish Church whether the process is sanctioned by a large or a small majority. But there is much comfort in thinking that those who do the wrong thing are solely to blame for it, because the strength with which they acted was irresistible. So far as can be judged at present, the temper of the Conservative party is that of something very like a cheerful acquiescence in their defeat. They only wanted to have the credit of making a good fight once for all. They once had a theory that the real feeling of the people of England was with them on the Irish matter, and that the great constituencies especially were deeply moved with Conservative sentiments on the subject. But the people of England, if they regret Mr. GLADSTONE's majority, conceal their feelings with admirable completeness, and the large constituencies seem perfectly indifferent to the fate of the Irish Establishment. Even the pulpits are as quiet as possible, and the English clergy behave as if they had other things to think of. There is no resistance of the kind which we may be sure Englishmen would offer to a measure if they really disliked it. There was a fight about it at election time, and then the matter was settled, and although many people regretted the settlement at which the constituencies arrived, they are not sorry it was settled one way or the other. Undoubtedly there is a great deal of Conservative feeling in the country, and in many classes it is a growing feeling; but even these classes are not heartily with the Conservative Parliamentary party as against the Liberal Government. There are thousands of people who, partly from timidity, and partly from an intense desire to be respectable, feel drawn to the Conservatives, and would vote for them, and who yet are perfectly aware that it is totally impossible to govern Ireland as Mr. HARDY, when out of office thinks it ought to be governed. They feel that a crisis has come, whether artificially created by Mr. GLADSTONE or not, when something must be done for Ireland, and they are powerless to conceive how in real life, with a Liberal majority of hundred and eighteen, anything but what Mr. GLADSTONE proposes can be done for Ireland. They are therefore inclined to take things very quietly, merely congratulating themselves on their entire exemption from responsibility, let the consequences of Mr. GLADSTONE's policy be what they may.

But although the situation is very easy and pleasant for the bulk of the Conservative party, and for those of their leaders who take advantage of the absence of restraint to talk unalloyed Conservatism, it is by no means easy or pleasant for one or two of the most eminent among them. Mr. DISRAELI and Lord STANLEY, more especially, are passing through season of considerable trial and difficulty. They cannot take their holiday, and rollick in the untutored liberty of unofficial Toryism. Mr. DISRAELI is out of office, but it is his business to make office some day possible again for himself and his party. He has to think how he may contrive to stand well with his followers, and not run athwart them in their present humour, and yet to pave the way for leading them into courses of which as yet they have no notion. If there is anything certain about Mr. DISRAELI, it is that he holds a Conservative Ministry, standing on the pure principles of Conservatism, to be an impossibility. He is obliged to look forward and to picture himself responsible for the government of Ireland, and when he does this he cannot for a moment suppose it possible that he should really govern Ireland as Mr. HARDY would have it governed. At the same time, he must have Mr. HARDY as a colleague, and he could not out of office separate himself from one who has so completely the confidence of the Conservatives when in their uninstructed and natural state. He consequently has to speak so that he may always leave open a door of retreat for himself, and yet may make his party think that he is leading them properly and doing justice to their views. It is as unsatisfactory a position as could be imagined for any one who wished to bear the name and run the career of a great statesman, but it is well adapted to show off to advantage Mr. DISRAELI's tact, ingenuity, and audacity, as well as fertility of invention. Lord STANLEY is in a still more embarrassing position. Some curiosity was felt to know what he would do with regard to the Irish Church Bill, but it is not surprising to find that he did as little as possible, that he kept away almost entirely from the debate, and voted without having spoken. Of course no one can believe for a moment that Lord STANLEY thinks that the Irish Church can be kept up or ought to be kept up. He may be taken to hold the ordinary Liberal opinions on the matter; and if the comparison could be pursued thoroughly, there are, we imagine, very few points on which the opinions of Lord STANLEY and of Mr. LOWE are not substantially the same. Both objected to Reform on the ground that measures equally liberal, and perhaps more liberal, might be carried without it than with it. Both discuss public affairs with a sort of cynical candour, and both take the view of what may be regarded as extreme common sense on all questions such as education, colonies, endowments, and State interference. But then Lord STANLEY is not free as Mr. LOWE is. Lord STANLEY is attached to the Conservative party, and must take the consequences. He cannot think, act, or say anything. He must hold his tongue, and try to administer as well as possible whenever he gets a chance. He might, of course, leave his party; but he is bound to it by much more than ordinary ties, and there are innumerable doubts and scruples which rise up in the way of taking so decisive a step when a man begins to calculate all the consequences, and to ask whether he is bound, or would be wise, to sacrifice a position generally satisfactory in order to declare his views on a particular question. Men of the mould and cast of Lord STANLEY are not to be blamed because they do not take so great and heroic a line. If Lord STANLEY was a great man, or had a sympathy with the higher thoughts and interests of the nation, or wished to mould the condition and determine the prospects of the generation in which he lives, he would not be content to stand wholly aloof while such subjects as the Reform Bill and the Irish Church Bill are discussed. But Lord STANLEY is a man of a different stamp; and a cold, judicious, uni[illegible] native Liberal, who was bred and lives among Conservatives, may perhaps be right in thinking that he is not sacrificing too much for his party when he gives a silent vote in its favour on such a question as that of the Irish Church.

SPAIN.

THE present condition of Spain has a precedent, or an analogy, in the history of the French Republic during the earlier part of the interval between the Revolution of 1848 and the assumption of supreme power by the PRESIDENT. Then, as now, the country in its first alarm had returned Conservative majorities which would at almost any time have gladly established a constitutional monarchy if they could have discovered a presentable King. The genuine Republicans were as little disposed in France as they are now in Spain to acquiesce in the decision of the constituencies; and they had some excuse for disaffection in the knowledge that two successive Assemblies were, under the guidance of reactionary leaders, virtually plotting against the Republic. The resolution of the Cortes gives the Spanish supporters of monarchy a legal right which was wanting to their predecessors in France; but the most striking similarity between the two revolutionary epochs is to be found in the prevailing belief that the future belongs to the extreme Democratic party. The chief politicians of the French Assembly were firmly convinced that a third or fourth election would bring the Jacobins into power; and it may be conjectured that the adherents of PRIM and SERRANO are haunted with a similar dread. There is much significance in the eagerness with which all local disturbances are officially referred to Carlist plots or to the intrigues of the partisans of ISABELLA; yet it was only through the fear of Republican insurrection that the Government hesitated to weaken the garrisons of Seville and Cadiz when troops were required to suppress the troubles at Xeres. If the difference between a King and a President were merely one of political form, all parties might probably be willing to submit to the decision of the Cortes; but on the Continent in modern times a Republic means, both to its supporters and to its opponents, the accomplishment of a social revolution. In some parts of Spain attempts have already been made to redress by violent methods the inequalities of fortune; and it unfortunately happens that in some districts the wasteful tenure of landed property furnishes a pretext for spoliation. It is easy to persuade an unsettled multitude that great and half-tilled estates might be advantageously transferred from non-resident nobles to freehold occupiers. When the inviolability of property is once disturbed, other kinds of wealth will share the fate of the land, and economic anarchy will almost inevitably lead to armed repression. It is not surprising that the upper and middle classes in Spain regard with terror the approach of a Republic.

The project of Constitution which has been produced by the Committee of the Cortes would appear, from the brief telegraphic summary, to correspond with sufficient accuracy to commonplace theories of representative government. There is no confirmation of the strange rumour that the plan of the Committee included a suggestion that a King should be elected for eighteen years, nor is it difficult to see that any such arrangement would have been incompatible with settled and orderly government. The term would be far too long for a President, and too short for a King. It is said that there was some mistake in the telegram, and that the specified eighteen years referred to the minimum age of the proposed King, and not to any limit of his reign. But as it is impossible to be certain about these things of Spain, and since the wild improbability of the original story is not necessarily fatal to it, a few words on the subject may not be out of place. Although the necessary association of hereditary succession with monarchy is comparatively modern, even in the most troubled times a Roman Emperor was always supposed to reign to the end of his life. In the middle ages almost every European country established a permanent dynasty, retaining at the same time a certain freedom of selection among the principal members of the Royal Family. Later generations found it convenient to regulate the descent of the Crown by the same rigid laws which determine the inheritance of private property. An Assembly, or more often a Minister, exercised real power in the name of a King who at least possessed the negative merit of an uncontested and unquestionable title. In the United States universal recognition of the supreme right of the majority renders a disputed claim to the Presidency as improbable as if the Chief Magistrate were designated for office by birth. The less civilized Republics of South America have for fifty years been accustomed to civil wars promoted by military competitors for the possession of power. The partially similar experience of Spain, where Ministers have habitually been raised to office by successful mutinies, seemed to have impressed all moderate politicians with the expediency of maintaining or restoring hereditary royalty. Such an impracticable scheme as that of an eighteen-year enjoyment of the throne would be a compromise between a monarchy and a republic which would exclude the advantages of both forms of government. No member of the reigning families of Europe would accept such a position, except with the deliberate purpose of conspiring against the newfangled Constitution for the benefit of himself or of his descendants; and if it is intended to prefer a general or statesman to a prince, his pre-eminence would excite intolerable jealousy, while his limited tenure of power would deprive him of all opportunity of imposing on the general imagination. The divinity which still theoretically hedges a King would, even if it had not been grievously impaired by modern habits of thought, be effectually destroyed by the absence of the element of indefinite duration. A farming-lease for a term of years has a tendency, in spite of the strictest covenants, to exhaust towards its close the productive powers of the land. The latter part of a reign limited to eighteen years would be occupied with multifarious intrigues in the palace, in the army, and in the country. But it is superfluous to say more of a scheme which, if it has ever been contemplated—which seems doubtful—would have reduced the process of inventing Constitutions to an absurdity.

The acknowledgment of the Roman Catholic religion as the creed of the State, with liberty to practise other forms of worship, may probably be found the most judicious solution of the ecclesiastical question. The Spaniards are Roman Catholics, as far as they cultivate any religious faith, although it is reported that fifty persons have been found to proclaim their independence by celebrating a communion according to some undescribed Protestant rite. The disestablishment or disendowment of the dominant Church would, amongst other inconvenient consequences, perpetuate the embarrassing feud between the priesthood and the Government. No wise statesman would, in a country situated like Spain, disregard the power of the clergy, which might perhaps become more formidable when it was dissociated from secular and legal authority. Even in France, where the middle classes have long thrown off all pretence of orthodoxy, the Roman Catholic clergy are strong enough to extort the deference of the Government, especially on the eve of a general election. The French occupation of Rome, which has now lasted for twenty years, is dictated by the hierarchy, which derives its political weight almost exclusively from its influence on the peasantry. The less advanced civilization of Spain renders it probable that the Government will be forced to secure either the support or the neutrality of the priests. For the moment the Republicans are the bitter enemies of the clergy; but the Roman Catholic Church is not inseparably wedded to any temporal alliance. When it has once become certain that neither branch of the Spanish BOURBONS will be restored, the clergy, who had no difficulty in transferring their support from the male line to the intrusive QUEEN, will offer their aid to the Republic, to the monarchy, or to the military leaders of the day, as they may think that the interests of the Church will be most effectually promoted. The real or nominal toleration of nonconformity will perhaps satisfy the artificial demand for religious freedom. The foolish fine ladies who, at the instigation of their confessors, lately presented to Marshal SERRANO a protest against liberty of worship, were prematurely frightened. The soil of Spain is not fertile in heresy, although it may probably produce much indifference to religion. The more intelligent part of the population, caring little for psalms or sermons, resents the anomaly of legal persecution for religious opinions in an age which has witnessed throughout Europe the abolition for civil purposes of religious distinctions. In Italy, in all parts of Germany and of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, in France, and in the Low Countries, a Protestant is eligible for every secular office, and he may attend the worship of his sect. An educated Spaniard might tolerate unjust laws, but he objects to a policy which makes his country ridiculous.

It is not improbable that the priests and the Catholic party may ultimately think it expedient to favour the candidature of the Duke of MONTPENSIER. The Princess through whom he is connected with Spain is, like the great majority of women in Roman Catholic countries, devoted to religious observances; and the Duke, like the rest of his family, combines a decorous conformity with a general profession of sympathy with Liberal opinions. When the throne is once re-established, its occupant will almost necessarily incline to the cause of respectability and order; and if the Republicans continue to profess hostility to the priesthood, the Crown and the Church will find a bond of union in resistance to a common enemy. It would be rash to express any confident anticipation of the conduct of any party in Spain. After an interval of more than six months from the beginning of the Revolution, nothing is settled as to principles or persons. If the Cortes are not in a hurry to complete the Constitution, the Provisional Government may still administer affairs for months, or even for years. PRIM and SERRANO perhaps inspire no sentiment of loyalty, but they have not yet been supplanted by any more popular rival.

THE IRISH CHURCH CONFERENCES.

SEVERAL preliminary meetings have been held this week in different Irish dioceses, for the purpose of electing delegates to attend a General Synod of the Church. The object of this Synod is to create a body which shall offer an organized and authoritative resistance to Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill. The clergy are to elect members to the amount of one-tenth of the clerical delegates, and the lay delegates are to elect an equal number of lay delegates. The arrangement is admitted on all hands to be satisfactory, and the credit of having carried it to a successful issue is attributed to the Irish Bishops, and especially to the Archbishop of DUBLIN. The laity and clergy of the Established Church will have the advantage of being represented by a body which they will recognise as adequate to plead their cause in the best possible manner before Parliament and the nation. The Dublin Conference was naturally regarded as the most important, and the rest will probably take their tone from its proceedings. The speeches made at this Conference may therefore be fairly taken as embodying the views of the general body of Irish Churchmen on the Government Bill. The drift of these speeches was first that the Bill should be opposed altogether, without any idea of compromise, as a monstrous piece of robbery and sacrilege. Secondly, that the Government measure was full of injustice in detail; and, lastly, that the Synod should not be considered as in any way preparatory to the establishment of that new Church body which the Government contemplates as coming into existence when the Act is passed. It seems to us perfectly fair and right that men whose dearest interests are, as they think, to be prejudicially affected should combine in this way, and offer what they conceive will be the most effectual kind of opposition. From the Irish Protestant point of view the decisions to which the members of the Dublin Conference came appear to us wholly unobjectionable. If the Bill is a measure of grievous wrong, if it involves robbery and sacrilege, and a flagrant breach of faith with Ireland, it ought to be resisted altogether. The action of the Irish Protestants would have been paralyzed if they had accepted the division on the Second Reading as final and conclusive, and had considered themselves bound to confine themselves to the mere discussion of details. If they could make their case out, it would be a case that ought even now to arrest the action of Parliament. It is needless to say that we think it entirely impossible to govern the British Empire on the principles of Protestant ascendency. We start from a different set of political axioms from those on which the members of the Dublin Conference rest their case. The system of government which they wish to perpetuate in Ireland seems to us a total failure in practice, and indefensible in theory. But they are people who thoroughly believe that it is wise and good and part of the necessary order of things if anarchy and civil war are to be avoided. The great majority of the constituencies are against them; the Irish members who are against them are as two to one; their opposition will, as we believe and hope, be totally ineffectual. But political opponents are not to be judged by our standard, but by their own; and no one can deny that the Irish Protestants have a right to be heard, and that whatever they may have to say ought to be said in the fullest and most authoritative manner. They honestly believe that, if the truth were known about the Irish Church, Englishmen would shrink from injuring it, and it is most desirable that they should have an opportunity of testing once for all whether they are right or not in this belief. Nor was there wanting in the Dublin Conference a sincere desire to be calm and moderate, and to restrain the excitement under which all present were labouring. Irish Protestants are fiery people, proud with the memories of centuries of conquest, and gifted with their proper share of the national turn for florid and abusive eloquence. But at Dublin they tried hard to contain themselves, and not without success. There were passages in most of the speeches which were extravagant or in bad taste. Even the mild Archbishop of DUBLIN, whose Irish nature has been tamed by long residence in England, went so far as to say that the Government in refusing to let the Irish Convocation meet, acted like garotters, who silenced their victim by pressing his windpipe, while with the other hand they emptied his pocket; and Dr. SALMON wandered far into the paths of grotesque irreverence when he invited his hearers to observe that the attacks on the Irish Church were always made at Easter, and that counsels were taken against it at the very time of the year when counsels had been taken against its Head. But there was not much language of this sort, and Dr. SALMON was most earnest in discountenancing the silly talk about advocating the Repeal of the Union out of revenge, which has actually been embodied in a resolution by the Protestant Defence Association of Ulster.

The burden of all the speeches made was, that the Irish Church had done nothing to deserve the harsh treatment it was to receive. Was it to be punished because its clergy was selfish and lazy, the doctrine it preached not sound, the education of its poor neglected, its laity cold and indifferent? Now, if these things could not be said—and not even its bitterest enemy pretended that they could be said—against it, why then was it to suffer? No speaker seemed to have a glimpse of the real issue as it appears to those who go with the majority of the House of Commons. All these leading Irish Protestants have been cradled in the traditions of Protestant ascendency, and they cannot escape from the thoughts which have been a part of their being since childhood. They cannot look on Protestant ascendency from without, and discuss whether it is a good or a bad thing in itself. To them this is like asking whether it is a good or a bad thing that Ireland should be a wet country. Ireland is a wet country, and there is the end of it. They can understand being taxed with definite misdeeds, with being bad Christians or bad Protestants. They can enter into the feelings of those who desire that the Irish Church, which is the embodiment of Protestant ascendency, should do its duty; but they cannot comprehend how men should question whether there ought to be any embodiment of Protestant ascendency. They have been all their lives accustomed to look on the Established Church as an instrument of perpetual warfare against the priests, and they feel it to be very unfair that the instrument should be taken away from them, unless it can be shown that they have violated the rules of honourable warfare. Still less are they capable of following to its consequences the determination to do away with a symbol of Protestant ascendency. The English Government, setting out with the proposition that the Established Church in Ireland, as symbolizing Protestant ascendency, must be done away with, goes on until it has effected its object, and it has come to the conclusion that the only means of doing this is to insist on the total disendowment and the total disestablishment of the Church. The Irish Protestants ignore altogether the main purpose of the Government. They do not even discuss whether Protestant ascendency shall continue, for they are so habituated to it that they cannot discuss it. Probably they are scarcely aware that such a thing as Protestant ascendency exists, or ever has existed. They regard themselves in the simple light of people who are being robbed and insulted by a Government which, in total ignorance of the real interests of Ireland, is bent on currying favour with the priests. They therefore reply that the Government shall not get a penny of their money if they can possibly help it, that they will keep screaming out in the hope of attracting attention, and that they will defend to the last every scrap of their property. If the Government garotters, as the Archbishop would say, get hold of their watch, they will try to keep their purse; and if that must go too, they may at least save their studs. They cannot believe but that they will yet succeed in protecting that which is clearly their own. In one diocese, that of Meath, opinions were expressed that the cry of "No Surrender" was now too late, and that some sort of surrender was inevitable. The Irish Church must be stripped of much that belonged to her, but, if a great effort were made, far more might be saved than the Government proposed to leave. But the general feeling of the Irish Protestants is not to go so far as this. They will not hear of any compromise, they will not own they must be robbed; and they are all for trying to convince the world that what is proposed to be done by the Government amounts to nothing less than sheer wholesale indefensible robbery.

Men will hope against hope to the last, and the speakers at Dublin were evidently sincere who said that they saw a change in English opinion ever since the division on the Second Reading. As Sir EDWARD GROGAN poetically expressed it, the rustling of the straw had begun. To us on this side of the Channel it seems that this rustling is so very faint as to be imperceptible. But Irish ears have caught the welcome sound; and so far as there is any basis for the belief that things are changing here, it seems to rest on the discovery that many persons and many organs of public opinion in England that support the Government are quite willing that the Bill should receive modifications in Committee. It is perfectly true that there is a disposition to revise the details of the Bill very carefully, so that those affected may be satisfied so far as possible while the main principles of the Bill are preserved. But it is before all things necessary that these main principles should be preserved, and whether details can or cannot be altered will always depend on the preliminary question whether these main principles are trenched on. The two main principles of the Bill are that the Established Church of Ireland, as a symbol of Protestant ascendency, shall be destroyed, and that the destruction shall be effected by total disestablishment and total disendowment. When a suggested modification of the Bill would militate against these principles, the Government have no choice but to exert themselves to the utmost to reject it as altogether inadmissible. When a suggested modification does not militate against these principles it may be fairly and fully discussed, and its value compared with the value of the proposal of the Government which it is intended to replace. If this distinction is kept steadily in mind, we shall get on better than by trying in a vague way to listen whether the straw is beginning to rustle. Many of the objections to the details of the Bill do not affect its main principle at all, and the Government can have no difficulty in accepting the views of Parliament about them. One of the grievances, for example, dwelt on at Dublin, is that the Bill does not enable an incumbent or a curate to change the scene of his services. Nothing can be easier or more unobjectionable than to provide that so long as he does not alter his pecuniary relations to the State, a curate or incumbent, while he continues to serve at all, may serve where he and the ecclesiastical body over him think best. Then, again, there is the grievance of having to pay off the debt on the glebes and parsonages, and as to this, which is a very small matter, it seems to us quite open to discussion whether the proposal of the Government is quite consistent with the proposal to release Maynooth from the payment of its building debt. So, to take the point most likely to give rise to debate, it does not in the least touch the principles of the Bill whether the compensation to Maynooth and the Presbyterians is paid out of the funds of the Irish Church or by the British taxpayer. In either case the disendowment is complete, and all the available surplus of the Church is taken away. An extra million of money will be applicable to Irish secular purposes, but that will be all. On the other hand, the Archdeacon of DUBLIN instanced as a flagrant example of what were termed the secondary injustices of the Bill that, after 1871, there would be no guarantee for the soundness of doctrine of the clergy, or for their proper supervision by their Bishops. The right mode of meeting an objection of this sort is to assume total disestablishment as accepted, and then to ask whether there is any conceivable mode by which the State could guarantee soundness of doctrine or episcopal supervision in a Church with which the State had no connexion. It is a good argument, so far as it goes, against the Bill altogether to say that disestablishment would disorganize the Church; but if total disestablishment is resolved on, then a modification of the Bill inconsistent with total disestablishment must be rejected. To resolve on the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church is a serious and solemn step, and one that cannot be taken without much pain and anxiety; but when it is once taken, the course of the Government and of Parliament seems sufficiently plain.

AMERICA.

PRESIDENT GRANT has apparently formed, after some preliminary misadventures, a tolerably efficient Cabinet. The SECRETARY of the TREASURY forms an exception to the rule which the PRESIDENT had wished to adopt, of excluding from administrative office political leaders who might be expected to pursue a policy of their own. Mr. BOUTWELL was an active member of the House of Representatives, a member of the extreme Radical party, and a manager of the Impeachment; but in his present office he will have little opportunity of giving effect to his opinions. It is more important that, in common with the majority of members from the Eastern States, he has steadily opposed repudiation; and that, as one of the principal authors of the Internal Revenue Acts, he has proved his desire for the discharge or reduction of the debt. In England it might be thought strange that a zealous Protectionist should be appointed to the management of the finances, in place of a Free-trader who happened to be disqualified; but an American Secretary of the Treasury exercises little influence on fiscal legislation; nor could Mr. STEWART, if he had retained his office, have offered any serious opposition to the high tariff which is supported by a great majority in Congress. The confidence which Mr. BOUTWELL may claim from the Republican party will tend to facilitate his operations and he is already relieved from a serious difficulty by the reaction which has set in against theories of repudiation. The rise in the price of United States Bonds which has ensued on the recent enactment for the payment of the debt in full will serve as the most forcible argument against a relapse. General GRANT himself has departed from his habitual reticence so far as to declare that no advocate of repudiation ought to be entrusted with public functions; and for the present Mr. BUTLER stands almost alone as the champion of a policy which he adopted when it was highly popular with the Senate the House of Representatives, and the people of the Western States. Since the appointment of Mr. BOUTWELL the premium on gold has fallen to the lowest point which it has touched for three or four years; and it may be inferred that the SECRETARY of the TREASURY, although he is opposed to sudden contraction of the currency, is not expected to encourage an increase of paper circulation. The questions relating to the currency are more complicated than the simple enterprise of reducing the charge on the funded debt by strengthening the national credit. If Mr. BOUTWELL can only prevent for two or three years the revival of the agitation for payment in greenbacks, he will have no difficulty in borrowing large sums at a reduced rate of interest.

The original list of Cabinet nominations severely tested the faith of General GRANT's uncompromising admirers. His ostentatious reserve had stimulated public expectation, and his choice of almost unknown Ministers created natural disappointment. No President has hitherto so openly avowed the principle of selecting his private friends for high office in preference to the prominent members of his party. The country in general would not have disapproved of an exclusive attention to merit, but the new Ministers were not distinguished by conspicuous ability or by great public services. Mr. WASHBURNE, whose general ignorance of international affairs was combined with special hostility to England, was made Secretary of State because, having been acquainted with GRANT at Galena, he had steadily urged on Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. STANTON the claims of his friend. The result has confirmed the soundness of Mr. WASHBURNE's judgment, but the conduct of the foreign affairs of the United States is an excessive reward for an early appreciation of the merits of an officer who has since become Commander-in-Chief and President. On reflection Mr. WASHBURNE seems to have become conscious of his own unfitness for the post of Secretary of State, and he has considered that his services to General GRANT are sufficiently rewarded by a foreign mission. General RAWLINS also was a resident of Galena, and he has since been a faithful and useful follower of GRANT. When the war broke out, RAWLINS was to have been lieutenant in a company of volunteers under GRANT as captain, and he served immediately under him in all his campaigns, until he became Chief of the general Staff. It is natural that a military President should wish to control the War Department through the agency of a trusted officer; but the luck of the little town of Galena in possessing a President and two Cabinet Ministers is regarded as surprising, if not invidious. Mr. STEWART has no connexion with Galena, but, in concert with some of his friends, he presented General GRANT, on his appointment as Commander-in-Chief, with a furnished house at Washington, which the same donors have lately re-purchased at the price of 15,000*l.*, for the purpose of giving it to General SHERMAN. No suspicion of corrupt motives attaches to any of the parties to the transaction, but the gift proves the existence of friendly personal relations between the PRESIDENT and his nominee as Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. STEWART, who is a scholar and a political economist, as well as a great capitalist, would probably have been well qualified for the administration of finance; but General GRANT committed a serious mistake in exposing himself to a rebuff through the refusal of the Senate to repeal the law by which Mr. STEWART was disqualified. The maintenance in a modified form of the Tenure of Office Act affords another proof that the jealousy of the Republican leaders has been in some degree aroused; but the PRESIDENT can exercise a certain pressure on the party by declining to disturb Mr. JOHNSON's appointments until he is allowed to employ without control the right of dismissal which belonged to his predecessors.

It is not known whether the Senate will confirm the appointment of General LONGSTREET as Surveyor of Customs at New Orleans. The nomination may be considered a statesmanlike and significant act. The Republicans, after working themselves during a period of several years up to the belief that secession was a crime, logically conclude that their conquered enemies are remitted only to the condition of pardoned rebels. General GRANT, after facing the great Confederate armies in many a hard-fought field, is not likely to confuse a civil war with seditious resistance to the law. Since the conclusion of peace, General LONGSTREET has, like General LEE and the best of their comrades, accepted the decision of arms, with a loyal desire to conform henceforth to the laws of the Union. In appointing him to a responsible office, General GRANT announces to the Southern population, in the most intelligible form, his intention to recognise the equality of all peaceable citizens. At the same time he has indicated in the plainest manner his determination to protect the negroes from oppression, by restoring to Southern commands some of the general officers who had been displaced by his predecessor. In his Inaugural Address he expressed his approval of the Constitutional Amendment, which will, if it is adopted, prohibit all political distinctions on the ground of race, colour, or previous servitude. The appointment of LONGSTREET is a protest against the more obnoxious disqualification which affects the best class of the inhabitants of the South. It remains to be seen whether the Senate will aid in effacing an arbitrary and unjust stigma. General LONGSTREET had already been relieved by an Act of Congress from formal disabilities; but no equally eminent servant of the Confederate Government has yet been allowed to hold an office under the Government of Washington.

The willingness of the Republican party in Congress to support the PRESIDENT will probably depend on the principles which are henceforth to regulate the disposal of patronage. General GRANT had hoped to be independent of political organizations, but he has already found that it is difficult to exclude the customary local influences. The Senators and Representatives belonging to the majority claim the right of distributing the offices in their respective districts, and also among the constituencies which have returned Democratic members. If the PRESIDENT retains all the local patronage to himself and his confidential agents, it will be impossible to comply with the engagements which were made during the recent elections. It is always understood that candidates, or their friends, provide funds for political contests with a contingent right to be repaid by appointment to office when their party is in power. Aspirants to office had reason to hope for an ample harvest of appointments on the dismissal of the functionaries who owe their places to Mr. JOHNSON and his Ministers. It is probable that General GRANT will be backward in effecting changes as long as the Tenure of Office Act is in force; for it is easier to turn a man out of his place than to explain to the Senate the reasons of dismissal. Under the Act as recently amended, the PRESIDENT has a power of suspension limited by the obligation of obtaining the sanction of the Senate to the appointment of a successor; but it is uncertain whether he will be satisfied by any measure short of an entire removal of restrictions. In obedience to his directions, the Commissioner of Inland Revenue has announced to the officers in his department that there will be no sweeping dismissal, except for sufficient cause. The number of dishonest or suspected functionaries is so considerable that the PRESIDENT will perhaps have sufficient patronage at his disposal to satisfy the most unreasonable demands of the Republican party. It is said that several of his Ministers have advised him to concede the claim, on the ground that he cannot prudently dispense with political support. If he follows his original inclination, he will attempt to follow a more independent course.

THE PRESTON STRIKE.

THE strike of the Preston weavers and spinners seems to be so far typical that it thus far includes no anomalous element of violence or intimidation. Both parties are acting within the limits of their right, or, which is the same thing, of their legal powers. The masters cannot be compelled to keep their mills open at the recent rate of wages, and, on the other hand, the workmen may at their choice refuse to exchange their skill and labour for a reduced price. The moral justification of either party depends on accuracy of calculation, and also on the principle or standard to which a tacit reference is made. In default of the special knowledge which is in the exclusive possession of those who are immediately concerned, it may be assumed, for the purposes of the discussion, that the statements of the employers are generally true. According to their assertion, the high price of raw cotton, combined with the slackness of the demand for fabrics, has reduced the rate of profit to a point at which it is not worth their while to pursue the business. They are therefore reduced to the alternative of closing their mills, or of calling on their workmen to share their losses by sacrificing a considerable percentage on their wages. It is, however, remarkable that one cotton manufacturer in Preston continues to pay the former rate of wages, in consequence, it is said, of some peculiarity in the conduct of his business. The workmen not unnaturally infer that his example might be followed by his neighbours; but further information and longer experience are required to test the soundness of their conclusion. It seems to be agreed on all sides that trade is in a depressed condition, for the workmen have offered to make large concessions, extending to one half of the proposed reduction. The proposed diminution of ten per cent. would bring wages below the level of a certain list of prices which appears to be regarded as a minimum rate. The Lancashire Unions in the same trade adopt the cause of the Preston workmen with a unanimity which would furnish strong evidence in favour of their claims if it were necessarily founded on a dispassionate judgment. To outside observers it seems that Trade-Unions always approve of a strike, although they know that it must be in a great measure conducted at their own expense. The truth probably is, that when they object to strong measures their remonstrances are secret and confidential, and that it is only when they countenance resistance that their authority is publicly quoted. The necessity of obtaining the concurrence of a large and scattered body must sometimes operate as a check on local caprice and passion.

The advocates of Trade-Unions and the apologists of occasional strikes rely on a theory which deserves serious consideration. In their opinion, capital ought to be considered in some degree as a reserved fund, properly applicable to the maintenance of a fixed rate of wages in periods of commercial depression. The employers realize fortunes in times of prosperity, without holding that they are bound to allow their workmen any considerable share of their exceptional gains. There is some plausibility in the contention that they ought to suffer the corresponding loss by acting as insurers to relieve wages from the unavoidable variation of profits. In some branches of industry the rule which the economists of the Unions wish to establish habitually prevails. A railway company which returns little or no dividend to its shareholders nevertheless pays guards and engine-drivers at the customary rate; and in the still more important department of agricultural industry, the wages of labour are for the most part uniform throughout each district for long periods of time. Railway wages are maintained by the ordinary process of competition for labour, inasmuch as there are always prosperous Companies by the side of needy or insolvent neighbours; and the nature of the enterprise is such that the working of a railway is seldom discontinued and never temporarily suspended. As long as any revenue is earned, either for shareholders or for creditors, beyond the working expenses, it is worth while to keep the line open; and the managers can only conduct their business by paying the ordinary rate of wages. The circumstances of a farmer are for the most part such that it is his interest to struggle on through adverse seasons rather than to abandon the only occupation which he is competent to follow. In extreme cases he lowers the wages of his labourers, though there is but a narrow margin beyond the lowest amount necessary for subsistence. He has also in his rent a second fund on which in extreme cases he can draw for purposes of retrenchment. A Preston manufacturer can in no manner influence the price of cotton at Liverpool; but a tenant farmer has sometimes the means of placing a strong pressure on his landlord. Factory workmen may be excused for doubting whether they ought to partake in any degree of the liabilities of commercial speculation. Mr. BEESLY, in an eloquent and powerful essay published in the March number of the Fortnightly Review, defends the existence of capitalists in opposition to theories of communism or of universal co-operation, on the express ground that they form the instruments by which fluctuations in the rate of wages may be prevented or diminished in frequency. The Preston workmen probably believe that the present stagnation of trade is temporary, and that their employers would not be ruined if they tided over the interval with reduced profits, or even without actual gain. All parties to the dispute would agree that it is not for the common interest that the capital which has been accumulated in the cotton industry should be seriously impaired; but workmen are prone to exaggerate the wealth of manufacturers, who in their turn perhaps estimate at too high a rate the profit indispensable to their operations.

Millowners, like other men, vary indefinitely in character, but their class includes many public-spirited and benevolent men who would shrink from exposing the workmen in their employment to avoidable hardship. On the whole, it is perhaps well that their proceedings should be in the main governed by their own interests, and that they should decline operations which would involve actual loss. The determination to reduce wages can scarcely be justified on the assumption that it is necessary to secure a certain percentage on capital above the mere rate of interest; but, on the other hand, no man ought to be compelled to prosecute a laborious and hazardous undertaking without a reasonable prospect of due remuneration. It is only in a vague and general way that money which has been made in trade can be saddled with a moral trust for the benefit of the workmen who have aided in producing the amount. The profits to be hereafter gained form the only practical inducement to invest capital in industrial operations. If the Preston manufacturers may be trusted, there is no longer a sufficient motive for making cotton, unless they can reduce the cost of production. In determining to strike against the proposed reduction, the workmen undertake to maintain the contrary proposition by the wager of battle, which is unfortunately established as the ultimate mode of trying similar issues. The resolution appears not to have been taken in any wanton spirit, for the memory of the disastrous strike of seventeen years ago is still freshly preserved. The reserved funds of the Unions are staked against the resources which the masters may be able or willing to employ in the struggle. If the threatened reduction is withdrawn or modified, there will be reason to believe that the workmen have been in the right, for in such an event it will be evident that it was more advantageous to pay full wages than to suspend the working of the mills. In the more probable contingency of a victory on the part of the masters, the question will have been less conclusively determined. The triumph may be due to superior power rather than to better right, although it is highly probable that the representations of the millowners are well founded. The statistics of Trade-Unions still leave it in doubt whether actual and menaced strikes have tended to raise the general rate of wages. The influences which regulate the remuneration of labour are complicated, and neither increase nor diminution of payment can safely be attributed to any single cause. The great body of artisans have no doubts on the subject, and their conduct is of course determined by their own opinions, with little regard to the doctrines of more sceptical economists. In the present struggle the masters have the better chance of success, because there is reason to fear that the decay of the cotton trade may be either permanent or of long duration. Labour in the Southern States of America is scanty and intermittent, and India is, for some reason, incapable of supplying the defect. If the trade falls off, either the number of workmen or the rate of wages will be necessarily reduced, and the Preston weavers are already preparing for the result by organizing plans of emigration. The experiment of their strike will be watched with anxiety even by remote and disinterested observers.

THE COMING ELECTIONS IN FRANCE.

IN speculating on the policy of the French Government with regard to the approaching elections, foreigners are apt to forget that the EMPEROR is likely to have better information than any one else as to the real feeling of the country. Of course this anterior probability may be defeated, either by a bad choice of instruments, or by an unwillingness on the part of their employer to hear unpleasant truths. In the one case, his agents will not form a right estimate of the facts; in the other, they will conceal or disguise them in order to make their reports palatable. But, supposing neither of these disturbing causes to come into play, the administrative organization of the Empire gives the sovereign who controls it an unapproachable opportunity of ascertaining the sentiments and wishes of the French people. Independent journalists and Liberal politicians may appreciate better the attitude of particular classes, but they cannot compete with the Minister and the Prefect in the number and variety of the data from which they draw their conclusions. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that the policy of the Opposition, on counteracting which the whole energy of the Government is bent, is itself capable of modification up to a late period of the struggle. The vantage-ground the EMPEROR occupies is so decided that he can calculate the strength of his adversaries more accurately than their own commanders; and, relying on this superiority, he can determine where he will give battle. But as soon as his intention becomes apparent, the dispositions of the foe may be altered to meet it; and an unexpected display of Opposition strength may thus necessitate at the last moment a fresh combination on the side of the Government. Subject to the allowance which must be made for this element of uncertainty, it may be assumed that the EMPEROR has decided to take his stand next month on the field of home politics. On more than one occasion during the winter the probabilities have rather pointed the other way. The revival from time to time of the standing grievance against Prussia, and the recent introduction of a fictitious grievance against Belgium, have looked as though another attempt was to be made to divert the French people from the choice of representatives at home by the phantom of glory abroad. Now, however, such ideas have, to all appearance, been definitively abandoned. To evoke a thunderstorm in a clear sky requires some amount of preparation, even when the conjuror is NAPOLEON III., and between this and the elections there is hardly time enough for the spell to work.

It is only by looking back to the last general election that we can realize how considerable is the progress which the cause of Parliamentary government has recently made in France. Five years ago men were discussing whether the Opposition could be increased from five to ten, and whether, in view of this amount of success, it was worth while to make any serious fight. Compared with what it was in 1863, the Corps Législatif is a real power in the country. If its divisions exercise little influence on the course of affairs, its debates sometimes count for a good deal. In a Legislature which was then convoked only to give an unregarded sanction to the decrees of an absolute Executive, Opposition speeches not unworthy of the best days of French Parliamentary eloquence are now heard every Session. Though the Ministers whose acts are criticized are still irresponsible, and the policy of the Sovereign is in form amenable to no sanction short of a revolution, the freedom of debate which is now permitted must constantly modify both. If the Corps Législatif is still in many respects only an instrument of the EMPEROR, it is an instrument which needs constant study and occasional humouring. This is not the highest position to which a representative Chamber can aspire, but it is one immeasurably more promising than that occupied by the same body before the last election. The credit of having brought about this improvement belongs pre-eminently to M. THIERS. The gallant fight he has made against the mediocre absolutism of the Second Empire may hereafter be pleaded in extenuation of that severe sentence which history would otherwise pass on the apologist for the crimes of the First. The EMPEROR's conduct shows plainly enough the change which France has undergone. He has no reason, indeed, to fear an actual defeat, but his position might be seriously affected by a redistribution of parties which yet fell far short of a transfer of the majority to the Opposition. Under a true Parliamentary government the Sovereign stands in the same relations to all his subjects, no matter what may be their politics. Whether Mr. GLADSTONE or Mr. DISRAELI be at the head of affairs, it is equally the QUEEN's Government. But in France the Sovereign is simply the chief of the Imperialist party, and such a position as this can only be maintained with dignity when that party is co-extensive with the great mass of the nation. For the first ten years of the EMPEROR's reign it may be conceded that this was the case. By appealing to the Conservative instincts of the middle class, and by gratifying the popular taste for a spirited foreign policy, he maintained a personal ascendency analogous in some respects to that which Lord PALMERSTON possessed in this country during a portion of the same period. From various causes that ascendency has of late been greatly shaken, and it seems probable that unless he elects to repeat one or other of his old experiments, he must find allies outside the frontier of Imperialism pure and simple. In the present state of French parties he has virtually two courses between which to choose. One is frankly to accept Parliamentary government, with its accompaniment of responsible Ministers. To do this would be to disarm the most dangerous, because the most moderate, of his opponents. The advocates of that policy which is known as the Liberal Union would then have no quarrel except with M. ROUHER. If the Napoleonic dynasty were no longer bound up with the theory of personal government, it would cease to attract the hostility of any but Republican and Legitimist devotees. The special adherents of the "old parties" are daily growing fewer, and a school of politicians with whom the paramount importance of Parliamentary institutions is a principal article of faith is compelled for consistency's sake to rate at a far lower value the issue whether this or that family shall possess the constitutional throne.

It is probably the seeming easiness of this solution that has led to such mistaken explanations being hazarded in this country of the causes which stand in the way of its adoption. To give up the purposeless contest with the rational Liberalism of France seems to many Englishmen so natural a course, that when the EMPEROR rejects it, they are disposed to think that they must have mistaken the character of the party to which he shows such inexplicable hostility. They argue that this readiness to accept the Napoleonic dynasty which they have imputed to the French Liberals may, after all, be merely assumed to cloke an inveterate adherence to Legitimacy, or Orleanism, or Republicanism. If this is so, a certain degree of repression may be really essential to self-preservation, and the parties which compel the EMPEROR to put them down in his own defence have only themselves to thank for the inconveniences they incur in consequence. The fault of this theory is that it goes to the wrong quarter for its materials. There is nothing whatever to show that the French Liberals are playing the underhand game which is attributed to them, while there are reasons enough both in the position and in the character of NAPOLEON III. to account for his unwillingness to take them into his counsels. In the first place, such a step would involve a complete breach with his old friends, and a virtual abandonment of that complicated system of administrative control which he has built up with so much labour. This is not a slight sacrifice to ask of a man in the decline of life, more especially when the advantages offered in exchange for it have in reality no charms for him. The position of a constitutional King is perhaps of all others the one which has least attraction for NAPOLEON III. It would give no scope to his peculiar abilities, and no opportunity for the accomplishment of the ends on which he sets most value. If he cannot both reign and govern, he would no doubt prefer to govern without reigning rather than to reign without governing. We can conceive that amidst the growing difficulties which beset the part of a benevolent despot, he may sometimes yearn to be the first citizen of a great Republic, or the autocratic Minister of a great Monarchy; but in comparison with any one of the three, the life of a Sovereign who possesses neither initiative nor veto must seem altogether distasteful to him. And, after all, supposing him to put up with such a descent in consideration of a peaceable old age and an undisputed succession, what warrant has he for thinking that a reconciliation with the Parliamentary Opposition would give him the security he wants? Have the men whose speeches draw the largest crowds to the Corps Législatif, or whose articles are the most read, a weight in the country at all proportionate to their oratorical and literary reputation? Perhaps the EMPEROR has his doubts upon this point, and it must be confessed that the history of the last eighty years has not been without its share in suggesting them.

There remains, however, another alternative, and from more than one indication it seems possible that the EMPEROR has resolved to make trial of it. The Bill for the abolition of the Livret, the speech in which it was commended to the Council of State, and the known relations between the Tuileries and the Peuple, all point to an attempt to enlist afresh on his side the Democratic sentiment of the French working-classes. Without me, the EMPEROR may argue, France has only the choice between the Count of PARIS and a Republic. What the former would do for you, you may judge by the Government of July. You will gain nothing by exchanging NAPOLEON and universal suffrage for a citizen King and a bourgeois Parliament. The experience of 1848 can teach you what are your chances with a Republic. France needs order as well as liberty, and another Socialist revolution would inevitably be followed by another Conservative reaction, without perhaps another BONAPARTE to harmonize the two opposing principles. My enemies are yours, and it is my hand alone that can give you adequate protection against them. Only, to enable me to use my power for our common benefit, you must give me your support next month. Whatever else such an appeal might lack, it certainly would not be destitute of a considerable amount of plausibility.

NEWSPAPER REPORTS AND LIBEL.

A BILL is now before Parliament which, at the first glance, is not only calculated to enlist a good deal of popular sympathy, but is certainly contrived to conciliate the assent of the honourable craft to which we belong. The Saturday Review is not exactly a newspaper, but we live so close to the rose that we may be very fairly credited with having absorbed something, if not of newspaper perfume, at least of newspaper affinities. Mr. BAINES's Bill for the Amendment of the Law of Libel proposes to extend the immunities, or rather to remove the restrictions, of the newspaper press, especially with regard to reports of speeches made at public meetings. As the law now stands, any person aggrieved by being slandered by a speaker at a public meeting has his remedy against the proprietors of any newspaper which publishes a report of such slanderous speech. A newspaper proprietor incurs no responsibility for publishing reports of defamation and slander uttered in Parliament; and he enjoys equal immunity for any report of proceedings, whatever libel, slander, or defamation they may involve, which take place in a Court of Justice. What is now proposed is to extend this immunity to speeches uttered at a public meeting. The first question therefore which suggests itself to a thoughtful mind, and which probably on that account has not suggested itself to Mr. BAINES's mind, is—What is a public meeting? Mr. BAINES's Bill assumes a certain entity, as though it were well known and ascertained, and capable of legal definition, and describes it as "a meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful "purpose, open to reporters for the public newspapers, and "at which a reporter was present for the purpose of reporting "the proceedings of such meeting for a public newspaper." This description deserves to be investigated. "A meeting "lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose." There are, we venture to say, very few meetings which are not lawfully assembled, because meetings only come to be unlawfully assembled when expressly forbidden and prohibited by authority. There is no tap-room assembly, no convention meeting in the Reform League chambers, or at the Nag's Head in Leather Lane, which is primâ facie unlawful. A parish vestry, a meeting of gas and Crédit Foncier shareholders, a dinner given at Greenwich, not being unlawful, must be held to be lawful, and assembled for a lawful purpose. Any dinner or tea-meeting of gossipping and malevolent old women to which the parties choose to invite a reporter for the especial purpose of taking notes, and of publishing any scandal which may be uttered, is a lawful meeting, lawfully assembled. The definition covers any gathering together of two or three dozen, or even of two or three, people who choose to invite the presence of a reporter. Mr. BAINES's Bill does not even use the expression "public meeting" at all, though, if it did, it would be very hard to distinguish between a public and a private meeting. A Freemasons' assembly, the committee meetings of religious societies, any and every instance of two or more gathered together in a tap-room, with the presence of a reporter, all come under the notion of meetings lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose. To those peculiar minds smitten with the sacred desire of abusing their neighbours this Bill must offer peculiar attractions. If one wants to get one's neighbour vehemently suspected of being a rogue, or one's neighbour's wife openly charged with being no better that she should be, all that one has to do is to hire a room at the Pig and Whistle, subsidize a reporter, and get some foul-tongued man of straw to utter the libel, and one's amiable purpose is fulfilled. The meeting was a meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose, nominally and ostensibly for the object of discussing the parish rates, or the state of the parish pump or church clock, and in the course of the discussion an opening was found for uttering the scandal or defamation. Of course the local newspaper, the Eatanswill Gazette, publishes the report verbatim. It was interesting; it was a matter of public policy; it was important to the whole community to know that the Mayor had been openly charged, in a meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose, with being probably insolvent, or that the Vicar had been publicly said to have appropriated the offertory money. The report was published "in the ordinary course of business"—to use the words of Mr. BAINES's Bill—and is therefore to be privileged. The scandal helped to sell the particular number of the local journal, and whatever private wrong may have been committed, the public has its sport, and the newspaper proprietor his pence.

Mr. BAINES will answer:—This possible abuse is completely guarded against. The second and third clauses of the Bill provide a remedy. The person aggrieved may require the newspaper to publish a fair reply to, and contradiction of, the libel complained of; and further, the speaker of defamatory matter at such meeting lawfully assembled, even though not amounting to slander, is to be made liable for his spoken libel, so to say, as though it were an actual—that is, a printed—libel. These pretended safeguards are, however, not only absolutely nugatory and illusory, but really aggravate the vice of Mr. BAINES's Bill. The Bill proceeds on the assumption that no man has a right to complain that it has gone forth to the whole world, in print, that he has been publicly charged, with being a rogue, so long as it is open to him to require that his denial and contradiction of the charge of roguery should be made equally public. It is idle to argue against such a sophism, which would be ridiculous were it not mischievous. It assumes that everybody who has read, and further that everybody who has heard of, a piece of published defamation is bound to make himself familiar with the defamed person's defence and vindication. Alas! for poor human nature, but experience proves that it is very much pleasanter and more exhilarating, especially to the readers of the local newspaper, to remember, and to scatter, and to gossip about, the scandalous charge than to be at the trouble of studying, still less of circulating, the poor, dull, matter of fact, stupid contradiction. For a score of newspaper readers of the accusation there will hardly be one reader who will trouble himself with the defence. And as to the remedy which is provided in making the original speaker liable for the defamation, it is nothing more than a sheer mockery. The slanderer may be a man without a shilling, not worth powder and shot, a mere man of straw, hired and subsidized—for this is quite conceivable—for the mere purpose of slandering, by some secret wire-puller who wants his political or sectarian or private malice gratified with no liability on his own part. As the law stands, the newspaper proprietor is not only responsible, but his responsibility is backed by pecuniary means, upon which the aggrieved person can fall back; under Mr. BAINES's Bill there is no security whatever for a person slandered at a public meeting getting damages out of anybody. There is certainly a mistake about the preamble of the Bill. It ought to run thus:—Whereas it is expedient to facilitate the extension of defamation of private character, and to remove all impediments to the general diffusion of evil-speaking, lying, and slandering, and at the same time to increase the circulation and profits of small country newspapers, Be it enacted, &c. &c.

For this is the secret of the Bill. It is in these country newspapers, or in the miserable little local prints which infest the metropolitan suburbs, that attacks on private character made at so-called public meetings are to be found. The great London, and the leading provincial, papers have something better with which to fill their columns. They cannot give their valuable space to the contemptible wrangles and squabbles and vulgarities which attend such meetings lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose as, for example, a St. Pancras Board of Guardians or a Marylebone Vestry. If the curious in newspaper literature want to know what manner of public instructors they are for whose pecuniary interests Mr. BAINES is so anxious, we would recommend a perusal of the East London, or West London, local prints; the Shoreditch or Hackney Reporters, or the like. And, with exceptions which may be counted on one's fingers, there is hardly country newspaper in which he will not find reported some personal scurrilities, or some inuendoes on private character, or some unwarrantable interference with domestic life, and all uttered by the chartered libertines in public oratory, which are quite out of the way of the London press. Small communities deal with small interests and with petty affairs; and the local press, to be popular, must reflect the local mind; and the local mind loves scandal, and attacks on the private character of public men. For, after all, this consideration remains as the root of the whole matter. It is not in the public interest that the hasty and ill-considered gabble—to say nothing of the intentionally malicious talk—uttered at public meetings should attain more publicity than it already secures. We have enough, and more than enough, of newspaper reports and reporters of these quasi-public meetings. Scandal, backbiting, and slander are common enough, and strong language is more than common enough. Our existing opportunities for abusing each other can scarcely be said to be insufficient; and of what are called public meetings few of us will be disposed to complain that their liberty is, as at present, somewhat abridged. The question really is, whether we are called upon to encourage licentiousness in the expression of our judgment of our neighbours, and whether, under the pretence of protecting an important function of the newspaper press, we are not removing some of the safeguards which are at present provided for private character and private happiness.

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

THE anticipations entertained of the effect of an unusually early Easter have been fully realized by the Volunteers who went to Dover. What with contrary gales and contradictory orders, they had more than enough of difficulties to contend with; and they owe it to the determination of the Duke of CAMBRIDGE that their field-day did not utterly break down, with the consequence of discouraging similar displays in years to come. The unfortunate destruction of one of HER MAJESTY'S ships by the violence of the wind and the defects of her moorings seems to have struck terror into the hearts of the authorities, and it certainly did prove, what was otherwise sufficiently evident, that the weather was very dirty, and the day anything but what one would desire for the great Volunteer holiday. Still there were other things which were equally proved by the event. One was that, within half an hour of the order by which the review was countermanded and the men dismissed until three o'clock, the weather moderated sufficiently to allow of the whole programme being carried into effect; and as what happened in fact must have have been among the possible contingencies when the unlucky order was given, it is tolerably plain that the order was a mistake. Whether there was any material difference in the weather, when the Duke of CAMBRIDGE arrived, from what it was when the Volunteers were scattered by order over the town, is just one of those questions on which evidence is not likely to be very harmonious; but most people will conclude that the change in the command had more to do with the recall of the first order than the change in the atmosphere. If, as is possible, the wind and rain and sleet and snow, and the general amount of disagreeables, were sufficient (assuming that they would continue without mitigation) to justify the abandonment of a review to which more than 20,000 men had devoted so much effort, and on which some 50,000*l.* must have been spent, it is at any rate certain that the order ought to have provided for the re-assembling of the troops in the event of an improvement of the weather. The chief difficulty in collecting again the scattered units of the force arose from the conviction in the mind of each man that, as he had been ordered to fall in at three o'clock, and not before, the assembly which he heard sounded must be some special summons for other regiments than his own. That so large a proportion of the Volunteers understood and responded to the call in time to take part in the review is most creditable to the intelligence and energy of the men, and we cannot find much cause for complaint even against the small minority who contented themselves with obeying express orders, and never thought of inquiring about the meaning of the din of bugles which resounded through the town.

That the mistake was remedied at last is a subject for congratulation, but it is unfortunate that it ever occurred, and all the more so because General LINDSAY has apparently been dogged by an evil fate on all the great Volunteer occasions since he received his present appointment. The Portsmouth Review last Easter Monday was the first of these, and it will not be forgotten that, for reasons perhaps equally plausible, though very different from those which operated at Dover, that field-day was absolutely countermanded, and a mere march ordered to be substituted, and this only two or three days [before] that appointed for the rendezvous. Well, these orders [were] revoked, and the Review came off in consequence of the vehement outcry in the press, which brought the Railway Company to its senses, and restored the confidence of the inspecting general. But the mischief was not wholly repaired, for some of the Volunteers, who had given up the idea of getting up in the middle of the night and travelling 180 miles to go through the formality of a march past, could not again be assembled when, at the last moment, the Times managed to persuade Lord BURY'S Board of Directors and the War Office authorities that what they had pronounced an impossibility not only could, but must, be done. This was a very irregular way of procuring the recall of an obnoxious order, and we are glad that on the present occasion the same result was attained by the appearance on the field of a superior general. The next ill-starred review after Portsmouth was the never-to-be-forgotten Windsor gathering, when it was arranged that no Volunteer corps should be conveyed home except in the precise order of succession which had been put down on paper, and which of course it was impossible to maintain on the march. The lamentable consequence was, that the steady corps (forming the great majority) were kept fasting and wearying through half the night, while a few ill-disciplined companies were provoked into the only piece of insubordination by which the force has been disgraced. The next meeting at Wimbledon was marked by the same persistent ill-luck. After all the arrangements were made, or supposed to be made, one-half of the means of access was suddenly withdrawn by the Railway Company, and the force upon the ground dwindled to some 3,000 men. Dover, it was hoped, would be more auspicious, but at Dover again the elements were adverse, and once more the evil was aggravated by an order countermanding the review. These successive mishaps are much to be regretted, however difficult it may have been to avoid them, and the principle of poetical justice warrants us in indulging the hope that General LINDSAY'S run of ill-luck may have been exhausted, and that he may never again be placed under the necessity of countermanding at the last moment a long-prepared Volunteer Review.

The weather, which was the origin of all the mischief, made it difficult to form any satisfactory judgment of the movements performed, but there seems no reason to doubt that the men acquitted themselves as steadily and well as could fairly be expected under such unusually trying circumstances. Somehow or other the guns were got up and worked, and the men marched past, or approached as near to the execution of that much-lauded ceremony as the slimy condition of the ground permitted; and opposing lines were formed, and skirmishers thrown out, and heavy exchanges of innocuous musketry took place pretty much in the same way as if a bright and cheerful spring day had, as on so many former occasions, shone upon the Volunteer assemblage. And there is good perhaps to be extracted from this misadventure. If it has the effect of impressing upon all concerned the fact that Volunteers are no more proof against rain and cold and snow than other military or civilian human beings, it may do a world of good in improving the ordinary equipment of the force. Very few corps indeed are provided throughout with greatcoats or any equivalent protection from the weather. In some others a small minority only of the men enjoy these luxuries, while the great bulk of the force either face the weather with nothing better than a tunic, or turn out with a most unmilitary display of heterogeneous waterproofs. In future we may perhaps indulge the hope that those at any rate who were at the Dover Review of 1869 will learn to take a little better care of themselves. The really serious risk of exposure to such weather as that of Monday last, without any adequate protection, may very probably have been one of the main considerations which prompted the order countermanding the Review, and, however mistaken that order may have been, it was a severe trial to the constitutions of a body of civilian troops to undergo the pelting of the elements in the half-clad state which is the normal condition of a Volunteer regiment. It is unfortunately true that some corps, which already supply uniforms to their recruits, are too poor to add great coats to the outfit, and it may perhaps be said that they ought to remedy the defects of their equipment before they can be considered of sufficient value to entitle them to further encouragement or assistance. It is, however, equally true that many corps which are not troubled by financial difficulties have hitherto neglected to provide themselves with protection against the weather, which is not always as genial on great occasions as patriotic Volunteers and their friends would desire; and we must say that neglect of practical matters of this kind does indicate a lurking sense of the unreality of the whole organization. Equipment and organization are the two great wants of the force, and as the latter of these must depend entirely, and the former in some degree, upon Government action, there is no very immediate prospect of a complete reformation. This is no reason why the Volunteers should not do what is in their own power, and so perhaps at last succeed in shaming the Government to do their part also.

The position of the Volunteers out in the cold on the Castle Heights is a little typical of the aspect of the political sky at this moment; but even at Dover it was found that weather might moderate, and irresolution might be overruled; and so, too, let us believe that a warmer sunshine from official quarters may again greet the Volunteers, if not under the rule of Mr. CARDWELL, at any rate under the successor who in the whirligig of politics may some day chance to occupy his place. And in the meantime the best advice we can offer to the Volunteers is, to stick to their work, do their best for themselves without grumbling, and face all adverse influences as cheerfully as they faced the inhospitable gales of Dover.

DUELS.

THERE is nothing which the ordinary British mind contemplates with a greater sense of blank wonder than the continuance of duelling in foreign countries. It is not half a century since our statesmen thought it necessary on occasion to vindicate their honour with pistols; but we have already reached the point of view from which it seems not only wrong, but ridiculous. Cases may doubtless be put where a man might feel that nothing short of bloodshed would give him any real comfort; but it may be doubtful whether he would not, under such circumstances, follow the example of the young Canadian whose exploit appeared in the papers a few days ago, and prefer murder pure and simple. The gratification is much more certain; and, under the intense provocation which alone could make an English duel possible, a murderer would receive our sympathy almost as readily as a duellist. The heroes of novels manage to keep up the practice; and Mr. Trollope has even ventured to introduce one in the midst of his remarkably realistic sketches of modern Parliamentary life; but this is only another proof of the increasing difficulty of getting enough of exciting incidents out of the ordinary life of the period. For practical purposes, duelling has gone out as completely as witchcraft.

We are therefore simply amazed when we hear of French journalists being impelled to stab their antagonists in other than a metaphorical sense; and still more when we hear such stories as have lately come to us from Spain and Italy. Umbrellas are a fruitful source of social annoyance in the best-regulated families, but a difficulty about an umbrella does not with us lead to a promising young man being called out and shot dead; yet the only account vouchsafed to us of a late shocking duel in Spain is that it had something to do with an umbrella; though, to do the unhappy persons justice, it is suggested that some more adequate motive might have been in the background. In Spain, however, duelling does not appear to be common; whereas in Italy it has lately become quite a fashionable amusement. On the last occasion, we are told of a practised duellist going out, insisting upon the use of the deadliest weapons, and upon the shortening of the distance to five paces, and then gloating "with a ghoul-like delight" upon the prospect of one of the antagonists being speedily converted into a corpse. It is some satisfaction to hear that this ghoul-like young person was himself the sufferer. Meanwhile, General Bixio has thought it worth while to protest against the practice in the Chamber; and the Minister seems to have replied that, on the whole, public opinion was so much in favour of it that he did not expect that any repressive measures would be efficient. Upon this point we can of course form no definite opinion; we can only say, on general principles, that hanging and imprisoning have frequently a strong tendency to convince the public that the persons punished must have done something wrong; and perhaps a rigorous administration of the law would serve as well as the obvious arguments which prove that duelling, at the present day, is a brutalizing practice, and tends to exalt the bully more than the man of honour. Mere preaching has not been of very much use in any country; but most men, however brave they may be, have a sufficient dislike to serving as targets for pistol practice to avail themselves with tolerable readiness of any good excuse for an honourable evasion. The business of Government is to supply a man with sufficient motives for declining to fight, without being considered a coward; and we should imagine that, if Italian statesmen looked about them with a real wish to discover such a motive, they might find one nearer at hand than they seem to expect.

We can only wish that they may undertake the task vigorously and successfully; but it would be curious to determine what is the cause of the great difference between English and Continental feeling in this respect. We have given up the custom of accounting for such differences by the pleasant hypothesis that an Englishman is in every respect the most intelligent and moral of human beings. Indeed, it would be rather difficult, even if that hypothesis were generally admitted, to apply it to this particular case. The class from which duellists are raised is at least as numerous and as brainless in England as elsewhere. There are, for example, any number of young men in the army capable of committing any kind of folly and crime that may be fashionable amongst their fellows elsewhere. Lord Cardigan is gone, but we have an abundant supply in hand of the material from which Cardigans are made. There are, we must suppose, a great number of persons in the upper classes who really believe in the Guy Livingstone type of hero. It is probable, indeed, that the admirers of that tremendous athlete are not generally of the class which has much personal experience of the models from which he is drawn; we would hope that they belong rather to persons outside the enchanted circle, for whom an audacious portrait of the magnificent "swell" has this strange fascination, which would be dissipated on closer familiarity. Yet we can suppose that there are a good many youths who believe that that queer cross between Don Juan and the muscular Christian is really an admirable example of what a man should be; and who conceive accordingly that the highest graces of an English gentleman are great physical vigour, readiness to pay his bets, and eminence in certain practices which an austere moralist would set down amongst the vices. Amongst the other characteristics of such a hero, duelling would appear as a virtue by force of contrast; it is one of the most innocent of his amusements, and, so far as he is personally concerned, one of the most useful to the world at large. If he would fight with his fellows alone, we should be disposed to encourage the practice. Even admitting that the character does not really exist, and that his admirers do not often translate their creed into practice, there are enough living human beings who approximate to it more or less—though at a long interval—to prevent our explaining the absence of duelling by any excess of virtue. No one can say, for example, that the English heavy dragoon does not fight duels because he is too wise and too good. He is in little danger, to put it moderately, of suffering from over-exertion of his intellectual faculties; and his virtues, to do him justice, do not lie on the side of over-development of prudence. He puts as little value on his life as sensible people in general, and is quite ready to take such risks as come in his way, and to discover new modes of facilitating the loss of his services to the country. He has as little to do as his like in other countries, and we may presume that the same personage is anxious to provide him with work for his idle hands. Yet if we propose to the most thoughtless of English youngsters to fight a duel, he will consider it to be a practical joke; whilst his fellow in a German university is constantly playing, and sometimes more than playing, at duels, and in other countries even deadly duels are regarded with something more than toleration.

The most obvious explanation is in that peculiarity, whatever it may be, of the English character, which leads us to go about under a constant dread that we are making ourselves ridiculous. Whether we have a quicker sense of humour, or a smaller susceptibility to enthusiasm, than other persons, that is a dread from which no Englishman ever shakes himself free, and which never seems to hamper a grown-up man of Continental race. An English orator always keeps his arms glued to his side, and rather cherishes a stammer than otherwise, as affording a safe mode of escape from a difficult sentence. He is so terribly afraid of falling if he attempts too high a flight, that he prefers to keep almost ostentatiously close to the earth. He is utterly unable to understand the buoyant confidence in himself with which a Frenchman dashes into any mode of display, and appeals—frequently with success—to the admiration of his audience. Now it is plain that a duel is always perilously near the ridiculous. The ordinary common-sense view of the matter is so unpleasantly obvious: Two men have a difficulty about an umbrella, and one of them shoots the other dead. There is a certain pleasure in anticipating such a result, if only you can be sure that the general public will take your point of view and admire the gallantry displayed, and all the more because it was displayed about a trifle; but if nine people out of ten are certain to remark that you are a fool for your pains, there is nothing to set against the disagreeable fact of being converted into food for worms. If everybody took Hotspur's view of that catastrophe, and was prepared to plunge into the bosom of the deep and pluck up drowned honour by the locks, we might count upon their sympathy; but when a considerable majority think that there is much to be said for Falstaff's theory that "honour is a mere scutcheon," we are sensible of a decided chill to our enthusiasm. In England, for good and for bad, we have abundance of people who are ready to apply the Falstaffian catechism; to translate the question into pounds, shillings, and pence, and ask how much pudding is worth a given quantity of praise. If our inveterate habit of rather cynical criticism destroys some valuable enthusiasm, it also knocks a good deal of false sentiment on the head. We occasionally blow out our brains because we have lost more money than we can pay; but we very seldom go through that performance with a view to the dramatic interest of the situation to our survivors. The hero of the parody on Locksley Hall talks about a pan of burning charcoal underneath his nuptial bed, but we know that he is laughing at his absurdity as totally unworthy of British common sense.

We may perhaps, too, take some credit to that cynical and abusive personage, the English journalist. He is, as we are informed on the best authority, a terrible Philistine, and as such has a lamentable propensity for grovelling and prosaic views of everything that comes within his notice. Yet it is a bare act of justice to a class which is frequently ridiculed, to say that at least he does some service in repressing an absurd custom. No man of any taste or feeling could possibly fight a duel if he would only reflect that one result of his thoughtless performance would be that he would form the text of an article in the Daily Telegraph. Whether he was treated to the scathing satire or to the florid morality, the result would be equally depressing, for it would be equally certain to make him intensely ridiculous. It would add a pang to the fatal bullet to think of the glowing paragraphs in which the victim was presently to be held up to the gaze of the intelligent public. The penny-a-liner, with all his little weaknesses, is really the greatest foe to duelling in England. To the prevalence of such a custom it is necessary that there should be a class amongst whom it is regarded with a certain amount of esteem or serious consideration. But when you admit into the ring a whole crowd of persons who introduce an element of totally discordant sentiment, the case is altered. You are playing not ...... to the boxes but to the galleries; and have a profound consciousness that if you bring down applause in one quarter the remainder of the audience will be totally unsympathetic. Duelling is in civilized countries more or less a luxury of the upper classes; it is an exception for the lower strata to sympathize with the performance, though a general love of a fight may, as in Ireland, do something to supply the want of an acute perception of delicate points of honour. In England the press has virtually admitted the non-duelling classes to the representation, and the result is that their want of perception of any but its ridiculous side has quenched the ardour of the performers, and finally put a stop to the practice. It would be a good thing if public opinion was also on the side of intelligent persons with equal decision.

THE LONDON UNIVERSITY MATRICULATION EXAMINATION.

The University of London has not, we believe, a motto. May we venture to suggest that it would find one quite appropriate in that grand chorus in the Antigone in which the universality of man's power is celebrated? As the chorus is one of some fifty lines, even the University of London might find it inconveniently long for a motto; still it would fitly symbolize the vastness of its undertakings, and would at the first glance strike the aspiring student with that sense of awe which must come over him as soon as he looks through the pages of its Calendar, and surveys the examinations through which he has to pass. However, if, after mature reflection, the whole chorus cannot be adopted, why not take the first two lines?—

> πολλὰ τὰ δεινά, κοὐδὲν ἀν> θρώπου δεινότερον πέλει.

Or, as Dr. Donaldson gives it:—

> "Many the things that mighty be,
> And nought is mightier than—Man."

Sophocles, indeed, celebrates the wonders of man's intellect—how he crosses the foaming ocean while the stormy south is blowing; how he wearies out the untiring earth as his ploughs are drawn up and down; how he entraps the tribe of flighty-purposed birds, and the kindreds of wild beasts and the ocean brood; how he tames the mountain beast; how he has taught himself speech and social habits, how he has built himself a home against the shafts of comfortless winter and contrived means of escape from sickness. Sophocles celebrated man's intellect as far as he knew of its capabilities; the Matriculation Examination of the London University was not, unhappily, in existence in his time, or to what heights might not his Muse have soared? When at times we try to estimate all that the world has lost in the missing plays of Æschylus or of Sophocles, ought we not also to reflect upon the equally great loss that we sustain from the fact that the nineteenth century comes inevitably later than the fifth century before our era, and that now, when man's great powers are first discovered, the bards to celebrate them are for ever gone by? Many stout heroes lived before Agamemnon, no doubt, and are overwhelmed in obscurity—carent quia vate sacro. Yes, but many stout hearts have lived after the vates sacer, and have met with the same long night. It matters little whether an age is too early for its great poet or too late for him; it equally misses him. It is, however, pleasant to the mind to picture what might have been if the past were suddenly brought back to view the present, and to imagine how the great men of old would have looked upon our modern world. Would that Sophocles, for instance, with his chorus in praise of man's powers, could suddenly be brought face to face with man as he is seen any January or June in Burlington House, prepared to face the Matriculation Examination of the University of London. To cross the foaming sea may be something, to catch the birds, the fish, the wild beasts, to break in horses, to invent language, to build houses, to overcome sickness; all this may be well enough, but what would have been the language of the great poet when he found not old men, not middle-aged men, but mere youths of seventeen possessing "a competent knowledge" of arithmetic, algebra, geometry, mechanics, hydrostatics, hydraulics, pneumatics, acoustics, optics, chemistry, the Greek language, Greek history and the geography of Greece, the Latin language, Roman history and the geography of the Roman empire, the English language, the outlines of English history, modern geography, and the French or the German language, at the option of the candidate. Into what strophes and antistrophes would Sophocles have been led as the subject opened itself before him! But would Sophocles have ventured on such a theme? Æschylus alone could have done justice to such high-sounding words as hydrostatics and pneumatics. To descend from the height to which we have been carried, and to come down to this base world, we may perhaps be allowed, after reading the long list of subjects which the young aspirant to the glories of matriculation must take up, to congratulate both ourselves and him that "the use of the globes" is not added. In what exactly the "use of the globes" consists we have never been able to make out; however, as one can matriculate at the London University in ignorance of it, we are inclined to doubt if it is really any distinct branch of learning. It is some comfort too to find that a competent knowledge of the Latin language seems to be commensurate at times with an acquaintance with two books of Cæsar's Gallic War, while a competent knowledge of the Greek language is in like manner commensurate with an acquaintance with one book of Homer. However, as Johnson defines "competent" as "adapted to any purpose without defect or superfluity," we ought not perhaps to be over critical, for the Senate of the University of London alone, knowing to what purpose this competent knowledge of Greek and Latin can be put, can alone judge how far it is adapted thereto. If, however, outsiders were to hazard a guess, they might surmise that the purpose for which it is adapted is to carry a student through the Matriculation Examination at the London University; to this purpose it is adapted, certainly without defect and possibly without superfluity.

After surveying with admiration in the Calendar the list of subjects required, we turned over its leaves till we came to the Examination Papers that have been actually set. Is any one of our readers so happy as to know one of those young intellectual giants who matriculated at the London University in January 1868? If he has that happiness, he knows a man who can (or at least a year ago could) satisfy his most ardent pursuit after knowledge, and at once inform him, who were the Ærarii; what is the action and construction of the common pump; how to distinguish between a gerund and a gerundive; how to express 17 lbs. 10 oz. 6 dwts. 15 gr. as a decimal of 1 lb. troy; what is meant by frankpledge, escuage, danelagh, and escheats; how it is that a convex lens of short focal length enables one to see minute objects magnified; what is the Latin for He sent ambassadors to seek for peace; how to insert a given number of arithmetical means between two given quantities; what is the difference between the logical and the grammatical division of a proposition; how to decline bos in the singular and plural; how (on certain data) to calculate the percentage composition of ammonia; what were the Athenian βουλή and ἐκκλησία; how to inscribe a circle in a given triangle; how to draw a map of Great Britain; what is the first person present indicative active of ἵστημι; how to write the feminine of bon; and, finally, how much anhydrous phosphoric acid is formed by the combustion of one gramme of phosphorus (P=31). If any of our readers know such a prodigy as this, might we not fitly apply to them the words of Goldsmith:—

> And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew.

Now that Lord Brougham is dead, can any one man be named who could venture to present himself for matriculation at Burlington House without previous special training. The Editor of Mangnall's Questions alone might perhaps have a chance. We feel confident that, of the thirty-eight members of the Senate, there is scarcely one but would feel uncomfortable if he were required to answer all the papers that are set before these unfortunate youths. Could even Lord Stanley, with all his knowledge of common things, satisfy our eager curiosity about the anhydrous phosphoric acid, even though it be granted that P = 31? As for Mr. Grote or Mr. Lowe, we venture to predict that they would be plucked at the very entrance to their University. Who can tell us why it is that a youth of eighteen cannot be allowed to enjoy the educational advantages that the University of London offers unless he be prepared to undergo an examination in at least as many subjects as he has counted years? Let him be the best classic of his age in England, and yet be ignorant of the "general nature of acids, bases and salts;" let him be the best chemist of his age in England, and yet be ignorant of two books of Cæsar, and we may add of Henry's First Latin Book; let him be the best mathematician of his age in England, and yet be ignorant of the meaning of danelagh; let him be the best modern linguist of his age in England, and yet be ignorant of the action of the common pump, he may knock and knock in vain at the doors of the University of London. In contradistinction to the miserably narrow local examinations of the elder Universities, may not such an examination, embracing as it does nearly the whole of creation, be rightly called the Universal Examination? Henceforth let the long and inexpressive title of the Matriculation Examination of the University of London be dropped, and let that of the Universal Examination be assumed.

To speak seriously—if it be possible to be serious on such a topic—we would ask the Senate what it is that they propose to themselves to effect by this comprehensive examination? Do they mean to maintain that a young man cannot with advantage pursue his studies at a University unless he has a smattering of some eighteen or twenty subjects? Or do they intend by their examination not so much to exclude from their University those who have not diversities of gifts as to influence generally education throughout the country? It can scarcely be the case that even the Senate of the University of London would put a bar to a young man's continuance of his studies unless he could run the gauntlet of some eighteen examiners; but it is quite conceivable that they should, in their eagerness to stand as a mere examining body, sacrifice the interests of their undergraduates to what they conceive to be the interests of education at large. Arguing from some premisses unknown to us, they have come to the conclusion that a lad, when leaving school, ought to know a little, even if a very little, of a great many subjects. In accordance with this conception they have framed their matriculation examination; not that they can really believe that a lad of seventeen should not be allowed to pass from school to the University unless he know somewhat de omni re scibili et quibusdam aliis, but in the full knowledge that a matriculation examination to a great extent shapes the whole course of education given in those schools which specially prepare for it. They know well enough that if a University draws but one boy in twenty from any school, it can influence greatly the education of the other nineteen. The University of London, of course, can only influence directly the education of those who intend to matriculate at it; but indirectly it can influence at least ten times the number. In the first place, the schoolmaster, not knowing in all cases which of his pupils may to the University, tries so to prepare all that each one may, without much special preparation, be fit to enter; and, in the next place, finding himself forced to have some eighteen or twenty subjects taught, and not being able to afford to have special classes for the few, he makes all his pupils join them. Besides this, as we have said before, the London University aims at being to a great extent merely an examining body; its matriculation examination is a mixture between a matriculation proper and the senior middle-class examinations of Oxford and Cambridge. We infer this from the fact that not one in four of its matriculated students proceeds to his B.A. degree. Judging from these facts, and considering that in 1868 more than seven hundred candidates presented themselves for examination, we are not wrong in assuming, that over a large class of schools the University of London must exercise a great influence, considerably moulding the education of no unimportant part of the middle class. How far this influence is a good one we will leave to our readers to judge; at the same time, we cannot forbear speculating on the career for which the successful aspirants at these examinations are best adapted. There are two posts, and two alone, which require such varied attainments. The gentleman who is ready in the Family Herald or London Journal to give information to his numerous correspondents on every variety of subjects, from the composition of hair-washes to the exact age of the present Emperor of China, is doubtless a matriculated student of the University of London; and the Secretary of the Social Science Association can hardly fail to have attained the same distinction. Still the demand for a "Magnus Apollo" must be extremely limited, and the Social Science Association only requires one Universal Secretary at a time. About the destination of all the others we should feel extremely anxious, did we not remember that the mind has happily a wonderful power of forgetting, and that these prodigies of seventeen may, by the time they are one-and-twenty, have got their minds as free from rubbish as most of their fellow-creatures.

CURIOSITIES OF CANVASSING.

WHO that has had anything to do with an election, except of course a professional canvasser, does not wish to see the day when law or custom, or a happy union of the two, shall have abolished the custom of candidates personally asking electors for their votes? The thing is a nuisance, and a costly nuisance, and it is something worse. It is a practice which puts the relations between the elector and the candidate on an utterly wrong footing. When a man who wishes for a seat in Parliament asks an elector for his vote, when, as the phrase is, he "solicits"—that is, in English, begs—for the vote, he teaches the elector to take a wrong and a low view of the vote which he asks for. Out of Utopia there perhaps never was a commonwealth where every man, of his own free will and as a matter of the highest duty, went and voted for the man whom he conscientiously thought most likely to serve his country. But, if this ideal be unattainable, we should at least get as near to it as we can. We should not wilfully produce an opposite ideal. Now, when a candidate personally begs for a vote, he practically teaches the elector that in voting for him he is doing him a personal favour. And the elector may perhaps not be slow to draw the inference that for doing a personal favour he ought to receive a personal reward. Before we get to ideal purity of election, before we get within a great many parasangs of it, electors must be taught that, in voting for a man to be a member of Parliament, they are doing him the greatest possible honour, they are showing the greatest possible trust in him, but they are not doing him any personal favour. If they think him the best man for the place, it is their duty to vote for him; if they do not think him the best man for the place, it is their duty to vote against him. No doubt this is a hard saying to many people who have their ideas all formed on the present corrupt system. No doubt it will take a great deal of trouble to get it generally acknowledged, and, till the complete regeneration of human nature makes all government, and therefore all elections, needless, it never will be universally acknowledged. Still it is the right ideal, and it may as well be aimed at as far as human weakness allows, and it need not be wilfully departed from.

The practice of canvassing is something like the practice of private war in the middle ages. The peaceably disposed man had to fight just as much as the turbulent man, because the turbulent man was always attacking him. We can even, in such a state of things, conceive two peaceably disposed men going always armed for fear of one another, ever and anon perhaps crossing swords with one another, simply because neither could take in the truth that the other was peaceably disposed. So we can conceive two candidates on opposite sides both sincerely wishing to get rid of canvassing and its attendant evils, and yet each afraid to set the example for fear of the other. And we can conceive two candidates each ready to set the example, and both of them hindered from doing so by men about them whose interest it is that the evil practice should not be given up. Still, if we have any faith in progress, we must trust that the thing will some day die out somehow or other. And meanwhile the ill wind, like other ill winds, blows some little incidental good. To go through a canvass as a candidate or as the companion of a candidate greatly increases a man's knowledge. It opens to him many aspects of human nature, both bad and good, which he would otherwise have very little chance of seeing.

We say both bad and good, for it is quite a mistake to think that an election brings out only the bad side of human nature. It does certainly bring out the bad side very conspicuously, but it brings out much that is good as well. On the whole, the better side of an election comes out on the public stump, and the worse on the private canvass; still good and evil are mingled in both processes. The man who goes through an election will understand as he never understood before the prodigious power of lying with which mankind are gifted; he will come across many instances of cunning and selfishness, many cases of broken promises, many specimens of false brethren who are chiefly bent on their own interest. But he will come across, and we think in at least equal proportion, many instances of honest, high-principled zeal, many instances of genuine devotion to a cause, many specimens of men ready to give wholly unbought service, to sacrifice time, money, and trouble, with no thought but that of helping the side which they honestly believe to be right. And such men are not confined to any particular class. An election brings a man across all classes, and if in all classes he finds men who disappoint him, he also in all classes finds men who act in a single-minded and conscientious way according to the principles which they profess. On the whole, an electioneering campaign does not make a man think the worse of his fellow-creatures.

Still it is not to be denied that the more personal canvass is a very grievous ceremony, and that it brings out much more of the dark side of an election than of the bright. For it is clearly not for the zealous and high-principled elector, who votes as he thinks it his duty to vote, that the process of canvassing is needed. His vote comes of itself to the candidate; it is the votes of electors of a different stamp that the candidate has to go and ask for. And yet, after all, much of the nuisance which a candidate has to go through on a canvass arises from weaknesses of human nature which, though the source of infinite annoyance, are in themselves really very pardonable. The process of canvassing puts the elector, for the time, into a position of superiority to a man who, at other times, is in a position of superiority to him. He must be more than human if he does not enjoy the little scene of a man of whom at other times he has to ask things coming to ask something of him. The candidate is commonly a richer man, a better-known man, than himself; he may be a man to whom he is used to listen as a speaker or writer; he may be a man before whom he has trembled at the bar of justice. It is not wonderful if he likes the feeling of seeing the man to whom he is used to bow down for once bow down to him, and if he likes to prolong the moment so flattering to his own dignity. He means all the time to vote all right, but he likes the tribute of the candidate's personal visit and personal solicitation; he even likes, with a sort of grim pleasantry, to prolong his exercise of superiority by keeping the petitioner for a little while in suspense. If the thing happened only once, it would be amusing; it is only because it happens over and over again, and wastes a vast deal of time, that it becomes a bore. Still it is natural and pardonable; on mature reflection one can even forgive the cruellest form of the torture. This is when a man who fully means to vote for you will not give his promise and let you go till he has made you listen to his views on all matters. The most refined form of this cruelty is when a Dissenting minister keeps you to hear his homily on Church and State. Yet you can forgive him; he has the opportunity, which human nature will not forego, of preaching to a man to whom he never had the opportunity of preaching before, to whom he may never have the opportunity of preaching again, and certainly will not have it very often. And, after all, he is clearly better than his orthodox neighbour, who holds that the end justifies the means, who makes his unlearned flock believe that a candidate, perhaps of special ecclesiastical tastes, is chiefly anxious to pull down the churches, who even teaches that Mr. Gladstone's accession to power involves a return to slavery, and the immediate beginning of autos-da-fé in the market-place. What, on the other hand, shall be said of the timid clerical supporter, who calls himself a Liberal, but who is frightened by Mr. Gladstone's attack on the Irish Church? You examine him in detail, and you find that the good man has actually been bamboozled into believing that Mr. Gladstone means to turn every Irish clergyman neck and crop out of his house and land without any compensation. You explain to him that no one means anything of the kind, and he is a little comforted, but the shock to his mind has been so great that he goes and votes for the Tories all the same. Then there is the clerical supporter who approves of Mr. Gladstone's scheme, because Popery is the Beast. The argument is subtle, but it may be followed. It is a sin to encourage the Beast or any of his beastly following. Therefore it is a sin to make a grant to Maynooth. But if the Irish Church is disestablished, the Maynooth grant will stop, while, if the Irish Church goes on, the Maynooth grant will go on too. Therefore let the Irish Church be disestablished. Clerical Liberals are so rare, that such a supporter has to be treated with every sort of deference. At the same time it must be a hard struggle to avoid laughing.

But, with all this, there is many a manly, honest, hearty elector, who acts from principle, who needs no pressing, who knows that the candidate has no time to waste, and who pledges his vote like a man at once. In the balance against such men must be set the crying grievance of neutrals. An open enemy does more damage at the poll, but you have more sympathy with him than with the man who "won't vote against you"; the man who professes to think you all right and to wish you all success, but who will not do anything towards bringing about that success. The numbers of this class are perfectly wonderful; they would, if they were got to vote, turn many and many an election. Some fear their landlords; and here is the provoking thing, that so many peo fancy intimidation where no intimidation is intended. The not of voting for the landlord, or at least of not voting against him, is so worked into their minds that, even when the landlord is not in the least disposed to coerce his tenants, people will not believe that it is so, but still fancy that they must not vote against him. Others fear their customers. Others fear their neighbours; in some parts the most real danger of the three. Others simply shrink from the trouble, "There'll be plenty without I," and so many an election is lost, not by the votes of enemies, but by the non-votes of professed friends. For the man who is very old and wishes to withdraw from all worldly matters before he dies, one has a certain respect. Still it is easy to answer that to vote according to his conscience is one form of doing his duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call him.

Another point which a canvass shows is that Miss Becker and her sisterhood, Lily Maxwell, Mary Boddy, and the rest of them, are beginning at the wrong end. What is really wanted is not so much that widows and old maids should vote as that, when a man declines to vote, his wife or daughter should be allowed to vote for him. Many a small freeholder, whose heart shrinks from voting himself, has a wife or daughter who would come zealously to the poll. Indeed in some parts it is seriously believed that, on the principle of the annus post mortem, when an elector dies, his widow may give his vote at any election which happens within twelve months after his death. This, however, is one of the errors which a candidate has to expose, along with the beliefs that a plumper counts two, and that a man can never vote for two candidates of the same colour. But the zeal of the women, as a rule, is great. We have heard of boroughs in which the tactics of Lysistrata are said not to be unknown.

One thing which struck many people at the late election, besides the absurd fear of pulling down churches, lighting the fires of Smithfield, and such rubbish, was the way in which a more rational dread about the Irish Church had affected classes which one would hardly have expected to be touched by it. Not only squires and parsons, but respectable tradesmen in country towns, undoubted Liberals on all other points, refused to vote for Liberal candidates, not on any wild Murphyite ground, but on a sober conscientious objection to the scheme of disendowment. When a cathedral singing-man says plaintively, "The Church has nourished me and I can't vote against the Church," one pities rather than condemns.

Lastly, it is curious to mark, within the same county or division, the strong local character of political parties. As a rule, the Liberals have the majority in market towns and manufacturing villages, the Conservatives in country places. The large farmers, we need hardly say, are commonly Conservative. Not but what there is a considerable Liberal minority, and there is no better Liberal than the Liberal farmer. He is, on the face of it, a man of thought and independence, who has risen above the prejudices of his class. But the smaller freeholders are largely Liberal, and their wives, as we have said, more Liberal still. Again, besides the division according to classes, the e are distinct local divisions. There are Conservative towns and villages, and there are Liberal towns and villages, Conservative or Liberal not according to the influence of landlords, but according to a sort of hereditary point of honour. But a marked difference may be seen between the two. The Conservative village resounds with shouts of "Blue, blue." It gets no further; it has no names of men or of measures; it sometimes does not even know the names of its own candidates. The Liberal village can at least shout "Free Trade," and if to shout Free Trade is not to give a very exhaustive view of all the questions at issue, it is at least right as far as it goes, and it is anyhow more intelligent than shouting the name of a colour, whose meaning is purely arbitrary, and which means different things in different parts of England.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON TRADE-UNIONS.

If the conclusions of this long-expected Report were as satisfactory as its evidence is interesting and its subject-matter is important, it would be one of the most useful and striking documents ever issued by any body of Commissioners in this country. For it is only a truism to say that nothing affects the wealth of the kingdom and the prosperity of the people more than the condition of its trade; and the condition of its trade depends in the main upon the relations which exist between the employers of labour and the employed. No gratitude, no reverence, would be too extravagant a tribute to the merit of those men who should propound a feasible solution of the difficulties which now warp the industrial organisation of the country, and who should put the gear of that composite piece of machinery in sound working order. But the present Report will not earn this gratitude. It contains indeed much valuable matter, many interesting facts, and many ingenious suggestions; but it does not lay down conclusively a principle by which we can bring the energies of the capitalist and the labourer into normally harmonious co-operation. In fact, it is not one Report, but three Reports. Instead of concentrating the rays of combined intelligence into one focus, it gives us scattered and conflicting waves of light, which perplex and darken, instead of illuminating, our minds. We have a Report from seven of the eleven original Commissioners; we have a dissentient Report from two; and we have another Report (more thoroughgoing than the first) from a third. The active mind of Mr. Herman Merivale has indulged itself by a little independent excursion into the regions of abstract theory, and Sir W. Erle has appended a statement respecting the present laws in force on trade combinations, which is perhaps the most valuable portion of the whole Report.

Before we criticize the Reports, we may as well give a brief summary of the substance of each. The principal Report avers that the object of a Trade-Union is not only to fulfil the ordinary purpose of a Friendly or Benefit Society, by raising superannuation allowances for disabled, and providing for the funeral expenses of deceased, members, but also to obtain for the working members the highest amount of wages and the shortest duration of work. This object, it says, is effected by the system of "strikes." Of these strikes we have treated before, in our review of the evidence which was from time to time adduced before this Commission. The Commissioners further point to the many collateral objects involved in the general objects of the Unions; to the monopoly of labour and enhancement of its price caused by the limitation of apprentices, and the disallowance of piece-work and of female labour. Sometimes this monopoly of labour embraces a whole district, as in the case of the Manchester Bricklayers' Union, which will not allow any bricks to be set by its members unless they have been made within the district. The Commissioners touch on the various rules enforced by the Unions, such as those by which a mason is prohibited from working at a brick, a bricklayer from working at a stone, and the man who is leading from proceeding at a rate more rapid than the slowest of his followers; and by which a master resident at Manchester, when engaged on a contract out of that city, is compelled to take half of his men from Manchester, and only half from the place where he works. They quote the words of a member of the Operative Society of Stonemasons, to show how entirely one-sided these rules are. "They are made," this witness acknowledges, "not for men but for masters; we do not take masters into the account; . . . . we merely look on them as men who step in with their capital, and who want to get the greatest profit they can out of their capital, while we want to get the greatest profit we can out of our labour." The Commissioners notice also the associations of the masters which have been formed with the object of obtaining labour on the cheapest terms, and, generally, for purposes of self-defence against the Trade-Unions. With regard to the moral effects of these Unions, the Commissioners report that they have impaired the character of the workmen in their conduct towards the masters, have destroyed the mutual confidence which used to exist between the two parties, and introduced a spirit of antagonism and jealousy. They assert, too, that there is evidence to show that, while this so-called "independence" of the workman towards his master has been developed by the Unions, his real independence, self-reliance, and ambition to distinguish himself by the excellence of his work have been discouraged. The reply of the Unions is, that they have taught the workman no longer to regard himself as an insulated being, subject to oppression and wholly dependent on his master, but as a member of a powerful combination able and ready to protect his rights. The Commissioners hesitate to pronounce on the absolute truth of either statement, but admit that the old tone and character of the relations between master and workman are changed, and that it is hopeless to attempt to revive them. With respect to the effect of the Unions on the trade of the country, the seven Commissioners hesitate to aver positively that the decline of this or that particular trade is due entirely to their action. The masters assert that foreign competition has been enabled, by the agency of the Unions, and the demands which they inspire, to damage the export trade of England; but the seven Commissioners report that this has not been proved to their satisfaction.

Under these circumstances, it becomes a question whether there ought to be any additional right on the part of the workmen to combine, and any additional privileges attached to their combinations. At present, no Trade-Union is entirely legal in its working. All the Unions extend the statutable powers given them to cases to which the permissive powers of the statute are not applicable. Should these powers be extended beyond the limit now allowed by law? The Commissioners' Report is in favour of an extension. They hold that the workmen should be at full liberty to combine for the purpose of enforcing demands to which, if they were not backed by numbers, the master would never accede. But, while they allow this right, they would disallow any contracts involving restraint of trade, and they would retain clauses to prohibit the Unions or their managers from interfering with the freewill of any workmen, whether belonging to the Union or not, who wished to make their own terms with the masters. The weakness of such a proviso is obvious enough. This part of the subject naturally brings the Commissioners to consider the system of "picketing," which they recognise as an unjustifiable interference with the right of the workman to dispose of his own labour on his own terms. They admit the right of workmen to combine in bodies; they admit the right of other workmen to make separate bargains on their own account; and they deplore the abuse of the powers which combination gives to one body of workmen to bully and menace another. For picketing they consider the present law sufficient. The only additional legislative remedy which they propose—or, rather, which the majority of the Commissioners propose—is an enactment that no combined agitation or stipulation shall be illegal merely as "being in restraint of trade"; the rest they would leave to the common law and to the intelligence and good feeling of the workmen. Having thus defined the limits within which Trade-Unions ought to be permitted to act, they proceed to provide the means of giving them a legal status. They propose to register the Unions much in the same way as Friendly Societies are registered, subject to certain conditions, from which some of the Commissioners dissent, and most of the Unionists would be sure to dissent. They further suggest, in a vague way, that Unions for trade purposes might be kept distinct from Unions for benefit purposes, and that such as comply with this and other stated conditions should be registered as First-Class Trade-Union Benefit Societies.

The legislative remedies proposed in this Report are, it will be observed, few. It recognises the evils of the relations at present subsisting between masters and servants, but it can find no remedy beyond the legalization of the Unions on terms to which, as the Commissioners do not unanimously accept them, it is not likely that the Unions will themselves assent. Co-operative partnerships, in the strict sense of the word, the Report shows, have no real existence; and the partnership which is always cited as having the nearest resemblance to them—namely, that of Messrs. Briggs—is shown to be practicable only in certain kinds of business. Finally, of the grand expedient of which Mr. Mundella has proclaimed himself the prime inventor and most zealous exponent, and which is eulogized by the Commissioners—the Board of Conciliation—though it may very often be applicable, too little is known to warrant a confident belief that it is capable of flourishing everywhere and under all circumstances.

It will be seen then that the majority of the Commissioners give a general assent to the assertion of the evils predicated and the remedies proposed; of the mischiefs which the Unions produce, and the difficulty of mitigating them; in fact, they say a word all round, partly in favour and partly in reproval of both sides and the respective conduct of each, and end with recommendations in which they do not appear to have perfect faith themselves. But if the Report of the majority is of a neutral tint, no one can say the same of the Report of the dissentient minority. Messrs. Hughes and Harrison have no doubts. Matters which to the judgments of Sir W. Erle, Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Merivale are doubtful or questionable, are to them clear as the noonday sun. Lord Lichfield appears to adopt some of their conclusions, but not the arguments which lead to them. The other two enter largely and zealously on what may be termed a general defence of Trade-Unions, and the advocacy of their unrestricted and unconditional legalization. Space fails us for any but a very brief summary of the two Commissioners' opinions. A fuller account of their views and a comment on them must be deferred for the present. They begin by pointing out the growth and extent of Unionism. According to a statement made by an interested person, the number of Unionists in the country must now exceed 800,000; and among them are the bulk of the skilled artisans. They appeal to the high character and extensive influence of such Unions as the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and the Amalgamated Carpenters, as a reason for giving a legal recognition to bodies which are both so powerful and so useful. They justify the policy of the Unions in rejecting piecework, limiting apprenticeship, and fixing a minimum of wages. They praise these institutions directly for raising the cost of production. They eulogize them for the benefits which they confer, as insurance offices, on the working-classes. They deny that they have injured the trade of the country. Not content with standing on the defensive, they boldly take the line of aggression, and assail the policy of the Masters' Associations. Having satisfied themselves that the employer enters the labour-market with unfair advantages on his side, they contend that the workman can only redress the balance by the agency of the Unions. Unionism appears to them "the exact correlative of competition. The stronger prefer to pursue their ends by means of competition, the weaker by combination." They justly quote the collateral benefits conferred by some of the Unions in aiding workmen during periods of illness or distress, and assisting them to emigrate or to seek new fields of employment. On this score we suspect the two Commissioners could not stand a sifting cross-examination. That the three or four best-managed Unions are of great use simply as Benefit Societies we do not doubt, but that the bulk of them do much for their members, except in cases of strike, we fancy is very doubtful. And we do not believe that any one of them could fulfil the double object of maintaining its disabled members and supplying a superannuation fund for its able-bodied members during a long strike, without the certainty of insolvency. In fact, not more than five of the Unions profess to provide a superannuation fund; and of these the Amalgamated Engineers and the Amalgamated Carpenters are pronounced by actuaries to be virtually insolvent. But we shall revert to this point hereafter.

At considerable length, and with no inconsiderable repetition, the two Commissioners dilate on the beneficial effects of the Unions to the men, their harmlessness to the trade of the country, and the injustice of putting them in a worse position than the Masters' Associations, which are allowed to employ their tactics of combination unchecked. And they conclude their zealous advocacy by proposing that the Unions should be recognised by law, without any restrictions directed against "restraint of trade"; that they should be certified by the Registrar, and should deposit with him annual statements of receipt and expenditure; that they should be on the footing of Friendly Societies, capable of appointing trustees, and entitled to summary remedies against fraud and embezzlement; and that those statutes under which "picketing" is now punishable should be repealed. Of this Report it may fairly be said that it is not, like the Report of the majority, a compromise.

STEEPLE-CHASING.

If we are inclined to define a steeple-chase as an ingenious combination of the maximum of evil with the minimum of sport, we may confess at the same time that a deal of entertainment may be found at it. We except the Grand National, the Grand Military, and other grand meetings, where that redeeming point is very generally wanting. At these the professional element is in the ascendant, and the amateurs so closely imitate their professional models in seat, style, talk, and everything else, that there is little to choose between the one and the other. The whole ceremony wears a grave, business-like air, redolent of allowances calculated to an ounce, and odds shaded away to the fraction of a point. But the provincial and suburban meetings are really amusing. Ambition takes a protean variety of shapes, and it may be a good thing, in the universal progress of the world, that it should be so. Too often, however, ambition the most intelligent and laudable only succeeds in crowning itself with ridicule, and seldom is this more conspicuously the case than with aspirants to the honours of the Turf and the hurdles. Most Englishmen who keep a horse, or are in the way of borrowing one, regard as an item in their inalienable birthright the ability to sit and the skill to guide him. We should be sorry to be so false to our national superstitions as to say they are generally wrong. But there are horsemen and horsemen, and the rough-rider in an English livery-stable might find himself puzzled to break a bare-backed mustang among the guachos, or even to sit an Australian buck-jumper in the bush. A gentleman may show very creditably across a fair sporting country in the ruck of the field, and yet own that his ambition has overleaped itself for once when he sees himself in silk and a light racing-saddle before a crowd of candid and outspoken critics. He might pass muster well enough among brother jockeys, picked even from the first flight of his hunt; as it is, if cursed with any modesty or sense of humour, he recognises that he is there in his bashful awkwardness as a foil to the shrivelled, case-hardened, confident, highly-trained professional who has taken his measure at a glance, and eyes with a contemptuous leer his efforts to get on an understanding with his horse. Before they are warmed to their work, novices in the saddle remind one of nothing so much as the performing monkeys that ride the dogs in steeple-chases at Astley's. The monkey can stick to anything, and will keep his seat so long as his mount keeps his legs; but it pains the right-thinking spectator to see any creature so clearly out of his element, to mark the pitiful expression when he is coming to a hurdle, the obvious self-gratulation when he has placed that danger behind him. Monkeys are the chartered buffoons of the animal kingdom, but you cannot help fancying that in circumstances like these, profoundly conscious of pushing burlesque into tragedy, they deprecate your yielding to your sense of the ridiculous. So it is with the amateur steeple-chase rider when he is fairly out of the weighing scales and on to his horse. As he passes the Stand with the hard-mouthed brute bearing heavily on his wrists, and throwing his head wildly about in his face; as the unaccustomed saddle feels like a sheet of brown paper beneath him, and he scarcely feels at all the reins in his hand; as he realizes that he is the cynosure of sarcastic eyes and the butt of scurrilous tongues, he has a pang of self-contempt at ever having been deluded into accepting the flattering offer of a mount, and the sensation does not tend to restore his self-confidence. He has been in violent and spasmodic training for ten days past, and the result has been to depress his spirits at least as much as to have lowered his weight. His present surroundings are not calculated to exhilarate him. The bitter wind blowing off the bleak fields cuts through his thin jacket like a hundred-bladed penknife, drives the hail and sleet in his face, and pastes his wet sleeves to his arms. When the course is not through a sea of mud, it lies over holding clay. By the time he is with the starter, the strain on his arms has numbed them to the shoulders; it is sight, and not sensation, that tells him his hands are still where they were; and he feels that, once dismissed from the post, he will be as much at the mercy of his steed as Mazeppa or John Gilpin. If riding has anything to do with racing, he is certain to be nowhere. His sole chance is that his horse may be a miracle of speed and staying power, may take the running into his own hands, and land the dead weight upon his back first, should he keep within the flags and not blunder at the fences. This, we venture to say, is not over-coloured sketch of an average performance by one of those bucolic patrons of the Turf who dream of witching the sporting world with their noble horsemanship.

Perhaps it may not be in all cases mere selfish ambition that sends men volunteering in a service where the dangerous and ridiculous blend in about equal proportions. There may be those who concern themselves so warmly in the sport as to be ready to risk neck, ribs, or limbs to promote its interests. It is the danger to the performers that gives it its zest with the onlookers, and a sporting character who has invested in a railway return-ticket, to say nothing of another to the Stand, feels as disgusted after a bloodless day as the majo at a bull-fight when the too cautious picador has declined to shorten his lance. It is to the amateurs that the enterprising promoters of the meetings look to furnish materials for the chapter of casualties. Amateurs not only find them exceedingly dangerous to themselves, but make them the cause of dangers to others; and if you left the races under present conditions entirely to professional riders, the number of accidents would dwindle lamentably. Not that we care to lay much stress on this consideration, for danger there must be in one shape or another. Casualties, although not acknowledged to be so, are as essential a part of the programme as anything else; and if the stewards could not tempt muffs to ride, they would be driven to increase the perils of the jumps. That, however, would induce a rise in the tariff of the jockeys, and might consequently exercise a deterrent effect on the entries. On the principle that volenti non fit injuria, it is evident that moral arguments are in favour of a system that finds volunteers to risk their necks to make a British holyday, instead of bribing hirelings to do it. So far as accidents to the men are concerned, we take no great exception to steeple-chasing either on moral or utilitarian grounds, not believing that—be the number of mishaps what they may—the country will lose by them more intelligence or virtue than it can easily spare. The charge of cruelty to animals is less easily disposed of, and it is more doubtful how far the Legislature is justified in tolerating a sport where danger to animal life is among the chief attractions. Ride round the course when it is carried away over distant fields, and you see it pass over fair fences and moderate ditches. Supposing tolerable hunters to be decently ridden, in its outlying points it involves no more risks than are inseparable from a pleasant day's hunting. But come to the in-and-out posts and rails, and the water-jump within view of the Stand, and you have evidently the scenery for the sensation scenes of the drama, when you have a right to expect the thrilling dénouement. As the afternoon grows old the "takes off" become cut up, and as the bank crumbles away your chances of excitement multiply in a geometrical progression. More especially if the day has been a wet one, it is hard indeed if you have not a broken-backed horse or two, and a crushed rider or so, to enliven your talk in the way home. When anything of the sort does happen, it is delightful to see the brightening up among the faces of the crowd, like a gleam of sunlight falling on them from the wintry sky. You see that something like gratitude lies latent in the roughest specimens of humanity, for when the shattered man is carried past, stretched on the board, after the pistol-shot has told that his horse's last race is run, the bystanders become almost sentimental in their cheery satisfaction at the pleasure he has given them all.

If roughness be, as many Englishmen maintain, synonymous with manliness, there can be no doubt that steeple-chasing is among the most manly of our sports. The philanthropist assisting at any of the suburban field-days must acknowledge they conduce to more than one good end in an old overcrowded country like our own. They are the very carnivals of the criminal, the holydays when the hard-working felon-class gets large draughts of fresh country air and adulterated country beer. They come as near to innocent amusement as anything the law-breaking rough is ever likely to enjoy; for although he does not of course neglect business should it come in his way, and though Providence may chance to send him a "yokel" to be robbed and knocked about as he makes his way in the dusk to the railway station, yet on the whole he restricts himself to swearing, drinking, gambling, obscenity—all comparatively harmless recreations, and in keeping with the purer associations of the country. We should say steeple-chases have a decidedly elevating effect on him, and are so far of course a clear gain to society. But it may be questioned whether this is not outweighed by the influences they exercise on the country population. Hodge sacrifices a day and its wages to the race, gets rid of any loose silver or copper he may have in his pockets, and incapacitates himself for work, for the morrow at the very least. It can scarcely be expected that he should go back in a contented spirit to his toil, after coming in contact with the fascinating sinners from East London, whose pleasant flow of talk has all the charm that can be imparted by a poetic garnish of strange oaths, and a romantic disclosure of unsuspected experiences. If Hodge has the means of standing treat, in the genial familiarity of the ale-cup the graduates of Portland and Milbank will condescend to his innocence, and from a criminal point of view enlighten him as to undreamt-of openings for the labour of the working-classes. Hodge scratches his head, half inclined to despair before the gulf that divides him from the accomplished man of the world whose acquaintance he has made; but the next time he is under pecuniary pressure he modestly tries his hand at pilfering from his master, whose intelligence, as he justly reflects, is relatively on a level with his own. Nor are drinking and good society the only pleasures he enjoys on the course. Ranged along the Stand enclosures are the rows of gaming-tables, where chivalrous capitalists more or less out at elbows hold their banks against all comers. Shabby as these tables look, metaphorically their owners play on velvet. All is fish that comes to their nets, crowns or coppers, and Hodge discovers a fresh pleasure and carries away a new remorse. The farming aristocracy, as well as the peasantry, find the means of present excitement and future embarrassment all ready to their hands. The financiers of the Turf, leviathans, tritons, and minnows, with their little stools and tables, their cards in their hats, their leather bags slung to their persons, must make a good deal of money in one way or other. The gentlemen who ride to the ground in country-cut boots and breeches, and dogskin gloves a couple of sizes too large, ape the sporting magnates of the great meetings, and burn their fingers accordingly. Generally speaking, they feel bound, in honour and parochial patriotism, to stand upon the horse or man they know by sight, although the golden rule on which they ought to go would be to lay against these to their last shilling. The betting men seethe them, so to speak, in their mothers' milk, and fleece them through their amiable weaknesses. We should say the prevailing feelings in a country neighbourhood, the day after a steeple-chase, must much resemble those of the Egyptians when they stared shamefacedly on one another on discovering that they had been generally victimized by the Israelites. But it might be hard on certain vested interests to discourage these games, seeing that those who suffer by them most are the last to complain. To suppress them would be wantonly to interfere with the exercise of private judgment among country fools of all classes, as well as to make a serious inroad on the constitutional rights of the bankrupt publicans who get them up, the blacklegs who pull their horses at them, and the lawless and predatory classes who attend them.

THE NORWICH MURDER.

THE pictorial, and in the worst sense of the word the sensational, character of the recent trial at Norwich is a misfortune. The details of the case unfortunately were such as to invite professional writers of nonsense to outdo themselves in piling up agonies for the benefit of romantic readers. Sober people perhaps may have been repelled from giving to this extraordinary case the attention that it deserves by the extravagant and mischievous writing which has been poured out about it. When the romance of murder is exaggerated, the crime itself, and the important public interests involved in the proof of the crime, are apt to be lost sight of. The newspapers which give themselves up to fine writing on the most horrible incidents of human life and human guilt seem to have taken up the case more as a canvas on which to display the most frenzied and grotesque feats of disagreeable word-painting, than as a serious matter of calm and passionless judicial investigation. In the Norwich tragedy they found an easy illustration of the popular, and convenient, maxim that murder will out. They have been able to show that the conscious earth refused to hide the evidence of crime; that justice, though slow and hesitating, is certain; and that in the last and dreadful alternative a strong and invincible compulsion forces the criminal himself to be his own accuser; and we are assured that the conscience which makes cowards of us all is the instrument of righteous retribution, and that no mystery of murder, however long concealed, can in the long run baffle these impressive vindications of a providential interference to detect great crime. Unfortunately for this excellent talk, we cannot forget that murders very often are not discovered, and that the confession of a murder eighteen years after it has been committed is an occurrence perhaps unprecedented. But to have said this would have cut off the happy chance which the case presented to the writer of an article in one of the London newspapers for the most spasmodic writing of the season, as where he remarked, in speaking of the discovery of the ghastly remains of the murdered woman's body, that "the very heavens were raining on horror's head accumulated horrors," and observed, with more pathos than perspicuity, that the concealment of the crime was "a rank growth of mystery which rotted slowly away on the stalk because it baffled all scrutiny." We should have lost the fine Caravaggio touches of the artist who paints the murderer too fearful to end his long agony by suicide, and yet desirous to condemn himself to death, as irresolute between drowning himself and cutting his throat, in this stupendous burst of eloquence and anti-climax:—"The razor had lain in his pocket unused, for he had lacked the nerve to open it; the dull river had wooed him in vain, for he could not take the fatal plunge; the strange fascination of the street"—where Sheward had first met his murdered wife—"was the impulse he needed; it did not dangle an air-drawn razor to marshal him towards a self-inflicted death; it did not lacquer the dark water with an inviting brilliancy; it led him to the nearest police-station."

Apart from these air-drawn phantasms, and phantoms with the lacquer rubbed off, the case, as far as the facts go, is simple enough. Eighteen years ago many fragments of a human body were found scattered about the suburbs of Norwich. Medical evidence proved distinctly that the remains were those of a murdered woman, conjecturally a young woman, of a recognisable complexion, size, and physical temperament, but with no vestiges of feature capable of recognition. That she was a married woman was inferred from the absence of her ring finger from the otherwise perfect left hand. Here were the sole facts of the case. Rewards for the detection of the murderer were offered, but without any result. No missing woman was heard of by the police; the remains, some of them, were, but not very carefully, preserved, and up to January 1, 1869, from June, 1851, not a single trace of the crime was discovered. On that day a man named Sheward gave himself up to the London police, and accused himself as the murderer, the victim being his wife; his motive for confession being the insupportable weight of guilt, "that he had kept the secret for years, but could keep it no longer." His confession was only in general terms, and he afterwards retracted it. He was on Monday brought to trial, and convicted. The interesting question, then, is—How far do the circumstances of the case justify the verdict? In our judgment completely, and we shall state our reasons.

The thing to be borne in mind is this broad consideration, that on the whole all the facts of the case point conclusively to Sheward's guilt; and that, on the other hand, there is no reasonable ground for an opposite conclusion. Why should he not be considered guilty on the facts proved? is, to say the least of it, quite as pertinent as the question, Why should he be considered guilty? Even if we admit that the case is not in every particular made out, yet the possibility, under the circumstances proved, of Sheward's innocence shrinks into a vanishing quantity when contrasted with the tremendous and cumulative force of the possibilities, mounting up into probabilities, and just touching the verge of certainties, of his guilt. It is quite true that the remains of the murdered woman were not identified as those of Mrs. Sheward—that is, in other words, there was no demonstration that she was dead—and therefore no proof that she was murdered. She may conceivably be alive now. This objection looks imposing; but let us see what is on the other hand. Sheward, it is proved, had married a woman very much his senior. At the time of the (alleged) murder the (alleged) murderer was 39; the wife was 54. It is undeniable that, after the discovery of the remains, no human being has ever seen her. The husband gave most unsatisfactory accounts of her disappearance; he had declined to recover a legacy left to the missing woman; on more than one occasion he showed the strangest agitation in reference to her in certain conversations with her relations. Further, it was proved that he had lived with, and subsequently married, a woman with whom he had been intimate during his wife's life. These were facts proved apart from his own confession. Why should not his confession be true? He had the motive, such as it was, to get rid of her; he had the means and opportunity; and everything of his life during the eighteen years, his concealment of himself, and his manner of existence, were also quite consistent with guilt. Then as to the confession, although it was revoked, the consideration may fairly be urged, that to have invented such a confession—in other words, that the confession was a mere crazy figment and delusion—is infinitely more incredible than that it should be true. The confession tallies with every fact otherwise proved; to suppose it to be false and illusory, a mere wild dream of monomania, is a conclusion which no sound judgment can arrive at. On the hypothesis that the facts implied in the confession are not true, we are bound to satisfy ourselves that at the very moment when Mrs. Sheward disappeared from Norwich, a woman exactly resembling her was murdered; and further, we must have convinced ourselves that Sheward, who lived at Norwich at the time, but who had nothing to do with it, should all of a sudden, eighteen years after the event, have been so wonderfully impressed and staggered with a crime which was no concern of his, and which everybody had forgotten, as to charge himself, an innocent man, with the murder. To believe this would be an exercise of credulity culpable, if not childish. In other words, the whole chain of evidence bears out Sheward's confession; while to be satisfied that Sheward was only playing the fool in accusing himself involves an incredible improbability.

We have said the whole chain of evidence; but when we use this conventional metaphor, we use it in the ordinary practical sense, by which in the common concerns of life we come to a conclusion, and which does not deny that in a chain of judicial proofs some links are stronger than others. And after all what, in this case, is the utmost weakness of the weakest? First, that the medical men in 1851 pronounced the murdered woman to be under thirty, whereas she was in fact more than fifty. To which the answer is easy, that in a physiological question of this sort, while perhaps exact proof is in all cases impossible or highly doubtful, there is no necessary proof that the Norwich doctors were such remarkable experts that their offhand guess on such a point—which at the time was not perhaps considered very important—goes for much. In other words, to make this argument against Sheward's guilt conclusive, we must be satisfied that science can be trusted to pronounce with certainty on the age of a subject from an inspection of disjecta membra and scattered pieces of flesh, and also that the Norwich doctors possessed this scientific skill. Next, it is urged, that after all Sheward's confession is very incomplete, and that it tells nothing of the details; and further, that it was retracted and therefore untrustworthy. To which, again, it may fairly be replied, that given the confession, it is much more likely that a person in the agony and tumult of a soul overpowered by the sense of guilt should rather shrink back from the hideous details of the crime than enter into them. There is a nature and truth-likeness in what Sheward said when questioned on these very points of circumstance and detail:—"Oh! it is too horrible to talk about; don't say any more." If, on the other hand, the confession was fictitious, what more natural than that the inventor of a wild story should prepare himself with a circumstantial and minute array of particulars?—which is just what Sheward did not do. The character of Sheward's confession, general, vague, hurried, and agonized, is consistent with its truth, is inconsistent with its falsity. And lastly, as to the argument that the confession is worthless because it was revoked, we should be disposed to urge this very fact as an evidence of its genuineness, Sheward's character being irresolute, inconsistent, and unstable, as his avowed intention to commit suicide, which intention he revoked, proves. In fine, it comes to this, that whatever slight weaknesses there may be in the way of the strict proof of Sheward's guilt, to discredit and disbelieve his own consistent account of the matter is to insult the human understanding and entirely to mistake the nature of proof. Had the Norwich jury refused to convict, they would have fallen into the very error on which we recently commented with reference to the French child-murders, and which in this case comprises the defence—namely, that the suggestion of a possibility that a thing might be so and so is enough to relieve a jury from facing the fact that the chances are almost as infinity to one that this possibility so suggested has no further existence than its infinitely doubtful and unlikely possibility. It comes to this—that no man ought to be found guilty whilst it can be alleged by an advocate that there may be, though there is no evidence of it, some other conceivably possible account of the facts of the case.

GENERAL JOMINI.

AMONG all the soldiers who had seen and shared Napoleon's victories General Jomini had the highest reputation as a theorist, and he had hardly any superior in practical knowledge of the art of war. He was one of the few remaining actors in the great scenes of the first years of the present century. His youth and early manhood were active and eventful. His middle life was laboriously studious. His old age was spent in honourable repose. After surviving by many years the French Emperor and his Marshals, his career, like theirs, has become a portion of that history which has been in great part written by his own industrious and impartial pen. It is true that the name of Jomini hardly appears in the record of any campaign, for it was his part to plan what others executed. But in the most glorious pages of French military history is written the name of Ney, and Ney never performed Napoleon's orders so effectually as when they were interpreted for his guidance by the military intuition of his chief of staff, Jomini.

Like many other soldiers of European reputation, Jomini was by birth a Swiss. He was born in the village of Payerne, in the canton of Vaud, in the year 1779. His desire for a military career would have carried him, according to the custom of his countrymen, into the service of one of the Great Powers, and it happened that he chose what was in those years the winning side. Perhaps his talents would never have been discovered in Germany, and at any rate they were employed and appreciated by France. Yet he was obliged for some years to be content with a commercial situation, and it was not until he had become known as a military writer that he obtained an appointment on the staff of Marshal Ney. The first two volumes of his Treatise on Grand Military Operations were published in 1804, and in the five following years he served with Ney in the campaigns of Ulm, Jena, Eylau, and Spain. When Napoleon directed the corps of Soult and Ney against Sir John Moore, it may be supposed that Jomini was with his chief. But Napoleon checked the march of Ney, considering Soult's corps sufficient to drive Moore to his ships; and thus Jomini did not see any actual collision of English and French troops. He had seen almost everything else that war could show. He was sent from Spain, by Ney, to Napoleon, whom he found in occupation of Vienna, and with whom he remained until the war with Austria was finished by the battle of Wagram, in July 1809. For the next three years he was occupied at Paris in writing the history of Napoleon's campaigns. When war broke out with Russia, he did not wish to fight against the Emperor Alexander from whom he had received handsome offers of employment, and therefore he solicited from Napoleon a civil government. But being made Governor of Smolensk, and the French army having begun its disastrous retreat from Moscow, his military capacity was necessarily exercised. At the Beresina he was employed, in conjunction with the Engineer-General Eblé, to select points for the erection of bridges for the passage of the army. Next year he was appointed to his old post as chief of the staff of Marshal Ney; and he gave advice, in anticipation of Napoleon's order, which, if it had been promptly and fully carried out, would have made the battle of Bautzen a victory like that of Friedland. Ney recommended him for the promotion which he had well deserved; but by the jealousy of Berthier, the chief of Napoleon's staff, who had always been his enemy, this promotion was refused, and he was even charged with incapacity and threatened with arrest. Hereupon he quitted the French service for that of Russia, so that he began the campaign of 1813 on one side and finished it on the other. When France was driven within her frontier, his influence with the Emperor Alexander saved Switzerland from absorption by Austria. He was at Paris in 1815, and so warmly opposed the execution of his old leader, Ney, that it was proposed to strike his name from the list of Russian generals. But he continued in the Russian service, and placed his sons in it. One of his daughters married in Russia, and two in France, and he died last week near Paris. Among all the soldiers of fortune, as they used to be called, that his country has produced, he was the most distinguished, and perhaps he was the last; for public opinion now condemns the employment of mere mercenaries, and the hardy youth of Scotland or Switzerland cannot seek, as they used to do, the service of whatever prince or potentate promised the most liberal reward to valour and fidelity.

It might be hastily assumed that Jomini's literary power was greater than his generalship. But if his opportunities of service in the field had not been limited by jealousy of his foreign origin, he might have been himself a marshal, instead of being the head which guided a marshal's hand. Napoleon owed much to Ney, and Ney in turn owed much to Jomini. Ney could and would do anything, if only he knew what was wanted, and this Jomini could always tell. One of the most brilliant conceptions of Napoleon was the battle of Friedland, but that conception might have been formed in vain if he had not had Ney to execute it. As we read Jomini's description of this battle, we imagine him riding by the side of Ney, and comprehending at a glance the fault of Benningsen's position, and the movements by which Napoleon prepared to profit by it. Before these movements were complete it was five o'clock of a summer afternoon, and in order that Ney's attack might be effective it was necessary that it should be prompt and vigorous. If Napoleon's orders miscarried, Jomini could supply them; if they arrived, he could explain and enforce them. One of the difficulties of Jomini's career was the hostility of the wife of Ney, to whose ears came reports, spread by injudicious friends of Jomini, that her husband's most successful operations were advised by his chief of staff. These reports were probably only too true. We do not know how far Jomini contributed to Ney's success at Friedland, but we can hardly doubt that he was present at the battle which he has so clearly described. We do know that he was present six years afterwards at Bautzen, and he has shown us what Ney did and did not do to make that place another Friedland, although the plan of his work did not permit him to inform us how far his own advice was taken. In the work to which we now refer Napoleon is made by Jomini the narrator of his own exploits. "My manœuvre," says he, "accomplished its object. The allies reinforced Milaradowitsch in the mountains, and Ney concentrated the third and fourth corps behind Klix, ready to strike, the next day, a blow not inferior to either Ratisbon or Friedland in the importance of its results." At break of day the battle was commenced throughout the whole line. Napoleon renewed against the left of the allies in the mountains the demonstration of the previous day. His centre was deployed to impose on the enemy, but not to engage him. Ney crossed the Spree at Klix, pushed his divisions behind the right flank of the Allies, and "these forces afterwards directed their march on the spires of Hochkirch." Although Jomini does not mention his own name here, he has elsewhere told us that the direction of this march was suggested to Ney by him. He read, by what we have called his military intuition, Napoleon's plan of battle. He knew that Napoleon's attack on the left and front of the Allies would dislodge them from their position in the mountains, and he advised Ney to place himself across the roads by which they must have retreated. Here was the opportunity for another Friedland, and there was all the day to use it. "The manœuvre was perfect, and ought to have produced incalculable results; but several unfortunate circumstances marred its success." An order which Napoleon wrote to Ney was delayed in transmission, but Jomini anticipated its tenor. Thus far no harm was done. But, unfortunately, Ney did not appreciate the position he had gained. An attack made upon him by Blucher caused him to forget the direction of Hochkirch, which he had indicated in the morning, and he deviated entirely from the manœuvre by which Napoleon designed to get possession of the enemy's line of retreat. Meanwhile that part of the battle which was under Napoleon's eye was shaped according to his scheme. "At twelve o'clock Ney's cannon announced that the moment had come for striking at the centre." And Napoleon struck as he always did strike for such an object. The attacks which he directed dislodged the Allies as he had calculated, and at the same time, Ney, advancing in the wrong direction which he had chosen, found no enemy to oppose, but saw them defiling by a road to which he had been much nearer than they were two hours before. If Ney had executed precisely the order which was sent to him, and which Jomini, as we have seen, had anticipated, and had shown one half of the energy which he showed at Friedland and many other places, the enemy would have lost the greater part of his army and all his matériel of war. The Allies could never have saved their left wing and their cavalry. "The fate of my empire thus depended on the faulty movement of the most valiant of my generals. It is just, however, that I should take my own share of the blame." After the left wing, under Ney, was on the decisive point of the battle, Napoleon should have moved there himself with his guard and cavalry; or at least he should have sent to Ney a more detailed order. With proper support of cavalry, Ney would have captured Blucher's infantry. A great victory over the Allies would have deterred Austria from joining them, and Napoleon might have retained his throne. Thus much depended on Ney's adherence for two hours to Jomini's advice, "to direct his march on the spires of Hochkirch." As it was, Napoleon took no prisoners, and found on the field only a few dismounted cannon. For the second time in that campaign he had sacrificed twenty thousand men without any adequate result.

When Ney was next called upon to execute Napoleon's orders, he had not Jomini by his side to explain their meaning. An armistice followed the battle of Bautzen, and when hostilities were renewed, Jomini was in the camp of the Allies, among whom Austria was now numbered. The plans of the Allies were discussed in an unwieldy council, of which Jomini and also Moreau were members. Moreau was a Frenchman who served against his country's army in the honest belief that the overthrow of Napoleon was necessary to her happiness. Jomini had a well-founded belief that he had been exceedingly ill-treated, and so he changed sides with a facility which was common in the seventeenth century, but has gone out of fashion in the nineteenth. When we remember how the passions of Englishmen were excited by this conflict, and still more with what popular ardour Germany rushed to arms against Napoleon, we cannot but regard with wonder the calmness with which Jomini transferred himself from the side of Napoleon to his enemies. Yet it is hard upon the native of a country too small to go to war on its own account, that his military capacity should be forbidden to display itself at a time when all the Great Powers of Europe are in arms. Napoleon expressed no resentment at Jomini's departure, but acknowledged the greatness of his services and the reality of the grievance of which he complained. It was soon made manifest that Marshal Ney had lost his head. The defeat which he suffered at Dennewitz enabled Jomini to say of him, "Ney's intellect shone only in the midst of a battle when the balls were flying round him. There his discernment, his coolness, and his vigour were incomparable. But he was unable to combine his operations in the silence of the cabinet, while studying his maps." This disaster of Ney, and others which befell Napoleon's lieutenants about the same time, balanced the great victory which Napoleon himself gained over the Allies at Dresden. The causes of Napoleon's reverses in 1812-13 have been excellently explained by Jomini. "He fell from the height of his greatness because he forgot that the mind and strength of man have their limits, and that the more enormous the masses which are set in motion, the more subordinate does individual genius become to the inflexible laws of nature, and the less is the control which it exercises over events." There was, however, for Napoleon the hope that his enemies would blunder more seriously than his own generals. Chaos reigned supreme at the allied head-quarters. Even Napoleon's genius could not command four hundred thousand men, and Schwartzenberg, who was opposed to Napoleon, was a mere ordinary man. It had been proposed to give the chief command to the Archduke Charles of Austria, who alone had shown adequate capacity, but, says Jomini, "private interests defeated this object." So Schwartzenberg was the nominal general of this unwieldy army, and the Emperor Alexander had the "indirect control" of it, and probably consulted Jomini sufficiently to prevent any more such enormous blunders as that which incurred defeat at Dresden. The picture of confusion in the allied councils is the more interesting because England was spending millions to pay and equip troops which seemed destined to useless slaughter. However, by force of numbers and perseverance, the Allies finally prevailed, and Napoleon was driven out of Germany. We cannot know how far this result was attributable to Jomini, because the counsels which were really his went forth as those of the Emperor of Russia.

Next year Jomini entered France with the Russian Emperor, and was then permitted by him to go to Switzerland, which needed an influential protector against Austria. Thus the year 1814 was the last of Jomini's active service. He had seen as many battles as most men of his age, and he enjoyed fifty years of leisure to think and write on war. His death is like the closing of an era, for there can be few men left to speak, as he could speak, from personal recollection, of the fields of Jena, Eylau, Wagram, Bautzen, and Leipsic, and to say, as he might say, of the great events which he recalled, quorum pars magna fui. The most remarkable result of his large experience of war is perhaps the declaration which he somewhere makes that he had seen positions carried by troops with shouldered arms, but that in the line of battle he never saw a conflict with the bayonet.

FREE TRADE ECCLESIASTICAL.

DR. ARNOLD, in his History of Rome, remarks that "the extremes of civil society, the highest aristocrats and the lowest populace, have often made common cause with each other against that middle class which both hate equally." The social extremes in which this result has been shown are those measured by rank, education, and refinement, not by luxury or material wealth. Dr. Arnold's aristocracy was not a plutocracy. The chasm which separated "the two nations, the rich and the poor," was not more distinctly recognised by the author of Sibyl than it had been by the author of the Politics, who had anticipated the great Whig doctrine of the ten-pound householder, and upheld it on the ground that there was no fear in any State that the wealthy and the poor would combine against him, by reason of the rooted distrust which each class feels towards the other. The theory maintained by Mr. Disraeli in the days when he wore the white waistcoat of Young England was sufficiently consistent. The supremacy of the shop, whether it appeared in the form of cotton, petroleum, or shoddy, was only to be controlled and kept under by the union and sympathetic action of the hierarchy, ecclesiastical and social, with the mass of the unwashed. This, too, was the doctrine maintained more or less distinctly by leaders and followers alike in the Oxford religious movement. "Tractarianism," as it was called, appealed to the educated and labouring classes against the middle and commercial ranks of society. The Anglican clergy boasted that they were tribuni plebis, and they magnified their office by throwing a poetical halo of glory round their clients. The agricultural labourer was a "peasant." It was not so easy to know how to designate his representative in the towns, whom the young Anglican priest, as an undergraduate, had been in the habit of familiarly describing as a "cad"; but it was tolerably safe to call him a "mechanic" or an "artisan," and to trust to luck or the general ignorance for escaping any need of defining the terms. One thing, at any rate, was clear; the commercial middle-class was a common enemy; trade was a very low thing; and middle-class trading respectability must be smitten hip and thigh. If the country squires failed to give in their allegiance to the new régime, so much the worse for the squires; if they chose to stand by the shopkeepers, they must be content to be tarred impartially with the same Young England stick. Every kind of objectionable "ism" centred in the well-to-do, comfortable, middle-aged householder who, whether he was Whig or Tory, and swore by Lord Melbourne or by the Duke of Wellington, meant to do as his father had done before him, and had no idea of giving in to new-fangled notions which a parcel of lads had taken up at college. This obstructive and irrational being was to be attacked, and made to submit, at all hazards; and it was seen at once that the stronghold and citadel of his respectability was his pew at church. Here he was entrenched and fortified; it was his Sunday castle; and out of it, by fair means or foul, he must be made to come. If he would help to pull it down, so much the better; if not, it must be pulled down about his ears. It is doubtful, indeed, whether the Oxford enthusiasts of the last generation would have been so eager in pulling the castle down, had they not been quite certain that the middle-class British householder was in it. As he was there, however, and made no secret of his presence, the sharpshooters of the force were told off to make his life a continual burden to him; and "very pretty shooting" they found it. He was a fair mark; and the lively, stinging satire of stories like Milford Malvoisin and St. Antholin's told cruelly upon him, while the heavy ordnance of the Tracts for the Times was engaged elsewhere.

This earliest attack on pew-holding respectability was intellectual in its character and, in the main, clerical in its origin. Its ostensible motive was the exaltation of the brother of low degree; its co-ordinate result at least, not to say its real object, was to bring down the rich man from his uppermost seat in the synagogue. The "peasant" already touched his hat to the parson. The "artisan" didn't; but perhaps, with a little management, he might; while rural granges and halls, and country-town High streets and villas, were full of unbending Mordecais, who had forgotten all that the Catechism had taught them about submission to their spiritual pastors, and who must be made to learn it all over again. The war went on vigorously at first, and with varied success. In some places the enemy capitulated; in some the attacking force was compelled to retire in confusion from before the impregnable wooden walls. But by degrees the echoes of the strife died away, and were succeeded by an inglorious peace. The invading hosts of Oxford, the champions of sweetness and light, were settling down among the parochial Philistines, and finding them not such bad neighbours after all. They ate of their dinners, and occasionally, if a contemporary chronicler (A Paper Lantern for Puseyites, 1843) may be trusted, "their daughters were a snare unto them," and the fiery glance from the pulpit directed against the Squire's pew became, while much more frequent, far softer in its gleam. Later still, the warriors began to find grey hairs stealing on them as they looked complacently down on the rectory pew, now well filled. Even the keen marksman of St. Antholin's had, we believe, subsided into the calm dignities of a Rural Dean, and may have shared some official fellow-feeling with his former antagonist, the popular preacher and "idol of the pew," "the Rev. Lothario Swainham of Cheltenham," who "always took a glass of calves'-foot jelly in the vestry—it made his voice softer, he said." Within the last few years, however, signs have been continually increasing that the old war against the middle-class was about to break out afresh, and that it was to be fought on the old battle-ground, the floor of the parish church. This time the movement has been practical in its character, and democratic in its origin. Its headquarters have, not without significance, been at Manchester instead of Oxford, and its leaders have been laymen of education and position in commercial or social life. Its watchword has been a "Free and Open Church"; and it has declared war against the combined powers of the middle-class and the clergy, whom it denounces as holders and abettors of a monopoly against the natural rights and spiritual interests of the people. The extent of the movement has as yet been inconsiderable, but its promoters have been men of enthusiasm and practical energy, who are well able to appraise the influence of loud assertion upon public opinion, and who are possessed of the valuable gift of never knowing when they are beaten.

The Free and Open Church Association was, as we have said, originally founded in Manchester, and began its active operations in that city and in Liverpool. Its principles were those of the purest ecclesiastical free trade. Under no circumstances whatever was a single sitting in any church to be the subject either of a money payment or of personal appropriation. Pew-renting and pew-holding were its twin abominations, and it constructed a kind of Commination Service, which included all persons and things connected with either institution, and which was to be used at all seasons and in all places indiscriminately, but especially at the season of Easter vestries, and on the occasion of the election of churchwardens. In Liverpool, where the forces of the party have been massed, and the generalship vigorous and active, the Easter elections for some years past have been sharply and closely contested, though never with success; and the members of the party in Liverpool, having thus become the most prominent leaders of the movement in the North, have asserted for themselves the principle of independent ecclesiastical authority, and disowned all allegiance to the Metropolitan throne of Manchester. In pursuance of this line of conduct, an attempt has been made to form centres of independent action in other dioceses, and the members of the party in London, reinforced by a Liverpool contingent, have lately availed themselves of an opportunity offered to them by the President of Sion College for preaching their crusade in the heart of the City, in the very centre and headquarters of the rival power. We believe that the anticipation of "an animated debate," expressed by the Daily News, was very far from being realized, and that the assailants found the position undefended, and indeed unoccupied, except by a few indifferent or curious spectators. The discussion had been accidentally fixed for the opening night of the Irish Church debate; and in the presence of a momentous question on the issue of which, in the opinion of a large political party, and of at least a considerable majority among the clergy, the very existence of the English Established Church was supposed to depend, there may have appeared to be a certain incongruity in discussing the value of a proposed panacea for all the spiritual ills of the nation, which may be briefly described as the adaptation to ecclesiastical purposes of the system of the London General Omnibus Company, without the table of fares. Every part of the body of every parish church is claimed as available for the first comers among the parishioners—the provision for defining and distinguishing parishioners being as yet undiscovered or unannounced; and all payment for the accommodation in any shape is emphatically repudiated, the first condition being that the church shall be open, the second that it shall be free. These two conditions are maintained to be fundamental laws belonging to every church by the very fact of its existence, as by a kind of divine right, all canons and customs, and all Church Building Acts, and other Acts of Parliament, to the contrary notwithstanding; and on the neglect or violation of these two unwritten commandments the whole existing or alleged alienation of the poor from the communion and worship of the English Church is declared to rest. The comfortable classes and the clergy are leagued in unholy alliance to maintain a great wrong in the systematic violation of these laws; and the Free and Open Church Associations, Central and Diocesan, have unsheathed the sword and declared that they will give no quarter till they have torn from the last clergyman his pew-rent, and from the last householder his pew.

This is, in effect, the programme of the ecclesiastical democracy of the future, which Manchester proposes to force on a protected and Protectionist Church, as she imposed Free Trade on a compact and recalcitrant squirearchy, with a perfect millennium of Anglicanism for its promised result and reward. The clergy and the middle-class have only to be conquered and reduced to an unconditional surrender; and then we shall see what we shall see. As the first thing we should see would be the whole body, or nearly so, of the West-end clergy, and of the clergy of the suburbs of London, and of every important town in the kingdom, immediately and entirely disendowed, the proceeds of the operation being presented as a bonus or bribe to the comfortable classes, the arrangement is not calculated to strike an ordinary observer as being absolutely perfect. And the financiers of the Liverpool and Manchester Exchanges have accordingly recognised the necessity of producing an ecclesiastical budget which is to work with unvarying and universal success, and under the operation of which everybody is to be better off than ever they were before, and there is always to be a surplus at the end of the year. This result is to be achieved by the substitution, for the omnibus conductor's table of fares, of the cabman's polite intimation that he "leaves that to you." In other words, the bag—we had almost written "the hat"—is to be sent round in every church at the close of every service; and its contents will be found on examination to be as inexhaustible as the widow's barrel of meal and cruse of oil. Everybody will always put something into the bag, and somebody will decide as to the apportionment of its contents; only nobody will be disappointed or dissatisfied, because there will be plenty for all, clergymen, choristers, societies, organists, pew-openers—we beg pardon, we mean sacristans—church repairs and expenses, and also, as one of the earlier uses of the offertory must not be put entirely out of sight, for the poor. Against so very rose-coloured an estimate it may perhaps be objected that it belongs rather to the higher regions of prophecy than to the terrestrial level of calculation. Not at all. Liverpool and Manchester have their "financial results" to show. The experiment has been tried. At Perivale, in Middlesex, where there are only forty-eight inhabitants, the old system, "under pew-rents or appropriation," produced 6*l.* per annum; the new system, "from offertory, when free and unappropriated," has produced 30*l.* "Kirkheaton, in Northumberland," from "a few pence four times in the year," has risen to 20*l.* "Wrexham Parish Church," a noble specimen of architecture, from "small" to 250*l.*; and as a still more remarkable result, a whole string of churches in Bath, Halifax, Manchester, Scarborough, and London, from absolutely nil to amounts ranging downwards from 1,000*l.* or more. The financial case is therefore so clear that it may be taken for granted without requiring a word of proof. A few obstinate sceptics may perhaps be found who may doubt the universality of the conclusion to be drawn from the particular experience of Perivale and Kirkheaton, and who may wish that even in these favoured parishes the clergy may not be entirely dependent for support on their share of the "offertory, when free and unappropriated." A few middle-aged persons, too, more prosaic than enthusiastic, may question whether it would be altogether pleasant for a man of education and refinement to know that his maintenance depended on the casual scraping together of small coins in the very acts of his ministration, according to the discretion or caprice of a not necessarily refined or judicious assembly, who knew that his income was in their power. But one conclusion would be beyond all doubt or questioning. The victory of the democracy of the Church, under its demagogues or favourites of the moment, would be complete. The middle-classes, ejected from the accustomed refuge and stronghold of the family-pew, would at least have the option, if they did not like the new arrangement, of staying away from church altogether; but the clergy would be left absolutely in the hands of the multitude of the hour, to give or to withhold the supplies. This conclusion is unhesitatingly accepted by the Church Reformers of Manchester, who hail it as the introduction, in divinis, of an order of things in which the multitude will be always unprejudiced, liberal, and devout, and the clergy invariably models of high principle, of culture, and of solvency.

NEW WINDOWS AND MOSAICS IN ST. PAUL'S.

"THE noblest edifice erected, since the Reformation, to the worship of God" has been "long left cold and cheerless." Sir Christopher Wren, it is well known, intended that the interior of St. Paul's should receive, though not lavish, yet appropriate decoration; he wished that some eminent Italian artist should be called in to adorn the cupola with rich and durable mosaics. His plan, however, was overruled by Commissioners, both ecclesiastical and secular, as too novel to be liked and too costly to be paid for. And instead of such mosaics—"paintings for eternity"—the world has for nearly a century had to endure the empty and pretentious compositions of Sir James Thornhill—works which, happily nearly invisible, may now with advantage be swept away wholly. Yet unfortunately "the barren stateliness" of the general interior has been held to be in keeping with Protestantism, and thus this grim desolation was sustained sacred to the Reformation, in lasting testimony as it were against Rome. Even George III., when he wanted to do something in mitigation of the evil, was opposed by the ecclesiastics; and the Royal Academy, including Reynolds its President, when they offered, in a moment of youthful generous impulse, "to paint at their own expense a series of Scriptural histories for the decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral," were thwarted by Bishop and Archbishop, under the plea that the plan "would occasion great noise and clamour as an artful intrusion of Popery." Happily we live in a day when zeal for the Church no longer prescribes hostility to the arts. Thus, when a meeting was convened in the Mansion House to raise funds "for the renovation and decoration of the interior of the cathedral of St. Paul, in accordance with the original designs of Sir Christopher Wren," the first resolution was moved by the Bishop of London, the second by the Bishop of Oxford; while the late Dean, on behalf of himself and the Chapter, expressed gratitude for the wide and influential support given to the great work. Furthermore, in the Annals of St. Paul's, Dean Milman speaks to the following effect:—I should wish to see such decorations introduced as might give some splendour, without disturbing the solemnity and simplicity of the edifice, some colour to enliven and gladden the eye. I would see the dome, instead of brooding in dead weight over the area below, expanding and elevating the soul towards heaven. I would see the sullen white of the roof, the arches, the cornices, the capitals, and the walls, broken and enlivened by gilding. I would see the adornments carried out in a rich, but harmonious (and as far as possible from gaudy) style, in unison with our simple form of worship.

Having thus stated the needs of the case, and the general principles of the plan proposed, we will now speak more in detail of the decorations already effected. Of the gilding, upon which the late Dean laid, as we have seen, some stress, we need say nothing more than that it has been so applied as to accentuate the leading lines of construction, and thus to relieve by light and colour an oppressive dreariness. Of the painted windows and mosaics we will speak more at large. In the outset we may remark that the interior of St. Paul's is, by common consent, inferior to the exterior, that the details confess to haste and carelessness, and that, as in St. Peter's, the windows are rather holes knocked through the walls for the admission of light than architectural designs. Altogether it must be admitted that Italian styles are less favourable to painted glass than Gothic. No mullions or traceries having been constructed by Wren, and it being impossible that the figures in glass could stand without support, columns, friezes, pediments, &c., had to be included in the painted compositions of the windows. Thus, at the West-end St. Paul is converted, and in the central East window Christ is crucified, under remarkably handsome structures of the Cinque-cento. It may be observed that, in these two grand East and West windows, which, as first instalments, have come from Munich, there has been a threefold responsibility. First, Mr. Penrose, who, with praiseworthy moderation, seeks simply to do what Wren might have done if entrusted with the decoration of his own structure, provided architectural designs to serve, when executed in glass, as stately surroundings to the figures. Thus the style of the building, which may be designated in general terms as Palladian, imposed the design of the glass; hence these windows, by the inevitable conditions of the case, are removed from early treatments identified with Gothic architecture, and become, almost of necessity, allied to later developments belonging to Cinque-cento, Palladian, and Renaissance styles. Of course the works now presented to the public will be praised or censured accordingly. Then, secondly, Professor Schnorr is responsible for the drawing and composition of the figures. We need scarcely remind our readers that Professor Julius Schnorr von Karolsfeld, known in this country through his Bible prints and otherwise, is a leader in the Munich school of mural painting. Accordingly, his designs for these windows are distinguished by the accuracy in form, the science of composition, and the academic and somewhat artificial treatment which distinguish that school. The cartoons being thus studiously elaborated, the final responsibility was thrown upon Chevalier Ainmiller, the well-known inspector of the Royal Manufactory of Glass Painting in Munich. The windows now set up in St. Paul's, like those in the cathedrals of Cologne and Glasgow, and in the church of Sta. Maria Hilf, Munich, are products from this Royal factory. The finished works may be designated in few words. The general characteristics of the style are those of the Cinque-cento. The compositions aspire to an architectonic pomp worthy of the epoch of Raffaelle. The Mosaic system, at least in its somewhat abrupt brilliance, and its broken piecemeal of tesseræ, is surrendered for a manner which assimilates glass-painting to oil-painting. And, instead of an assemblage or galaxy of colours, each lustrous as a jewel, the composition is delicately modulated in its polychrome, broken into half-tones, till it gently passes through atmospheric distance into a grey blue of sky which dawns as the firmament in at the window. To quote the words of the late Mr. Winston, we may say that the object sought by these windows, in common with other works of the Munich school, is "a union of the severe and excellent drawing of the early Florentine oil-paintings with the colouring and arrangement of the glass-paintings of the latter half of the sixteenth century."

We have neither space nor inclination to resume the interminable controversies which Munich windows have provoked whenever they have presented themselves to the notice of English critics. Within the limits at our command, it seems best to attempt merely such impartial statement as may give to those latest attempts fair consideration. To try to shake the convictions of devout mediævalists were waste of time; moreover, it is scarcely to be expected that reverent Gothicists will put themselves to the pain of entering St. Paul's at all; and, within our experience, the painters in glass are the most intolerant of people. To opponents then it may bring some consolation to be told that the new windows are open to the old objection of being less of the quality of glass than of painted blinds and picture transparencies. It is the misfortune of all the grandiose tableaux which come from Munich, that while the multitude adore, the select few stand aside to criticize, if not to scoff. And certainly these windows have a spell for the sense of vision which it is hard for the critical judgment to withstand. Here two grand compositions meet the eye, one "the Crucifixion," the other "the Conversion of St. Paul," each encompassed by more than accustomed state and ceremony. The drawing is true and powerful as that of the Roman school, the forms swell into grandeur, the composition is intent upon being at no point beneath the dignity and balanced propriety of Raffaelle, while the colour strikes at the not unpleasing concord of eclectic compromise. Of course originative genius is out of the question; who looks for the independence of genius in painted glass? The comparatively recent revival of a lost art has usually been appreciated in proportion to its servility; and our artists in glass, while seeking for the best colour, have too often espoused the most archaic form. Reverence has blinded devout disciples; in windows of the Nativity, for example, we have to admire Three Kings knockkneed through fear and broken down by reverence, ready, as the climax of their worship, to fall to pieces at the Madonna's feet. Rational people find it hard to discover why glass, in order to be lovely, must begin with an outrage upon nature. The difficulties, however, involved are avowedly great, for nature is compelled to submit to conventional treatment and geometric proportion before she can be brought into service to the parent art of architecture, which demands obedience, severity, moderation. Difference of opinion will necessarily arise as to whether these new windows have hit the happy mean between archaicism and modernism, between the hard austerity of the one and the free and easy manner of the other. We incline to think that were Mr. Winston, to whom all parties owe no small debt of gratitude, now living, he would claim in these works a decisive victory for the cause which, especially in later years, he espoused possibly too strongly. "The best picture glass-painting," wrote Mr. Winston, "is that which most fully combines the quality of a good picture with a display of the diaphanous property of glass." Yet, for ourselves, we scarcely see that these, the last and possibly most successful products of the German school, materially change the aspect of the controversy. Diaphanous they are not. We have endeavoured to give full credit for what is gained; but, on the other hand, we are bound to confess that the new windows in St. Paul's, like others of the school, are wanting in that gem-like lustre, that jewel-sparkle in light, which remain the unapproached prerogatives of the choicest mediæval glass. The highest praise that can be awarded to these two sumptuous windows is that, whatever they may be as painted glass, they are, as specimens of appropriate and religious decoration, successful.

Yet the windows in St. Paul's may be accepted as the best of their kind, even though it be objected that the kind is bad.

Much has been done to mitigate the mannerism of the school. The bane of Munich glass has been that it seeks to paint pictures by means of opaque enamel colours. Three methods have been known in the history of the art of glass-painting. First; the mosaic system, of transparent material, and in style identified with Gothic architecture. Second; the enamel system, a later development and decadence, of which the Reynolds windows in New College, Oxford, are the most debased and egregious examples. And third, "the mosaic-enamel method," which seeks to combine transparent "pot-metal" glass with the use of opaque enamel colour. This last has till now been the process employed in the production of the picture-painted glass of Munich; and the result, even when near to perfection, can be best indicated by a somewhat violent comparison; thus, while the best old glass may be said in deep-toned harmony and broken lustre to approach rich Oriental fabrics, modern German windows may be likened to the thin smooth calicos printed in Manchester. But at length the Munich painters have begun to amend the error of their way; thus the mitigation of vicious methods first observable in Glasgow is now in London followed by still further amelioration. We believe that, somewhat through the representations received from England, enamel colours have been all but abandoned in these new windows in favour of transparent glass and the old mosaic method. Certainly we gladly observe a return to the ancient "leading"; though we are not sure that in these windows some lining or pigment has not been applied to the exterior. In the worst decadence of the art leading was discarded; large rectangular sheets of glass were treated as paper or canvas favourable to the reception of pictures; and works thus weak have obtained unbounded applause from the democracies who crowd International Exhibitions. We are glad to find, in the bold use of leading in the windows now set up in St. Paul's, some surety for firm drawing and severe treatment; a curb is thus put on the license of Renaissance styles. Indeed, there seems reason to hope that the distinguishing merits of rival methods may yet be blended, that the superior colour of our English revivalists may be joined to the good drawing of Continental schools. Thus we may, even in the art of glass painting, look for progress in place of finality.

A word must be given to the small and somewhat feeble commencement of the proposed mosaic decorations. The eight spandrels beneath the dome are to be filled by four major Prophets and four Evangelists. These figures, could they but rise on their legs, would stand ten feet high. However, Mr. Stevens's "Isaiah" will never get up; the figure evidently is broken in the back, and the head gropes forward on the shoulders as if the "major Prophet" were purblind. A couple of angels being within call offer what help they can; not being ornamental, they are willing to be useful. These figures belong to that generic class of angels who addict themselves to lie about in fine attitudes among clouds; they seem here to have no very specific vocation—they are servants of all work. We know the species well, though not in mosaic. In the time of Michael Angelo such artistic properties abounded in the purlieus of the Vatican. Mr. Stevens is a genius, and therefore we are all the more disappointed to find his "Isaiah" a failure; the artist evidently lost his way before he got through his composition; his lines, forms, and masses are confused, his colours muddled. Mr. Watts's "St. Matthew" is better, though the masses are scarcely sufficiently pronounced for mural decoration. The composition in the line of its relief against the gold ground—always a matter difficult of treatment—is not well studied. We also incline to think that more of the bas-relief and less of the pictorial method would, considering the material and the position, be desirable. Yet it must be confessed that the figure, as a whole, shares grandeur with Michael Angelo. We trust that the bold experiment may prosper. We have not space to speak of the merits of rival mosaic manufactures, Venetian and British, or of the comparative advantages of glass and ceramic tesseræ. But, at all events, the best authorities seem to be agreed that mosaic is destined to take a most important part in the architectural decoration of the future, and assuredly there can be no field more fitting for the display of this eminently monumental art than Wren's grand interior.

From the good beginning already made we incline to augur well for this truly national enterprise, "the renovation and decoration of St. Paul's." It were almost impossible to commend too highly the zeal shown by several of the City Companies for the honour of the Cathedral, justly the pride of London, and by the late Mr. Brown—of the famous Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme and Brown firm—who gave the Great West window. Such timely generosity, we trust, may provoke general emulation. From the art point of view we may add that there seems reasonable ground to believe that the spirit of the architectural design will be preserved. Sir Christopher Wren's compositions, like Handel's choruses, are marked by breadth and grandeur, with a certain state and solemnity in march and bearing; and we earnestly hope that the decoration of this noble interior will not be permitted to degenerate into gaudiness, or descend into prettiness. The purpose should be to preserve the details in due relation to the whole; the ruling motive should be to maintain breadth, simplicity, repose, and above all, if possible, to enhance the idea of space and dimension, and thus to augment grandeur. No such mistake as that unfortunate one which induced Mr. Penrose to tamper with and to ruin Wren's choir will, we trust, be repeated. If the "return stalls" of the dean and the higher dignitaries were returned to their original position, and some choir screen, so often promised, provided, we should have great hopes of the Eastern portion of the interior; especially as it is understood that a handsome baldachino for the altar is in preparation. But the work before the authorities of St. Paul's is enormous; the Western doors, economically grained in imitation of oak, only too painfully remind us of the bronze gates of Italy; and the squalid condition of the façade, with its temporary lamp-posts of painted deal boards, and the dilapidated figure of Queen Anne, are simply a disgrace to the first church of the first city in the world. We trust that the new Dean will not suffer the work so heartily commenced, and to some extent so sufficiently executed, by his lamented predecessor to languish.

REVIEWS.

DESCARTES.*

Considering the very important position held by Descartes in the history of modern philosophy, we scarcely think that he has of late been honoured in this country with the amount of attention which is his due. His name is familiar to all educated persons; proper gratitude is felt when it is remembered that he freed thought from the "trammels of the schools," and those who are rather more erudite than their neighbours are aware that he held very strong opinions as to the fact of his own existence, which he expressed by the formula Cogito ergo sum. All this is perfectly true as far as it goes, and it roughly indicates the work done by the great thinker of France, in addition to his advances in mathematical science; but then it goes such a very little way.

The philosophy of Descartes deserves serious study, not only on account of its intrinsic value, about which doubts may be entertained, but because it really does begin the modern epoch of metaphysics. It breaks the chain of thought that had been continued through Pagan and Christian times, from Plato and Aristotle to the scholastic divines and the philosophers of the Renaissance; and though points of contact may be found between the doctrines of Descartes and those of the sages of antiquity, there is no reason to believe that he ever went consciously out of his way to adopt any opinion that did not actually proceed from his own intellectual operations. The names of Plato or Aristotle would have had no more weight with him than with Bacon; perhaps even less, for it is a striking peculiarity of his character that he was totally devoid of a feeling for history. To Bacon the two Greeks might at any rate have been interesting as persons who had made a noise in their day; but to Descartes the past was as nought. A comprehensive table of the sciences, as conceived by Descartes, analogous to the encyclopædical survey taken by Bacon in his Advancement of Learning, may be found in the work by M. Millet, now before us, and it omits history altogether. The only ancient institution thoroughly revered by the French thinker was the Church of Rome, to which he adhered not merely, as might be supposed, for the sake of keeping up appearances, but in a spirit of mystical devotion which accords somewhat strangely with his character of a man of the world who indulged in the usual licences allowed in the seventeenth century to gentlemen, who "wore a sword," fought his duel on occasion, indulged in a little affair of gallantry, and had no objection to high play. It is possible, perhaps it may be proved, that where Descartes coincides with St. Augustine, the coincidence is not merely accidental, and there is every probability that he learned something of the "ontological proof of the existence of a Deity" (of which more presently) while studying under the Jesuits at La Flèche. But here ceases his connexion with the olden time, and if his intellectual kinsmen are to be sought, we must look to the contemporary men of science, who had, however, no influence on his metaphysics. Where he has been accused, justly or not, of plagiarism, it has been as a man of science, not as a philosopher.

We may observe, moreover, that if the student of modern philosophy is not bound, save when he would understand the intellectual labours of those eccentric thinkers who have no place in the regular pedigree, to go further back than Descartes, so far back he will be compelled to go, if he would begin at the very beginning. Not only the reader of Spinoza and Leibnitz, but even he who has confined himself to Locke and Berkeley, will be surprised to find what light is thrown on his studies when he has made himself tolerably familiar with their great French predecessor. These writers wrote when Cartesian ideas were immediately before them, or at any rate were floating in their intellectual atmosphere, and to his pages can be traced the origin of those doubts and difficulties which long after him troubled heads addicted to speculation. The question is, how is the study to begin? Descartes is a most agreeable writer, whether he chooses French or Latin as the medium for communicating his thoughts; but then he is voluminous, and his views are scattered through a variety of books. There is no one work, not even the Principia, which can be put to a use analogous of that which one may make of Locke's Essay, or the Dialogues of Berkeley. A guide is required who will direct attention to the proper places.

Such a guide is not to be discovered in M. Millet, although his history will be found extremely interesting to those who have already taken a comprehensive view of the system of Descartes, and are anxious to know his earlier training; for, ending with the year 1637, in which he published his Méditations, the first work of importance which he presented to the world, it not only keeps out of sight the Principia, which appeared long afterwards, but leaves untouched the polemics to which the Méditations gave rise, and which involved a petty persecution. We have a fascinating picture of a man who, of gentle blood, and always in a state of opulence, chose to study truth for its own sake without any thought of emolument, and who, while he took part in many of the events that attracted the attention of Europe, was a sort of recluse, as far as his intellectual labours were concerned, shrinking with what may almost be termed moral cowardice from a diffusion of the light which he had attained. M. Millet is also entitled to gratitude for his copious description of those earlier productions which, although they are no longer ouvrages inédits, are not to be found in the ordinary collections of Descartes' works.

The guide whom we would earnestly recommend to those investigators who would know all about the Cartesian philosophy and the fortunes of the philosopher throughout life, is Dr. Kuno Fischer. In the first part of the first volume of his "History of Modern Philosophy" (Geschichte der neuern Philosophie), a work not yet completed, Dr. Fischer presents a carefully digested and thoroughly discussed description of Descartes' philosophical theory, accompanied by an elaborate biography connected throughout with the progress of the system, and comprising an account of the objections made to him by contemporary adversaries, and the answers with which these were encountered. Having read this first, the student may conveniently, if he be so disposed, study the writings of Descartes afterwards, but we doubt whether he will gain much more than he has acquired through the medium of Dr. Fischer. Indeed, so resolved is the German historian to make his work as complete as possible, that although the subsequent volumes of his elaborate history have brought us down to J. G. Fichte, he has just published an appendix to his first volume, comprising translations into German of the Discours de la Méthode, the Méditations, and the first part of the Principia. The fact that he belongs to one of the branches of the school of Hegel does not in the least compromise his character as a generally accessible teacher, for his Hegelism is never obtruded save in the general introduction to his entire work, which in the spirit o the master traces the progress of thought from Thales to the days of the Renaissance, and which may be passed over at pleasure without detriment to what follows. To less earnest investigators the summary view which we now give of the Cartesian philosophy may not be unacceptable.

The "Cogito ergo sum" which is the basis of the philosophy does not begin with Descartes. In his Soliloquia St. Augustine thus argues against universal scepticism:—

> Tu, qui vis te nosse, scis esse te? Scio. Unde scis? Nescio. Simplicem te sentis an multiplicem? Nescio. Moveri te scis? Nescio. Cogitare te scis? Scio.

Campanella, too, who flourished not very long before the French philosopher, rested his proof of the existence of a Deity on our certainty that we ourselves exist. However, there is no reason to believe that Descartes was knowingly indebted in this instance to either of his predecessors, or deduced his fundamental proposition otherwise than from his own consciousness. The conviction that, even while we doubt the reality of all things, the very act of doubting implies the existence of the doubter, is too natural not to have had its origin in many minds wholly insulated from each other, although it was expressed with such decisive effect at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Life, in the language of Calderon, may be a dream; but even a dream presupposes the thoughtful existence of the dreamer. We cannot agree with the assertion of M. Millet that "modern psychologists"—whoever they may be—are wrong when they see in the "Cogito ergo sum" a mere apperception of consciousness. The "ergo" indeed makes the proposition look as if it consisted of the minor premiss and conclusion of a syllogism, the major premiss of which is understood, and which, written at length, would read thus:—"Omne quod cogitat, est—Cogito—Ergo sum." But Descartes, who at this starting-point of his progress has not stirred beyond his own inner sphere, cannot as yet claim a right to make a broad assertion with regard to thinkers in general. He is concerned with René Descartes alone, and only with René Descartes, so far as he is a thinking entity. We suggest that the English idiom "I am thinking" would more accord with the genius of the system than the quasi-syllogistic form in which its fundamental truth is expressed by the founder.

All objects respecting which even a possible doubt may arise having been for a while eliminated, the body of the doubter, which may be the mere illusion of a dream, of course vanishes with them, and nothing but the pure "Ich" (or Ego), as Fichte would call it, remains. How is the minimum of certain knowledge implied in the act of self-affirmation to be increased? That I myself exist as a thinker is an incontrovertible fact. It is also certain that I find within myself the idea of an Omniscient, Omnipotent, and perfect Being. Now, in the very conception of such a Being existence is as much implied (thus reasons Descartes) as the equality of three angles to two right angles is implied in the very conception of a triangle. A non-existing Being would lack a perfection, and consequently would not correspond to the idea. Again, the Idea of God could not come from myself, imperfect as I am, nor from any other imperfect Being. It must therefore have been communicated by God himself, and is innate. I am not my own cause. I have not even the power to preserve my own existence, now that I already exist; hence there is a cause foreign to myself, and to this belongs that perfection ascribed to it in my idea.

Here are three different arguments. In two of them the reasoning is à posteriori, ascending from an effect to a cause. In the other it is à priori, based on the conviction that a certain proposition cannot be controverted without a contradictio in adjecto. The Idea of God differs in kind from the notion of an imperfect being. We have a tolerably complete notion of the attributes of a mermaid, but the mere fact that in our imagination we can unite the upper half of a woman to the lower half of a fish does not prove that there is any reality, in this world or the next, corresponding to the image. If we have understood the first book of our Euclid, we are certain that, wherever a triangle is to be found, the sum of its angles will be equal to two right angles. But Euclid has not taught us the necessary existence of a triangle. All triangles may have been swept from the face of the earth at the moment when this article is before us. Nay, when we reflect on the imperfection of our drawing-instruments, it seems that such a triangle as would completely fulfil the conditions supposed by Euclid never existed at all. But when we say that a thing is perfect and necessary, existence is implied, and consequently proved by the mere fact of our enunciation. This is the famous proof which is now called "ontological," and which, vehemently assailed by Immanuel Kant, is regarded by most modern thinkers as a stupendous sophism. Its origin is commonly ascribed to Anselm of Canterbury, whose words, cited neither by Dr. Fischer nor M. Millet, are as follows:—

> Domine Deus, qui das fidei intellectum, da mihi ut, quantum scis expedire, intelligam quia es, sicut credimus, et hoc es, quod credimus. Et quidem credimus, te esse bonum quo majus bonum cogitari nequit. An ergo non est aliqua talis natura, quia dixit insipiens in corde suo: non est Deus? Sed certe idem ipse insipiens quum audit hoc ipsum, quod dico: bonum quo magis nihil cogitari potest, intelligit utique quod audit, et quod intelligit utique in ejus intellectu est, etiam si non intelligat illud esse. (Aliud est rem esse in intellectu, et aliud intelligere rem esse. Nam quum pictor præcogitat imaginem quam facturus est, habet eam quidem jam in intellectu, sed nondum esse intelligit, quod nondum fecit; quum vero jam pinxit et habet in intellectu et intelligit jam esse quod fecit.) Convincitur ergo insipiens esse vel in intellectu aliquid bonum quo majus cogitari nequit, quia hoc quod audit intelligit, et quicquid intelligitur in intellectu est. At certe id quo majus cogitari nequit non potest esse in intellectu solo. Si enim quo majus cogitari non potest, in solo intellectu foret, utique eo quo majus cogitari non potest majus cogitari potest (sc. id quod tale sit etiam in re), existit ergo procul dubio aliquid, quo majus cogitari non valet, et in intellectu et in re. Hoc ipsum autem sic vere est, ut nec cogitari possit non esse. Nam potest cogitari aliquid esse, quod non possit cogitari non esse, quod majus est utique eo, quod non esse cogitari potest. Quare si id quo majus nequit cogitari, potest cogitari non esse, id ipsum quo majus cogitari nequit, non est id quo majus cogitari nequit, quod convenire non potest. Vere ergo est aliquid quo majus cogitari non potest, ut nec cogitari possit non esse, et hoc es tu, Domine noster.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that the ontological proof, as propounded by our admirable Archbishop, must undergo a certain amount of filtration before it is presented in the shape which it has assumed in the Principia of Descartes, and which we have endeavoured to render still more clear by familiar illustration.

M. Millet is of opinion that there is little in common between the ontological proof of the French philosopher and that of Anselm, and he seems to ascribe to M. Saisset the reference to "la preuve vide et sophistique de saint Anselme, qui ressemble à la preuve de Descartes comme l'ombre ressemble à la lumière." To the assertion of the superior lucidity of Descartes no objection can be made; but certainly the assignment of the ontological proof to Anselm is much older than M. Saisset. However, the answer of M. Millet to the allegation of Sir W. Hamilton that the notion of the infinite and unconditional is merely negative, is shrewd enough. Sir William, he says, has been misled by the form of the words "Infinite," "Absolute," "Unconditional." This is indeed negative, being produced by the employment of negative prefixes; but what shall we say about the words "perfect," "eternal," and "necessary"?

Descartes was himself a religious man, with every desire to be orthodox in his theology. With him the Deity at which he has arrived by three arguments is not a mere abstraction, but a living fountain of truth. Our own notions proceed in the first instance from God, and though we, as imperfect creatures, are subject to error through a disproportion between the will and the intellect, we are certain that an infinitely good and wise Being would not deceive us. Of truth clearness is the test, and if we have established an evident proposition, and clearly deduce others from it, we may be sure, not only that we are going right, but that "the Lord is on our side."

The two truths of which the philosopher is now in possession are his own existence and the existence of a God, and of these the latter, though not received so early as the former, is the most evident, inasmuch as the recognition of our own imperfection involves the acknowledgment of a perfect being on which we depend. Now for the external world. I have been accustomed to believe that there are such things as bodies. Is this belief illusory or otherwise? That I imagine bodies, that is to say, picture them in my mind, is not to be doubted, and imagination is altogether distinct from pure thought. Intellectually I have as adequate a conception of a chiliogon, that is to say, a figure of a thousand sides, as I have of a triangle; but whereas I can produce a mental image of the triangle without the slightest difficulty, I cannot form a picture of a chiliogon that differs from that of a myriogon, the sides of which are ten times as numerous. Imagination, therefore, is not, like thought, a necessary attribute of my mind, but seems to point to some external source. Hence there is a probability that bodies do exist, and this is confirmed by the sensations, often painful, which certainly are not produced by my own act. It is clear that the images are not produced by the immediate act of the Deity, as my nature impels me to seek their origin in another direction. We need scarcely remark that this view is exactly opposite to the theory of Berkeley.

Bodies exist, then; but what are they? They are, obviously, what spirit or mind (the terms are here identical) is not. There is nothing in common between them, and the world may be regarded as consisting of two kinds of substances, the spiritual and the corporeal, of which latter nothing is as yet predicated except that they are the negative of the former. That the two kinds are mutually independent is implied in the term "substance"; but this is only used relatively when we refer them to their common origin, the Creator, the only substance in the absolute sense of the word. To those who do not care to pick their way cautiously through the entire works of Descartes, the observations of M. Millet at this stage of the process are well worth attention. They show that Descartes did not always remain convinced of that substantial difference between mind and body here rigorously insisted upon. Let us add that, the more the difference vanishes, the nearer we approach to the doctrine of Spinoza.

It is now necessary to point out the difference between the qualities which distinguish substances of diverse kinds from each other, and in fact constitute the very nature of a substance, and those which are less essential. The former we may call "Attributes," the latter "Modes." Thus the attribute of mind or spirit is thought; imagination is one of its modes. Without the attribute the mode is impossible; but the converse is not the case. Thought is possible without imagination, but imagination is not possible without thought. What, then, is the attribute of body? Space, or extension. Space lies at the basis of all corporeal figuration. I can conceive space apart from every particular form, as, for instance, the triangular; but I cannot conceive the triangle without space. To God, as an invariable Being, we can ascribe attributes only.

We have now two sets of relative substances accurately defined, in addition to the absolute substance, their Creator—namely, mind, with its attribute thought, and consistent modes; and body, with its attribute, extension, and its modes, figure, and mobility. The sensations which we ignorantly ascribe to bodies are only in ourselves, but figure and motion are really inherent in body. Let us here remark, for the benefit of those who regard Berkeley as a dreamer, that the theory thus propounded by Descartes, which seems to save the corporeal world, is just as alien from the common notion as that which ascribes sensation to the immediate action of the Deity. What is this external world, composed of bodies, which are nothing but figured extension in a state of motion? Obviously something very different from the world in which the ordinary representative of common sense eats his bread and cheese.

In the system of Descartes there are no atoms, for space is infinitely divisible, and space and body are really identical. Space, too, is necessarily continuous, therefore there is no void.

Our object being to show Descartes as a metaphysician, we pass over his physical and astronomical theories, which require to be considered by themselves in detail, with the remark, however, that they form parts of his general scheme, which is one organized whole, and the statement that the only admitted motion of bodies is mechanical, communicated in the first instance by the Deity. The theory of the passions, however, comes within our scope. These indicate a union between soul and body which seems scarcely consistent with that mutual independence on which so much stress has been laid, but with respect to which Descartes, as we have already said, sometimes appeared to waver. It is not the soul that vivifies the body; but the blood, the circulation of which had been recently discovered by Harvey, is the fuel to the fire of life, of which the heart is the hearth. The warmth and motion of the blood, by mere mechanical action, cause the various vital functions; the organs of motion being the muscles, and the organs of sensation the nerves. The finest particles of the blood are freed from the rest by a process of distillation that takes place in the heart, and ascend to the brain, whence they are communicated to the nerves, and through these to the muscles. Thus, too, they are brought into contact with the soul, the seat and organ of which is the pineal gland. Without the soul, which is identical with mind and its inherent self-consciousness, the living body would be a mere machine; and such, according to Descartes, is actually the case with brutes. Perhaps it was by this detail of his system that he was best known to the unphilosophical public of his day. The opinion that a lapdog was a machine could be apprehended and disliked by the shallowest dealer in small-talk; and in 1692, more than forty years after the death of Descartes, we find in one of the French comedies, which were acted by Italians, and were addressed to the most frivolous of the fashionable world, a young lady who vows that she would have scratched the face of Philosophy in person if it had dared to maintain that her pet poodle was without sense and reason, and declares that Descartes must have had "l'esprit en écharpe" when he promulgated his monstrous theory.

Into the description and classification of the passions we need not enter. It is enough to state that they palpably invite attention to that relation between soul and body which presents one of the grand difficulties of Descartes' scheme, and gave rise to the theories of his immediate successors.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO.*

(Second Notice.)

THE chief interest of Mr. Wallace's book is in the light which it throws upon the theory of natural selection; and we will shortly explain the nature of his argument. Whether it is well or ill founded, it has at least the merit that it brings together certain classes of facts which would otherwise be simply inexplicable. The phenomena of the distribution of species to which he calls attention may of course be due to the fact that the animals were created where we find them; this is as much as to say that we neither know nor ever can know anything more about the matter. The attempt to explain them by means of natural selection may perhaps fail entirely; but meanwhile it gives an interest to the inquiry into what must otherwise remain a detached series of facts. It supplies a thread which, provisionally at least, binds them together for our further consideration.

The principle upon which Mr. Wallace's explanation goes is simply this. If we find that in two neighbouring islands—as, for example, in England and the Isle of Man—the existing species are identical, we may assume that they have been connected within a recent period, that is, within a few million years. If, on the other hand, they are completely distinct, no such connexion can have existed. Finally, if they resemble each other without being identical, we must suppose that the islands have been separated for so long a period as to allow of a certain modification of the species. Thus, if we knew the rate at which species diverged from a common origin, we might obtain a measure of the time which has elapsed since the geographical changes to which their separation was due. Borneo, for example, must have been parted from the mainland long enough for some of its frogs to learn the art of flying; and New Guinea must have been parted from Australia long enough to teach its kangaroos to climb trees very awkwardly. How long a kangaroo requires to fit itself for so new a station in life is of course an insoluble problem.

The Malay Archipelago furnishes all kinds of examples of this supposed process. It consists of a series of islands long enough to stretch from the West of Europe to Central Asia, three of which are as large as Great Britain, three more equal in size to Ireland, eighteen equal to Jamaica, and more than a hundred equal to the Isle of Wight, besides innumerable islets of smaller dimensions. They are divided from each other by straits and arms of the sea of widely varying breadth and depth; and we find that the natural productions are contrasted in the most remarkable way. The most remarkable breach of continuity is between the two islands of Bali and Lombock, which are divided by a strait of only fifteen miles across; yet in Bali the species are distinctly Asiatic, whilst in Lombock we get at once amongst species which are almost as distinctly Australian. A few cockatoos have managed, it seems, to cross the strait to Bali; but they are the only representatives of Australia upon that side. Bali, in short, may be regarded as the furthest outpost to the East of the great continent of Asia, whilst Lombock holds the same position with regard to Australia. Now it is remarkable that this striking division corresponds to no change either in the climate or in the physical characteristics of the country. The great volcanic chain to which the elevation of the islands is apparently due runs through both divisions. Borneo on one side of the dividing line closely resembles New Guinea on the other, in its climate, its geology, and its freedom from volcanoes. In like manner, the Moluccas resemble the Philippines in fertility, in luxuriance of forests, and in volcanic structure; and Bali is as dry and parched as Timor. Yet the groups which resemble each other in every other respect are most strikingly contrasted in their animal productions; whilst the stony desert of Australia, with its dry winds and open plains, produces animals "closely related to those inhabiting the hot, damp, luxuriant forests which everywhere clothe the plains and mountains of New Guinea." These facts, according to Mr. Wallace, are to be explained by supposing that within a recent geological period the Western islands formed part of the Asiatic continent, whilst the Eastern were more or less connected with Australia. They have gradually approached each other towards the islands of Bali and Lombock, whilst they have become separated from the mainland at each end. The varying state of geographical connexion explains the singular resemblances and contrasts between the products of the several islands. These resemblances and contrasts appear to be closely connected with another measure of time. On the principles so ably explained by Sir Charles Lyell, we may naturally infer that the depth of an ocean is a probable indication of the length of time during which depression has been taking place; and, accordingly, it is a general rule that the difference in the fauna of two islands corresponds to the depth of the intervening sea. Thus the islands which resemble Asia in their products are divided from it by a very shallow sea, whilst a comparatively deep sea separates them from the Australian group. Following out the same indication in detail, we find that the distinction between the products of islands within the Archipelago follows the same law; and thus, for example, the range of the birds of paradise is accurately marked out by the hundred-fathom line round New Guinea. Another illustration of the same principles appears when we examine more closely into the degree of resemblance. Thus, for example, in the Timor group of islands, which are on the Australian side of the lary, we find a mixture of species, though the proportion of Italian species increases and that of Javan species diminishes as we approach more nearly to Australia. It seems, however, that whilst three-fourths of the Javan species are identical with those existing in Java, one-fourth of the Australian species are identical and the remainder are only closely allied. To account for this, Mr. Wallace supposes that at some former period the strait which divided the Timor group from Australia was very narrow, so as to allow it to be stocked principally from the Australian side. Since that period the division from Australia has been gradually widening, whilst new islands have been rising so as to form a kind of bridge connecting the Timor group with Java. Thus the Australian species have long been divided from their kindred, and have had time to undergo considerable modification, whilst the more recently imported Javanese birds have not only diverged less from their original type, but have been constantly kept up to the mark by fresh arrivals along the chain of communication. By similar arguments Mr. Wallace endeavours to account for the curious divisions and interlacings of species by which the different regions are characterized. Each island presents a new problem, according to its distance from the various regions and the various lines of communication by which we may suppose it to have been connected with the mainland. The pig appears to be the only animal of note which manages to spread itself, to the confusion of philosophers, in spite of geography or geology. A pig, however, is a beast which is singularly well able to take care of itself; and Mr. Wallace, following Sir Charles Lyell, defends it from the unfounded imputation of being unable to swim. Mr. Wallace has himself seen them swimming across the strait which divides Singapore from the peninsula of Malacca, and appears to have unlimited faith in their capacities. Putting aside pigs, Mr. Wallace can generally find a solution for each successive problem, which, if we grant the hypothesis of variation, seems to be plausible and satisfactory as far as it goes.

There are various subsidiary lines of argument which he adduces in favour of the same conclusions. One curious question, for example, concerns the heavy fleshy Nicobar pigeon. This bird is found chiefly on small islands, because it feeds on the ground, and is therefore liable to the attacks of the carnivorous quadrupeds which only inhabit the larger islands. Singularly enough, however, this bird has wings of enormous strength, which is very unusual amongst ground-feeders, and which would, as a rule, be useless to it. The advantage seems to be, that it would occasionally be blown out to sea, and would have to depend on its powers of flight. Now the precisely opposite modification in case of the apteryx and other wingless birds has been produced, as it is alleged, by the same causes. Living in an island, they have found flying a dangerous habit. The explanation suggested is the same as that by which Mr. Darwin accounts for the existence in Madeira of two classes of beetles, some wingless, and others with wings of unusual strength. A little flying, it is suggested, is a dangerous thing. You must either stay steadily at home, or be able to take remarkably good care of yourself abroad, and thus obtain the advantage due, on the one hand, to inglorious repose, or, on the other, to special activity. Thus, if London garotters flourished to excess, the population would be ultimately divided into invalids who never left their houses, and athletes who could run 100 yards in ten seconds. A more remarkable set of cases are those of what is called "mimicry," or protective resemblance. Mr. Wallace has already explained, in a remarkable article in the Westminster Review, the curious devices by which certain butterflies imitate, not only plants, but other butterflies. They adopt the untradesmanlike practice of passing themselves off as the same concern. Birds, it seems, consider certain butterflies to be nasty to the taste, and other butterflies, which we may presume to be nice, succeed in imitating the nasty ones with marvellous closeness. He mentions a curious case of the same principle in birds, where a feeble-minded and weak-clawed oriole succeeds in exactly mimicking, so far as its appearance at a small distance is concerned, the bold and vigorous honeysucker, and thus obtains a currency not due to its intrinsic merits, as foreigners imitate the trademarks on Sheffield steel. The most singular of these instances is that of the Papilio Memnon. The females of this butterfly are of two distinct forms, one of which resembles the male, whilst the other is a close imitation of a different species. The curious fact is that both forms of the female are the offspring of each form. The case is the same, says Mr. Wallace, as if an Englishman had two wives, an Indian and a negress, and as if the boys were all to resemble their father, whilst the girls should resemble, not only their own mother, but the other wife of their father.

Without following Mr. Wallace's researches into natural history any further, we have said enough to show that his book touches upon many subjects of great interest, and is well worth the attention, not only of men of science, but of general readers. We need only add that the interest of the book is by no means confined to these subjects. There is much that is worth attention in his account of the human inhabitants. He can look upon savages without partaking the ordinary English opinion that they are nuisances to be swept as summarily as may be off the face of the earth. Indeed, his opinion will seem to most people unduly favourable to the savage as compared with the European. "We have progressed vastly beyond the savage state," he says, "in intellectual achievements, but we have not advanced equally in morals." If the best savage is very inferior to the best amongst civilized populations, he is far superior to the worst. We support a mass of crime and misery absolutely, if not relat[ively] greater than has ever existed before; we maintain a multit[ude] whose lot is the harder to bear because it is contrasted with the pleasures and comforts of those whom they see everywhere around them, and who are so far worse off than the savage in the midst of his tribe. We cannot enter upon the very wide discussion to which this would lead us; but more practical conclusions may be drawn from his report as to the benefits resulting from Dutch rule. He admits that the Dutch system is despotic and protective, but says that it has, on the whole, been of incalculable benefit to the native population. The ordinary result of civilized intrusion, as exemplified by English and American experience, is to spread drunkenness and demoralization, leading to ultimate extirpation. In the Dutch colonies the people have become industrious, peaceable, and civilized. They are better clothed, housed, fed, and educated than the surrounding tribes, and have made a distinct progress towards a higher social state. Many of them have been converted to Christianity, though it seems that some people consider this a doubtful benefit, and declare that the converts are thievish, lying, drunken, and lazy, as compared with the Mahommedans; but Mr. Wallace says that his experience is different. It is indeed easy to suppose that the worst class of natives may become nominal Christians from selfish and hypocritical motives. However this may be, Mr. Wallace says enough to convince us that much may be learnt from Dutch experience, and that there is still room for any one possessed of the necessary experience to write a very interesting book on the Archipelago, even if he knows nothing of beetles or birds of paradise. Meanwhile we are obliged to Mr. Wallace for what he has told us, and can only hope that his very interesting book may be as popular as it deserves to be.

MR. FROUDE'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS AT SAINT ANDREW'S.*

TO do at Rome as they do at Rome may be fairly held to imply speaking well of Rome and of the Romans. So, when a Scotch University has paid to an English author the highest compliment that it can pay, we do not at all object to his paying back again the highest compliments that he honestly can pay. The temporary Rector of a Scotch University has, we believe, little or nothing to do but to make a speech. It is only fair, then, that that speech should be civil—that whatever good the new Rector can find to say, either of Scotland in general or of his own University in particular, he should earn his cheer by saying it. But it is one thing to gratify a harmless national vanity; it is another to pander to a low provincial prejudice. It is one thing to say all the good that can be honestly said of one set of institutions; it is another to say all the harm that can be honestly or dishonestly said of another set of institutions. We should have thought that Scotland and the Scotch Universities could have stood upon their own merits without depreciation of England and the English Universities. We should have thought that to treat a Scottish audience to anything of the kind was paying it a much poorer compliment than it deserved. Mr. Froude thinks otherwise. He crosses the Tweed mainly, it would seem, to make a bitter attack upon his own country and his own University. And it is more than a bitter attack; it is an attack which is perfectly unjust. The charges which Mr. Froude brings against the English Universities are charges which either he must know to be groundless or else he must be guilty of that crassa ignorantia of the subject he takes in hand which the law looks upon as being in itself a crime.

Before we come to the English Universities, we come to the English boroughs and to the English clergy. Here is the sort of talk which Mr. Froude thinks it decorous and truthful to address to his Scottish audience. He says that Scotland has contributed more to the common stock of Great Britain than England has—an assertion which, knowing that all that has made Scotland famous is strictly English in blood and speech, we care neither to affirm nor to deny. But he then goes on:—

> More than once you saved English Protestantism; you may have to save it again, for all that I know, at the rate at which our English parsons are now running. You gave us the Stuarts, but you helped us to get rid of them. Even now you are teaching us what, unless we saw it before our eyes, no Englishman would believe to be possible, that a member of Parliament can be elected without bribery.

Now why cannot Mr. Froude talk to his Scottish hearers without this needless fling at his own countrymen? Let Mr. Froude, on proper occasions, put forth his theological opinions, whatever they may be, but why should he go out of his way to sneer at matters which are utterly off the subject, but which were likely to draw forth a cheer? And as to the boroughs, the general purity of Scottish constituencies is well known, and all honour to them for it. But what right has Mr. Froude to say or to insinuate that no English member of Parliament can be elected without bribery? No doubt bribery is, to our great shame, frightfully common in English constituencies. But all English boroughs are not like Bridgewater and Beverley. It would be easy to find English boroughs whose purity is placed as high above suspicion as that of any Scottish borough. No man can have a right to throw about accusations of this sort at random merely because they are likely to fall in with the provincial vanity of hearers.

Mr. Froude, having buttered the Scotch boroughs, next goes on to butter the Scotch schools and Universities. Well and good; in the Scotch system of education there is much that deserves praise, and when Mr. Froude picks out as its special merit that it is much cheaper than the English system, we are not disposed to say anything against him. But he need not have gone on to make statements about the actual nature of the English system which he ought to have known to be unfounded. Mr. Froude in Scotland, like Mr. Lowe in Lancashire, is not ashamed to go about with the old cry, false in the days of their own youth and still more false now, that Oxford and Cambridge teach nothing but Latin and Greek. "It is admitted," he tells us, "by every one that we cannot any longer confine ourselves to the learned languages, to the grammar and logic and philosophy which satisfied the seventeenth century." In the place in which these words are found they are patient of a favourable construction; but they are only patient of it, and they must be explained by other passages. From those other passages it is plain that Mr. Froude meant to say that the English Universities confine themselves to "the learned languages, the grammar and logic and philosophy which satisfied the seventeenth century." He cannot back out of this construction of his words, for he tells us afterwards (p. 17) that "a young man going to Oxford learns the same things which were taught there two centuries ago." And again (p. 18) he speaks of "the old Latin and Greek, which the schools must keep to while the Universities confine their honours to these." Then again he says (p. 28):—

* Inaugural Address delivered to the University of St. Andrew's, March 19, 1869. By James Anthony Froude, M.A., Rector of the University. London: Longmans & Co. 1869.

> We had a theory at Oxford that our system, however defective in many ways, yet developed in us some especially precious human qualities. Classics and philosophy are called there literæ humaniores. They are supposed to have an effect on character, and to be specially adapted for creating ministers of religion. The training of clergymen is, if anything, the special object of Oxford teaching. All arrangements are made with a view to it. The heads of colleges, the resident Fellows, Tutors, Professors are, with rare exceptions, ecclesiastics themselves.

Now it is strange that Mr. Froude could allow himself to make publicly, and to print in a book, statements which so many hundreds of people can at once deny. First of all, the assertion that the Universities confine their honours to "the old Latin and Greek" is simply upset by the history of Cambridge for a hundred years and more. According to Mr. Froude, either there never has been such a thing as a Senior Wrangler, or to be a Senior Wrangler is not looked upon as an honour, or, what Mr. Froude may possibly mean, no Senior Wrangler has any chance of a Fellowship unless he is Senior Classic as well. Then, as for Oxford, every one who knows anything of Oxford knows—Mr. Froude must know, unless he wilfully shuts his eyes—that, so far from a young man who goes to Oxford learning only the same things which he would have learned two hundred years ago, he does not learn the same things which he would have learned twenty years ago. We ask Mr. Froude a plain question. Does he know, or does he not know, that there are at Oxford such things as Schools of Mathematics, of Natural Science, of Law and Modern History? Does he know, or does he not know, that a degree and a class may be got in either of these schools without going into the final classical school at all? Does he know, or does he not know, that there are both University and College scholarships and other endowments, specially devoted to the encouragement of these studies? Does he know or does he not know that, we believe in every college, certainly in most, a large proportion of the Fellowships may be held, and are held, by laymen—that lay Fellows, lay Tutors, lay Professors, lay residents without any official character, now meet the dweller in Oxford at every step? Does Mr. Froude know these obvious facts or not? It is not a question whether the provision for History, or for Natural Science, or for any other study is exactly, in its nature or its degree, what it ought to be. These are points on which there may be, and are, many different opinions. But Mr. Froude's position is that modern Oxford makes no provision for any of these things at all, that nothing is studied but "old Latin and Greek." We give Mr. Froude his alternative. If he did not know these facts, his saying what he did is not very much worse than beginning to write the history of the sixteenth century in total ignorance of all the centuries which went before it. If he did know them—and Mr. Froude and Mr. Lowe must stand nearly alone among educated men in not knowing them—we can only say that Mr. Froude has shown himself no mean proficient in the moral school of Thomas Cromwell and Henry the Eighth.

Let us make another appeal to Mr. Froude. In some of these passages he does in a kind of way allow that besides Greek and Latin, some antiquated logic and philosophy, the logic and philosophy of the seventeenth century, are studied at Oxford. We will not ask whether the Unconditioned and the Absolute, the Objective and the Subjective—words, we believe quite unknown in the seventeenth century—are never heard of in Oxford or in the Oxford schools. We will not ask whether he thinks that Kant and Mill and Sir William Hamilton are names that no Oxford man ever hears of. Most people know these facts; Mr. Froude may not have heard of them. But we will judge him out of his own mouth. He tells us that the only philosophy studied at Oxford is that which satisfied the seventeenth century. Some way on, he talks of the "distilled essence of the thought of Bishop Butler, the greatest prelate that the English Church ever produced." Now, will Mr. Froude tell us whether it was not at Oxford, in the course of his Oxford studies, that he first became acquainted with the distilled essence of the thought of that great prelate? If Mr. Froude did not, most men of his standing did. Things change fast at Oxford, and Butler may perhaps have gone out of fashion, but if he has, we feel sure that he has given way to some writer, not of the seventeenth century but of the nineteenth.

Here again is another passage:—

> Classical philosophy, classical history and literature, taking, as they do, no hold upon the living hearts and imagination of men in this modern age, leave their working intelligence a prey to wild imaginations, and make them incapable of really understanding the world in which they live. If the clergy knew as much of the history of England and Scotland as they know about Greece and Rome, if they had been ever taught to open their eyes and see what is actually round them instead of groping among books to find what men did or thought at Alexandria or Constantinople fifteen hundred years ago, they would grapple more effectively with the moral pestilence which is poisoning all the air.

In Mr. Froude's view, the classical studies of men like Mr. Grote and Sir George Lewis left their working intelligence a mere prey to wild imaginations. The band of Oxford first-class men who form so large a portion of the present Cabinet are, in Mr. Froude's eyes, men incapable of really understanding the world in which they live. As for the clergy, does Mr. Froude really think that the mass of them know more of the history of Greece and Rome than they do of that of England and Scotland? As for Alexandria and Constantinople fifteen hundred years ago, the shot as far as Oxford is concerned is a singularly bad one. The great blot of the Oxford system is that it leaves out "what men did or thought at Alexandria or Constantinople fifteen hundred years ago," in its marvellous leap from the sacrifice of Tissaphernes to the legislation of Justinian.

Here is more about the clergy:—

> From the great houses in the City of London to the village grocer, the commercial life of England has been saturated with fraud. So deep has it gone that a strictly honest tradesman can hardly hold his ground against competition. You can no longer trust that any article that you buy is the thing which it pretends to be. We have false weights, false measures, cheating and shoddy everywhere. Yet the clergy have seen all this grow up in absolute indifference; and the great question which at this moment is agitating the Church of England is the colour of the ecclesiastical petticoats.

Mr. Froude can hardly be so utterly ignorant of the meaning of the controversies of the day as this really comes to, but the talk about "ecclesiastical petticoats" was likely to bring down the house at Saint Andrew's, and that was enough for Mr. Froude. Will it be believed that he goes on to tell the old story about the Esquire Bedel who, after hearing University sermons for fifty years, still died a Christian, turning it into something about a verger and Bishop Blomfield?

Besides the clergy, Mr. Froude must needs have a rap at the peerage:—

> The furniture of a noble earl's room at an English university at present may cost, including the pictures of opera-dancers and race-horses and such like, perhaps five hundred pounds.

To our idea a "noble earl" is neither better nor worse than another man. He may be good or bad, wise or foolish, idle or industrious. An earl, like another man, may be given to opera-dancers and race-horses, or he may be given to better things. This sneering at whole classes, be the class earls or tinkers, is exquisitely contemptible. And, but for his crassa ignorantia, Mr. Froude might know that in one branch of Oxford study—in that in which, if he knew that it existed, he might be supposed to take most interest—noblemen, gentlemen-commoners, and other men of birth and wealth form a remarkable proportion of the most successful candidates.

There are other things in the Address, some wise, some foolish, but its main point is this systematic depreciation of England and English study. Mr. Froude, like Mr. Lowe, sets most store on the things that pay, and learning, according to them, does not pay. "Old Greek and Latin" are positively mischievous; what we are to learn instead of them we are not told. But we cannot help making one remark. Mr. Froude, Mr. Lowe, and other depreciators of learning seem, whether out of ignorance or of set purpose, invariably to put out of sight the greatest of modern discoveries. Greek and Latin are always spoken of as if they were something belonging to another sphere, something which stands in no sort of relation to modern life and modern speech. Of the great science which sets before us the Greek and Englishman as simply kinsmen, speaking different varieties of one common speech, they seem to have no idea whatever.

One quotation more. Mr. Froude tells us a story of what happened "when the competitive examination was first set on foot"—we suppose he means for the Civil Service. He tells us how

> A highly distinguished man, who was to examine in English history, announced that, for himself, he meant to set a paper for which Macaulay might possibly get full marks; and he wished the rest of the examiners to imitate him in the other subjects. I saw the paper which he set. I could myself have answered two questions out of a dozen.

That Mr. Froude could answer only two questions out of a dozen does not surprise us. The distinguished examiner most likely set five questions earlier than the reign of Henry the Eighth, and five later than the reign of Elizabeth.

THE CHURCH AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

M. DE PRESSENSÉ is well known and deservedly respected as one of the leading divines of the Evangelical section of the French Protestant Church. He is a learned theologian, and a man of cultivated and liberal mind. In the present monograph he comes before us as the historian of a period which he rightly judges to have a more than local and temporary interest in the fortunes of the national Church of France. And, on the whole, he has done his work not only ably but impartially. At the same time it is necessary to bear in mind throughout that the book is distinctly and professedly "written with a purpose." Of this the author makes no secret. He is profoundly convinced that any relations of Church and State other than a complete separation of the two powers involve a grave mistake, if not a great sin; and his object in the work before us is to prove, or at least to illustrate, his thesis from the events of the French Revolution. He does not indeed speak, like Mr. Mackonochie, of the alliance of Church and State being "adultery" or "incest"; but if his language is less vehement, his opinions seem much the same. "At the very time when the second Roman expedition obtained its sad victory at Mentana, opinion was passionately pronounced, not only against the Roman theocracy, but against all State religions, and all paid and protected worships. The movement in this direction becomes every day more general and more powerful, and we may hope everything for its invigoration from the approaching Council, which, by raising the temporal power to the height of a dogma, will precipitate its definitive fall." Now we must say at once that this sort of language does not inspire confidence in the writer's judgment. It may be true that the era of established churches is drawing to its close, and it may be for the profit of religion and liberty that it should be so. But it is not true, as M. de Pressensé assumes all along, that the question lies in a nutshell, and that a few commonplaces about persecution and the right of conscience and State interference with religious belief completely settle it. On the contrary, the question is an extremely complicated one, and there is a great deal to be said on both sides as well from the religious as the liberal point of view. Nor is the argument much affected one way or the other by the fact that the Constituent Assembly went entirely beyond its legitimate province in reorganizing the Catholic Church of France on a new basis, and persecuting the ejected clergy who refused to conform to the civil constitution, that public worship was restored with much praiseworthy zeal and success during the brief interval of separation of Church and State, and that the Concordat was an insidious measure sacrificing both freedom and ecclesiastical right to the political exigencies of a grinding despotism. However, we may take our author's statement of the facts, which is both accurate and full, without being obliged to follow his running commentary of deductions. And in this record lies the real interest of his book.

The history of the French Revolution has been written by such numberless pens, both French and English, that it might be supposed a fresh narrative would be a blunder, if not an impertinence. But we are not aware that any previous writer has treated the subject from the purely ecclesiastical point of view. It is a well-known theory of Dean Stanley's, based on the famous dictum of Tertullian, ubi tres laici, ibi Ecclesia, that the history of the Church and of the world are the same, only viewed under different aspects. Be it so, but the different point of view makes all the difference in the manner of handling the subject. The twelve years included in the present sketch, ranging from the outbreak of the Revolution in 1789 to the signing of Napoleon's Concordat with the Pope in 1801, so literally bristle with events that everything depends on the selection and manner of grouping them. It would be impossible to do justice to the whole evolution of the drama in all its varied bearings, civil, social, and religious, in one continuous narrative. Even many crucial incidents, such as the execution of Robespierre, or the feat of Charlotte Corday, and the judicial murder of the King and Queen, are passed over here with the barest mention. But the ecclesiastical policy of the successive revolutionary Governments, and the fortunes of the Church both Constitutional and Nonjuring, are presented with great clearness, and in a spirit of religious appreciation and candour, eminently creditable to the author in dealing with a system to which theologically he is so strongly opposed. Nor do we at all wish to imply that no hints may be gathered from his lifelike record as to the questions which are every day assuming a more practical shape on the future attitude of Church and State to each other; only we must protest against his rough and ready method by disposing of the whole matter currente calamo, without apparently any shadow of misgiving that there may be two sides to the controversy. The first religious questions discussed in the Constituent Assembly concerned freedom of conversion, and the reorganization and partial alienation of Church property. The clergy, as was to be expected, offered a strenuous opposition on both points, but appear on the whole to have acquiesced with moderation and dignity in the surrender of their doubtless enormous revenues. To say the least, they behaved quite as well as the Irish ecclesiastics of our own day, in face of a somewhat similar contingency. It is amusing to find Mirabeau advocating full toleration—whether ironically or not is hardly clear—on the ground that "the Protestants, inevitably condemned in the other world, as every one knows, have tolerably arranged their affairs in this, doubtless by a compensation due to the goodness of the Supreme Being." He appears to have thought that ungodliness had the possession of the life that now is, and godliness of that which is to come. The author has, we think, proved conclusively that in the earlier stages of the Revolution the religious sentiment was so far from being feeble or extinct in the country that it was, to use his own term, the most considerable power the Revolution had to deal with. It was, in every sense, a fatal error to outrage that sentiment, and to set loyalty to Catholic convictions at hopeless feud with loyalty to the popular cause, by the foolish and iniquitous scheme of the so-called Constitutional Church. So far as this was due to the Jansenist members of the Assembly—and we fear that M. de Pressensé is right in attributing it partly to their machinations—we can only say that they took a revenge at once ignoble and irreligious for the century of worrying and unjust persecutions to which their Ultramontane enemies had subjected them. The Constituent Assembly was not unnaturally reproached with "transforming itself into a schismatical and Presbyterian Council," when, not content with cutting down the property of the Church, and securing freedom of opinion for those without her pale—which did lie within its competence—it went beyond its sphere by legislating on her internal government, and that independently of any authority of the Episcopate or the Pope. The whole arrangement of dioceses and parishes, and the methods of appointment to bishoprics and ordination, were revolutionized, and in a way that subjected everything to popular vote, even Protestants being free to take part in the elections. It was, in our author's words, "to bring back the thought of Rousseau in all its intolerance"; and none can seriously blame the clergy or the Pope for the decided attitude of open resistance which they henceforth took up. Yet it is instructive to mark that Pius VI., in accordance with the fatal traditions which for some centuries past have guided the counsels of the Vatican, and which are due much more to the claims of his temporal than of his spiritual office, insisted throughout on confounding the open vindication with the practical violation of religious liberty in one sweeping censure. In the Secret Consistory of March, 1790, and in many subsequent briefs, he unequivocally condemned the National Assembly for vindicating liberty of conscience, and admitting non-Catholics to civil and military offices, while he treated political liberty as an idle phantom, and maintained the divine rights of absolute power, with which he identified himself as closely as Pius IX. has done since. The French bishops, indeed, who, with only four exceptions, nobly maintained their position, at the cost of exile or death, against the interference of the Government with their spiritual prerogatives, demurred to these monstrous principles, in their reply to Rome; but the prominent leaders of the clerical section, men like the Abbé Maury, for instance, caught their tone from the organs of the Vatican, and sneered bitterly at the very notion of liberty of conscience. It is fair to bear this in mind in considering the scenes that followed, where we are in danger of forgetting that the intolerable provocation given by the revolutionary Governments to the religious feeling of the country was not altogether unprovoked. We should remember, too, that there was always a minority, though for a time it was completely overpowered, even among the thoroughgoing and atheistic revolutionists, who boldly stood up for the principles of equal religious freedom for all; the Girondists, we are sorry to say, were not among them. Talleyrand raised an honest but ineffectual protest in favour of the right of the non-juring clergy to celebrate their own worship and call and treat the Constitutional Church as schismatic, if such was their belief. We must find room for the passage describing the culminating scene in the National Assembly, when the clergy finally refused the oath to the new ecclesiastical constitution, and retired. It is a scene to which, in their different ways, Froude or Stanley would have done ample justice. M. de Pressensé has no such graphic power, but the tale is well told, and the mere recital has an eloquence of its own:—

On January 4th, at the morning sitting, commenced the grand scene of the refusal of the oath. It was as the counterpart of that which has rendered for ever illustrious the hall of the Tennis Court. Nothing but the most sectarian party spirit can deny its grandeur. I am aware what political passions, ever to be regretted, were mingled with that noble resistance to an unjust decree; I am aware that with religion were associated the counter-revolution, and regret for the ancient régime, with its abuses and privileges; but it is not the less true that on that day, despite this fatal and culpable mingling, religion defended its rights, and preserved them by great sacrifices, offered in the midst of the gravest perils. In fact, popular effervescence had reached its height, kept up by frantic lampoons. At the very moment when the president summoned the ecclesiastical deputies, amid the silence, full of expectation and anxiety, which reigned in the Assembly, there might be heard the vociferations of the multitude, who were strongly disposed to show, by their acts, that for them liberty was confounded with their good pleasure. No one having answered the summons of the president, the roll-call commenced. The Bishop of Agen was the first to ascend the tribune; the uproar from without grows stronger, and scarcely has he opened his mouth than from the left several voices cry out, "No words. Do you take the oath; yes or no?" The Bishop expressed himself with calmness and gentleness: "You have made a law," said he; "by the 4th Article you have said that the public ecclesiastical functionaries should take an oath, the form of which you have decreed; by the 5th Article, that if they should refuse to take this oath, they should have forfeited their offices. I feel no regret for my place, no regret for my fortune; I should feel it for the loss of your esteem, which I wish to merit. I pray you then to accept my assurance of the pain I suffer in not being able to take the oath." The first ecclesiastic called after the Bishop of Agen is a simple parish priest, M. Fournés. He pronounces only these words: "I will say with the simplicity of the first Christians, 'I gain glory and honour in following my bishop, as Laurentius followed his pastor.'" . . . Decidedly the roll-call was turning against the intentions of the Assembly, and serving only to give eclat to resistance. They resumed the collective summons. They obtained only an oath pure and simple. Cazalès demanded that at least the Assembly should declare that it had not wished to touch the spiritual. "It has not touched it, and that suffices," cried Mirabeau. This last attempt at conciliation was thus brusquely set aside. The Bishop of Poitiers spoke in these terms: "I am seventy years of age; I have passed thirty-five of them in the episcopate, where I have done all the good that I could do. Overwhelmed with years, I do not wish to dishonour my old age—I do not wish to take an oath." Murmurs broke out, and the Bishop descends from the tribune saying, "I will take my lot in penitence."

The split between the non-juring and Constitutional clergy, and the atrocious attempt, constantly renewed, to put down the latter by force, is the dominant fact of the religious history of the next ten years, and the real ground of the Vendean insurrection. We may infer the spirit of the ruling party from a kind of mock sermon composed by Camille Desmoulins, and put into the mouth of a parish priest at Paris, ending in these words:—"When they are not paid, you will very soon know, my very dear brethren, that this sort of demons, which are called Pharisees or princes of priests, is not cast out except by fasting." The persuasive argument of starvation, and, later on, of the galleys and the guillotine, was freely applied to the "refractory" clergy, but with very indifferent success. On the other hand, the ranks of the Constitutional clergy seem, with some glaring exceptions, to have been recruited with upright and honourable men, who did their best, against fearful odds, to sustain the faith and religious spirit of their flocks. We cannot follow the author through the exciting and often harrowing details of the ignominious persecution which culminated in the massacres of September, when "the refractories" were the first victims. He observes, with perfect justice, that "nothing more resembles the Spanish Inquisition than the Revolutionary Tribunal in the decisions of the Convention"; only, happily, the one counts its bloody dominion by years, while the other counts it by centuries. Priests crammed in hulks, or sent en masse to the scaffold, nuns whipped in the streets, or singing the Salve Regina at the foot of the scaffold, are pictures constantly recurring during those dreary years, the only crime of the victims being a refusal to accept, at the bidding of the State, what they held to be schismatical ministrations.

With the advent of Napoleon to supreme power, a new and more inglorious chapter opens in the history of the French Church. That his serious aim in effecting the Concordat was to enlist the religious sentiment, in the persons of its authorized guardians, on his side as a serviceable instrument of despotic power, is notorious enough. But M. de Pressensé has brought out with peculiar force and clearness the cynical insolence of his pretended patronage of religion, and his odd collusion, for his own purposes, with the extremest Ultramontane pretensions, to which he gave undoubtedly the greatest impetus of modern times by calling on Pius VII. to ride roughshod over precedent, canon law, and equity in the redistribution of the French dioceses, and the arbitrary superseding of the Bishops who had been faithful to him through years of poverty and risk, and were now rewarded by the brand of schismatics when they demurred to so unheard-of an invasion of their legitimate rights. When he avowed his real belief Napoleon spoke with contemptuous indifference of all forms of faith. While the negotiations with the Roman Court were proceeding he spoke as follows to one of his intimates, and there is abundant evidence that, for once, he was saying what he meant:—

> The people must have a religion; this religion must be in the hands of the Government. Fifty emigrant bishops, paid by England, to-day lead the French clergy. We must destroy their influence; the authority of the Pope is necessary for that. He dismisses them, or makes them give in their resignation. It is declared that the Catholic religion being that of the majority of the French, the exercise of it ought to be organised. The First Consul nominates a hundred bishops, the Pope institutes them; they nominate the parish priests—the State pays them. They take the oath. The priests who do not submit are transported. It will be said that I am a Papist. I am nothing. I was a Mahomedan in Egypt; I shall be a Catholic here, for the good of the people. I do not believe in religions, but in the idea of a God."

The Pope, on his part, was induced to consent to a coup d'état which raised his power beyond the wildest dreams of Ultramontane fanaticism by the obvious suggestion of his counsellors:—"Let us conclude the Concordat which he (Napoleon) desires; they will know, when it is ratified, all the immensity of its religious importance, and the power which it gives to Rome over the episcopacy in all the world." It was this argument, and the hope of recovering the Legations, that finally silenced the scruples of the pious but vacillating Pontiff as to the extent of his powers, and the cruel return he was making to the prelates who had so nobly fought his battles on the ground of principle, but were not prepared to acquiesce in these novel and uncanonical claims. It is to this, and to the senseless ecclesiastical policy of Louis Philippe and Guizot, that the modern French Church owes its servile prostration before the despotism of the Court of Rome.

Mr. Stroyan's translation is creditable on the whole, but there has been some carelessness both in the composition and correction of the press. Thus we are told in one place that till "the separation of civil and religious cats" (?) was accomplished there was no security for freedom of conscience. In another place, "we do not understand that" evidently means "how." Neither is "ancient vicars," and the like, English in the sense of late vicars. The type, however, is admirable, and helps to make the book very pleasant reading.

THE RING AND THE BOOK.*

THE last three volumes of Mr. Browning's poem have more than fulfilled the promise of the first volume. The book rises in dignity as it goes on; the poet warms with his subject; the abrupt and fragmentary style is changed for a continuous flow; the hints and outlines of character, which in the first volume tantalized and at times irritated the reader, become expanded into full-length portraits, of which every portion has been deeply considered and blended into harmony with the rest. And not only is the actual delineation and workmanship of the later divisions of the poem superior to the beginning, but the poem gains much in intelligibility by being studied as a whole. The introduction itself, which on the first reading seemed difficult and obscure, is illuminated by the light which is shed on it by what comes afterwards. There are few writers who can so little afford to be judged by isolated parts of their works as Mr. Browning. He seems to say to his readers, Take all or none; those who are unwilling to read the whole of what he presents to them as one piece can seldom understand any portion of it properly. This is the characteristic of a profoundly intellectual mind; and herein lies the most striking difference between Mr. Browning and his great living rival. In Tennyson, what clings to the reader's mind is not the broad conception of any of his works, but the concentration and power with which intense thoughts are compressed into single lines. The difficulty which is so noticeable in many passages of In Memoriam results, as in Tacitus, from the brevity of the expressions; the difficulty in Paracelsus, or the Ring and the Book, results from the subtlety and generality of the thought.

It is not necessary to repeat the account of the plot which we gave in our review of the first volume. No new fact comes out in the succeeding portions; the facts already given are merely filled out and animated with living breath; the glow of colour is added to the scanty sketch which is sufficient for the merely material part of the transaction narrated. There is, no doubt, much inequality. The picture which Mr. Browning presents to us is on a large scale; it is comparable to the gigantic productions of some of the Venetian painters. And while the main elements of Mr. Browning's work have to the full extent the unity and massiveness of those great men, there is, perhaps, in his subordinate parts, a failure to depict minute and commonplace events with that grace and exquisite perfection which Veronese threw even over his trivialities. Few of his readers will not feel a little resentment at Dominus Hyacinthus de Archangelis, and Juris Doctor Johannes-Baptista Bottinius. These characters ought to have acted (and are intended to act) as a foil to the deep tragedy of the piece; there should have been no effort in their delineation, they should have been a relaxation after the severe problems which Guido and Caponsacchi present to us, they should have represented the grace of a more commonplace and ordinary life in contrast to the struggles of ambition and passion. They are, however, too irredeemably silly, and that not with a humorous but with a wearisome silliness; it is an effort to take any interest in them at all; and the length of their lucubrations does not add to the easiness of perusing them. And their arguments for and against Count Guido are of the most indifferent, where some real light was needed to be thrown on the curious circumstances of the case. Indeed, Mr. Browning throughout, in his treatment of the question which he sets forth, shows much more of the subtlety of the psychologist than of the lawyer. While analysing with the greatest skill the turns and windings of thought and impulse in his imagined characters, he hardly pays sufficient attention to the material parts of the case—to the actual question of evidence, of what did or did not happen; he assumes rather than conclusively demonstrates the portentous guilt of Guido Franceschini. But, after all, a poet cannot be expected to be a lawyer; and we should not have touched upon this point had it not been for the somewhat formal aspect of legal advocacy which appears on the surface in the Ring and the Book.

Of the twelve divisions of the poem, five are undeniably superior to the rest; the two speeches of Guido, and the speeches of Caponsacchi, Pompilia, and the Pope. Vivid description and strong passion mark the speech of Caponsacchi; dramatic skill and profound insight into character appear in the two of Guido; while the meditation of the Pope displays that intensity of thought on religious problems which is more continual in Mr. Browning than in any other poet of the same eminence. Pompilia is hardly so perfect as the others; a wife, however estranged from her husband, however much she had suffered at his hands, would scarcely have been able to regard him in so purely indifferent a manner, from so external a point of view, as Pompilia takes up with respect to Count Guido. We allude to such lines as the following:—

> And when next day the cavalier who came > . . . . . proved Guido Franceschini,—old
> And nothing like so tall as I myself,
> Hooknosed and yellow in a bush of beard,
> Much like a thing I saw on a boy's wrist,
> He called an owl and used for catching birds,—
> And when he took my hand and made a smile—
> Why, the uncomfortableness of it all > Seemed hardly more important in the case
> Than,—when one gives you, say, a coin to spend,—
> Its newness or its oldness.

This is very Browningesque. But surely the intimacy of Pompilia with one so vile as Guido must have left on her mind too deep a horror to admit of her expressing herself in this fashion. Yet there are in Pompilia's speech passages charming in their simplicity, as for instance the following:—

> When I was a mere child, my mother . . . . that's > Violante, you must let me call her so
> Nor waste time, trying to unlearn the word . . . .
> She brought a neighbour's child of my own age
> To play with me of rainy afternoons;
> And since there hung a tapestry on the wall,
> We two agreed to find each other out
> Among the figures. "Tisbe, that is you,
> With half-moon on your hairknot, spear in hand,
> Flying, but no wings, only the great scarf

* The Ring and the Book. By Robert Browning. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1869.

Blown to a bluish rainbow at your back:
Call off your hound and leave the stag alone!"
"And there are you, Pompilia, such green leaves
Flourishing out of your five finger-ends,
And all the rest of you so brown and rough:
Why is it you are turned a sort of tree?"
You know the figures never were ourselves
Though we nicknamed them so. Thus, all my life,—
As well what was, as what, like this, was not,— Looks old, fantastic, and impossible:
I touch a fairy thing that fades and fades.

But Caponsacchi and Guido are Mr. Browning's most signal triumphs. We question if, since the great dramatists of the Elizabethan age, English poetry has ever produced characters so solid, so complex, so carefully thought out. How superior is Guido to Count Cenci, in Shelley's play! Cenci is a motiveless monster; he has a fiendish delight in cruelty and lust, but we recognise in him no community of nature with ourselves; the possibility of becoming like him does not occur to us in our wildest imaginations. But Guido is, every inch of him, a man of passions, reasonings, volitions, the like of which may be seen (though not in the same combination) in many of those whom we meet in our daily life. The union of his cold sceptical nature with the heat of his fierce revenge might have seemed contradictory if portrayed by an inferior master; but in Mr. Browning's hands the apparent inconsistency proves to be one of nature's contrasts, the more veritable because so unexpected. And again, it is true of him, what is true perhaps of every real human being, but what is not found in the exaggerated villains of novelists, that in spite of all his degradation we may admire somewhat in him—namely, the courage and coolness with which he conducts his defence. He has not indeed the physical courage to be able to face immediate death, and at the very last he breaks down in laments and supplications; but on no occasion on which forethought and prudence can be of any value to him does he flinch. Take his own account, in his first speech, of the murder he had committed; how plausible it is! How he had paused, in doubt as to the guilt or innocence of his wife; how he had determined to test her with the name of her lover; how he had pronounced outside the door the name "Caponsacchi":—

And the door
Opened. And then,—why, even then, I think,
I' the minute that confirmed my worst of fears,
Surely,—I pray God that I think aright!—
Had but Pompilia's self, the tender thing
Who once was good and pure, was once my lamb,
And lay in my bosom, had the well-known shape
Fronted me in the doorway, stood there faint
With the recent pang, perhaps, of giving birth
To what might, though by miracle, seem my child,—
Nay more, I will say, had even the aged fool
Pietro, the dotard, in whom folly and age
Wrought, more than enmity or malevolence,
To practise and conspire against my peace,—
Had either of these but opened, I had paused.
But it was she the hag, she that brought hell
For a dowry with her to her husband's house . . .
. . . . There was the end!
Then was I rapt away by the impulse, one
Immeasurable everlasting wave of a need
To abolish that detested life.

What follows is no whit inferior. But it is in his second speech that the genuine nature of Guido is most revealed; for here he is speaking privately, in prison, to the two ecclesiastics that are sent to prepare him for death, and consequently he gives much freer rein to his impulses than he had done in his public defence. On the surface, indeed, he seems to be laying aside all reserve, and uttering the very thoughts of his heart. Probably even he appeared to himself to be doing so, and it is not till the last moment, when the officers come to lead him to execution, that the deeper depth, the more vivid reality, is disclosed in his piercing cry for life. He tells his hearers that all he had hitherto said was vanity—the conceit of the head, not the truth of the heart—and he departs appealing to Pompilia for aid:—

Abate,—Cardinal,—Christ,—Maria,—God, . . .
Pompilia, will you let them murder me?

So powerful a contrast between what a man deceives himself into thinking that he thinks, and what he really thinks when tried by the touchstone of reality, has rarely been described in poetry. It cannot be appreciated unless the whole of Guido's subtle shifting arguments are perused, arguments replete with a mocking cynicism, an affected carelessness, and a would-be heroism.

The fiery and open nature of Caponsacchi is a striking contrast to the character we have just been describing. His speech is of a kind which is a novelty in Mr. Browning's writings; there is in it so much of straightforward description, so little of argumentative subtlety. The poet is here deserting what has hitherto been his strongest ground; but few of his readers will regret the change. Here is a vivid piece:—

Suddenly I saw
The old tower, and the little whitewalled clump
Of buildings, and the cypress-tree or two,— "Already Castelnuovo—Rome!" I cried,
"As good as Rome,—Rome is the next stage, think!
This is where travellers' hearts are wont to beat.
Say you are saved, sweet lady!" Up she woke.
The sky was fierce with colour from the sun
Setting. She screamed out "No, I must not die!
Take me no farther, I should die: stay here!
I have more life to save than mine!"
She swooned.
We seemed safe: what was it foreboded so?
Out of the coach into the inn I bore
The motionless and breathless, pure and pale
Pompilia,—bore her through a pitying group,
And laid her on a couch, still calm and cured
By deep sleep of all woes at once. The host
Was urgent, "Let her stay an hour or two!
Leave her to us, all will be right by morn!"
Oh, my foreboding! But I could not choose.

We have touched lightly on the faults of the Ring and the Book. They are, in truth, considerable, but they lie mostly on the surface. The length of the poem is far too great; the form of it is clumsy; the repetitions numerous. Here and there is a passage full of Mr. Browning's old contortions and obscurities, which have rendered Paracelsus and so many of his lyrics sealed books to the multitude. But, all deductions being made, he has in the present volumes given to the world a poem that must be considered one of the most considerable of the nineteenth century.

THE NORTHERN HEIGHTS OF LONDON.*

It is impossible to set bounds to the onward march by which the extension of London threatens to invade what little of rural or sylvan nature still environs its mass of brick and stone. One by one the green hills or slopes which encircle the London basin are being sapped by the advancing parallels of commonplace villas and terraces. Little as there is in the aspect of these vulgar masses of buildings to suggest the regiæ moles of the poet, there is much to awaken the sigh so natural to a man of taste over the scanty acreage left to the ploughshare or the spade. Ere the last of these meadowy and leafy haunts gives way to the incursion of the trowel and the hod, it is well that the task of picturing their charms or chronicling their history should be taken in hand by some writer alive to the interest of the subject, and qualified to act as vates sacer to the worthies of old time. In Mr. William Howitt the Northern Heights of London have met with an annalist full at least of hearty good will towards his subject, and qualified by the practice of a long and chequered literary life to tell fluently and with ease the tale of a locality which personal residence has made familiar and dear to him. The industry displayed in the compilation of the volume before us entitles him to much praise. We should have been glad of a more systematic arrangement here and there of the materials he has been at so much pains to collect, as well as of a more critical exactness in his statement of historical or antiquarian details. His narrative, however, is never dry, and his style, though too often betraying the twang of popular journalism, has the smooth and easy flow of a practised writer. His book will be welcome to those who wish to possess, in a handy compass and in a readable form, a selection of the better sort of gossip and lower form of history which attaches to this portion of the metropolitan suburbs.

The insatiable appetite for green fields which Cowley deplored in "the monster London" has at all times given rise to complaints, some of which now strike us with as much surprise at their terrors as at the measures they called forth by way of remedy. Mr. Howitt traces pleasantly some of the earliest stages of this all-devouring growth, and the futile attempts to set bounds to its rapacity. Over the whole of these northern heights spread in the time of FitzStephen, one of our oldest topographers (between 1170 and 1182), the vast and quiet forest of Middlesex. Only a step from the busy city were cornfields, pastures, and delightful meadows, intermixed with pleasant streams, on which stood many a mill, whose clack was grateful to the ear. "Beyond them a forest extends itself, beautified with woods and groves, and full of the lairs and coverts of beasts and game, stags, bucks, boars, and wild bulls." These wild bulls, the writer thought, were probably buffaloes, or like the beasts of Andalusia in Spain, which are not large. From the remains which occasionally turn up we may surmise, with Mr. Howitt, that the breed was more likely much the same as the ancient British stock which Sir Walter Scott tells us ranged the old Caledonian forest, and of which the famous Chillingham herd forms the last expiring relics. In this forest flourished abundant yew trees, whence were drawn goodly store of the national weapon. The fine old woods were, according to Maitland's History of London, disafforested in the reign of Henry III., A.D. 1218. A considerable breadth, however, seems to have been retained as hunting and sporting ground for the sovereign. We find Henry VIII., by proclamation addressed to the Mayor and Sheriffs of London, denouncing imprisonment and further penalties against all such as presumed to kill hare, partridge, pheasant, or heron, from his Palace at Westminster to "St. Gyles in the Fields, and from thence to Islington, to our Lady of the Oke, to Highgate, to Hornsey Parke, to Hampstead Heath, and from thence to his said Palace of Westminster." His daughter Elizabeth used to frequent Islington and Highgate Woods for hunting and hawking. She took up her quarters at Canonbury Tower, and her courtiers had houses around, amid woods and gardens. Mr. Howitt speaks of Raleigh's house still remaining as the "Pied Bull" at Islington. Alarms at the inordinate extension of London disturbed, towards the latter part of her reign, the mind of the great Queen. A proclamation appeared, dated at Norwich, July 7, 1580, forbidding any "further buildings being erected by any class of people, within the limits of the said city, or within three miles from any of its gates; also that not more than one family should live in one house, and that such families should not take inmates." The penalty for infringing this stringent sumptuary law was imprisonment without bail till good security was found for keeping the enactments. The figures which were thought to justify these arbitrary restrictions may well provoke a smile in our day. Harrison's Description of England sets down the population of England, in the year 1575, at about 5,000,000. If we quadruple the population of London from 1377, when it was only 35,000, the metropolis of Elizabeth's reign would not exceed 140,000. The Stuarts were equally haunted by fears of the growth of London. James I. had scarcely come to the throne when he ordered all such houses as had been erected contrary to Elizabeth's proclamation to be pulled down. In 1617, and again in 1622, all nobles, knights, and gentlemen were ordered to go hence, with their wives and families, and to remain in their country-houses till they were called again to Parliament, in order to restrain what the Scottish Solomon terms a "ricketty distemper in the head of the kingdom which occasioneth a flux of humours to approach the Court." Nor was Cromwell, as Mr. Howitt shows, a whit the wiser in this respect. In 1656 a fine of one year's rent was ordered against any offender who had erected a house having less than four acres of land attached to it, and of 100*l.* against any one who had erected a house without land. These proclamations seem to have remained a dead letter, save that they served occasionally as means for the extortion of bribes by favourites about the Court. So limited at this time was the public locomotion that in 1620 there were only twenty-five hackney coaches in all London and Westminster. Those having increased in 1635, the King ordered that no hackney coach should be used for anything but to carry people into and out of London at least three miles—not from one part of town to another, "because they obstructed the streets and rendered them dangerous to His Majesty, his beloved consort, and the nobility," besides rendering hay and provender dear. No more than fifty hackney coachmen were allowed, but Cromwell extended the number to two hundred.

The "northern heights" of London had up to this time remained unscaled by the gathering phalanx of life at their base. Mr. Howitt's practice being to abstain from giving authorities, it is not always easy to check or to appreciate the sources on which he depends for his opening statements. We look in vain in Mr. Kemble for the very apocryphal grant of the manor of Hampstead from Edgar the Peaceable, in 978, to his Minister Mangoda. As Edgar died in 975, there is here either a mistake in the figures, or something very like a forgery on the part of the monks of Westminster, to whom we are told the manor was granted on its lapse to the Crown after the death of Mangoda without heirs. It is named as consisting of five hydes in Edward the Confessor's grant on restoring the Cathedral of Westminster. Its value was only 100*s.* In Domesday, where the account is somewhat confused, it was returned as only 50*s.* The chief villein was one Ralph Peverel; a Norman, so adds Mr. Howitt, who had married Ingelrica, the Conqueror's discarded mistress. In the reign of Edward II. the convent of Westminster received by grant from Sir Roger Brabazon, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, the adjoining manor of Belsize, comprising a house with 57 acres of land. At the dissolution of monasteries the manor of Hampstead was conferred on the bishopric of Westminster, to which Thomas Thirlby was consecrated in 1540. In nine years the Bishop had alienated nearly all the property of the see, and it was reduced to a deanery; when the Crown obtained possession of Hampstead manor, then valued at 65*l.* 15*s.* yearly, Edward conferred it upon Sir Thomas Wroth, whose grandson, Sir Robert—the husband of Lady Mary Dudley, niece of Sir Philip Sidney, and author of Urania, in imitation of the Arcadia—ordered it by will to be sold. It thus passed to Sir Baptist Hickes, afterwards Lord Campden, and from his family to the Noels, through the marriage of his daughter Juliana with Sir Robert Noel of Burleigh in Rutlandshire. In 1707 the manor was purchased by Sir W. Langhorne, a wealthy East India merchant, lord also of the manor of Charlton in Kent. Failing issue of Sir William, both estates passed by remainder to Sir John Conyers, and on his death to Margaret Maryon, and next to her son, the Rev. John Maryon, whose granddaughter marrying General Sir Thomas Spencer Wilson, the property devolved upon their only son, the present owner, Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson.

The primitive village of Hampstead—anciently written Hamestede, simply the "homestead"—first drew to itself the seekers of health and pleasure by the attraction of its mineral waters. In the reign of Henry VIII. it is said to have been inhabited by a colony of washerwomen, but by the beginning of the eighteenth century it had become a regular watering-place. Handbills and the advertising puffs of the day duly set forth the attractions of concerts, raffles, races on the heath, entertainments at Belsize House, and "private marriages at Sion Chapel." A comedy called Hampstead Heath, acted at Drury Lane in 1706, gives a graphic picture of what was to the Cockney mind of the period the "nearest show of Paradise." Belsize House, long in possession of the Wade family, and afterwards in that of the Earls of Chesterfield, was opened in 1720 as the prototype of Ranelagh or Vauxhall. The Lower Flask Tavern was another adjunct to Hampstead Wells. A paper in the Tatler, August 1709, speaks in terms of warning of the "raffling shop, secretly supported by a deep practitioner in the law." The numerous wells round London furnish a chapter by themselves to Mr. Howitt's book. Another is afforded by the feats of highwaymen, the most daring of which perhaps is the case of a Bill filed in the Court of Exchequer by John Everet, a notorious robber, to recover from Joseph Williams his proper share of 2,000*l.*, amassed by the fraternity by open and downright plunder and cutting of purses upon the heath; for which insult and contempt of court, the attorney, one Wreathock, who also practised on the highway, was committed to the Fleet for six months. Plaintiff and defendant both came to the gallows. Among famous denizens of this suburb, as villas began to dot its green solitudes, appear Lords Erskine and Chatham, the latter of whom passed at North End the mysterious year of his retirement and gloom. Poets, artists, and men of letters were drawn to these pleasant haunts. Steele had a cottage there in which Sir Charles Sedley had died. Addison and his friends often met in the gardens of the Bull and Bush. Akenside's friend Dyson bought him a house here; and Johnson took lodgings for his wife's health. Blake was wont to refresh his harassed spirit, or nurse his wayward fancy, in the company of his friend Linnell. In Leigh Hunt's cottage in the Vale of Health most of the finest poetry of Keats was written. From Millfield Lane to Caen Wood was known as Poets' Lane, frequented by Hunt, Keats, Lamb, Hazlitt, and Coleridge. In Church Row lived the Aikins, and here Mrs. Barbauld set up her school, and wrote poems to the mild delight of her generation. The church and church-yard have yielded up an endless roll of more or less illustrious dead, whose memories have made their precincts classic or holy ground. Scarcely less rich in historical and biographical associations are the once secluded villages of Highgate and Hornsey. Muswell Hill, originally the "Moss-well"—another of the suburban spas—boasted a chapel dedicated to Our Lady of Muswell, to which flocked crowds of pilgrims. This well, now called St. Dunstan's, has been but lately protected, Mr. Howitt writes, by Act of Parliament in the interest of the parishioners, and still retains with many its repute for medicinal properties.

The etymology or derivation of Islington has always been a puzzle with antiquaries. Hisselton, Hyseldone, Yseldon, and Eyseldon are varieties with which the name presents itself in early authorities. Isendune, Isendon, and Iseltone occur in Domesday, and Isendone in the most ancient records of St. Paul's. The name as written over the stall of the prebend in the choir of the old cathedral was Iseldone, according to Dugdale, and the prebend was valued at eight marks. In the Valor Ecclesiasticus the Islyngton præbenda de stands as xxl. xs. xd. Lysons ridiculously takes the name to mean the "Hill of Iron," from the chalybeate springs in the neighbourhood. Skinner still more absurdly derives it from "Gisel, a hostage, in Anglo-Saxon." Sharon Turner in some respects comes nearer the mark in referring it to Ysseldune, the "down of the Yssel," supposed to be the original name of the river of Wells which fell into the Fleet. Houghton suggests a far-fetched derivation from the "British word Ishel, 'lower,' and twyn, 'a fortified enclosure,'" indicating a fort or tower below Highgate or Hampstead. Mr. Howitt suspends his judgment, though he might safely have cast in his lot with Mr. Tomlins, who, in his Antiquarian Perambulation of Islington decides on Ysel or Eysel being the same as Ousel, the diminutive for Ouse or Eyse, the British for water or a river. Islington, accordingly, is the "town of the river." This is made absolutely clear by the occurrence in Domesday of an Iselingetuna, Esingatuna, or Isingetuna, in Norfolk, so called from its site on the Ouse or Isis. Of all the northern heights of London Islington is the most ancient in story. Battle Bridge perpetuates the tradition of Boadicea's last desperate onset and overthrow, when 80,000 Britons fell before the legions of Suetonius. Whether the skeleton of the elephant disinterred here some years ago was a relic of the invading host, or a native of the British woods in prehistoric and semi-tropical times, Mr. Howitt has not given sufficient heed to palæontology to decide for us. He has brought in a curious note derived by Carte from the Mostyn papers touching the deputation who accompanied Llewellyn to London during the troubles in Wales under Edward I. The Snowdon barons were quartered at Islington, and entertained with the best that the country afforded. Unhappily they could not drink the wine and ale of London. The English bread they slighted, and the environs failed to supply milk enough for their party. Their pride, too, was galled by the vulgar staring of the Londoners at the strangers' outlandish garb. "No," chorussed the indignant Britons, "we will never again visit Islington except as conquerors." And from that instant they resolved to take up arms. Here the luckless Henry VI. was met by the insolent Warwick, and with every mark of ignominy escorted to the Tower. "Between Eyseldon and Shoreditch" his more fortunate conqueror, Edward IV., was met by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen with addresses of congratulation. And hereabouts, after the defeat of Lambert Simnel, Henry VII. was saluted by a similar deputation. Hither came, in 1557, the pensioners of Queen Mary, sent to greet the ambassadors of the Czar of Muscovy; and here, in the same year, a band of Protestants, including one John Rough, chaplain to the Earl of Arran, and an intimate friend of John Knox, were burnt at the stake. As the stream of history widens its bounds and landmarks, and becomes more fixed and sure, the incidents of the local chronicle multiply upon us, and the compiler's work grows more minute. It is impossible for mere extracts to do justice to the fulness of the writer's details. Allowing for a certain tendency to mere book-making, as well as for a degree of prolixity natural enough to a veteran in letters, his work has in it an amount of pleasant reading to make it go down with the general public.

MATERIALS FOR A HISTORY OF OIL-PAINTING.*

BY this volume the labour of love which the late lamented President of the Academy undertook, more than twenty years ago, for the cause of his art, is completed. It is possible that the title of the book may give an incorrect idea of its object to a hasty reader—leading him to expect a work of the biographical order, like that which in old days we owe to Vasari, and in our own time to Cavalcaselle. But what Sir Charles Eastlake has here modestly named "materials" are, in truth, the history of oil-painting as an art, from the earliest period to the days of Reynolds and Gainsborough. He is not ostensibly engaged with the biography of artists, nor with the national influences which formed their style and prescribed their subjects, nor with their individual powers of treating them. His aim is throughout to trace the gradual steps by which oil-colours superseded colours of a more perishable or a less effective nature, and were then elaborated into the magnificent art of which the lords paramount were Van Eyck and Bellini, Titian and Veronese, Correggio and Rubens, Rembrandt and Velasquez. We might easily lengthen this imperial list, but what a purple splendour there is about it as it stands! Like an enumeration of famous landscapes, what visions of glow and glory does it call up! But we have given it, not with any wish to dwell upon these alluring topics, but simply to convey to our readers a true impression of the importance and interest of the subject dealt with in these volumes. For, by virtue of the unity which always exists, not only between the nature and character of the artist and his work, but also between the executive and the mental elements of it, the leading pictorial qualities of the great oil-painters are involved in the history which professes, as its dominant idea, to record their technical processes. This is especially true of the volume before us, which turns much less than did the first volume on the rudimentary efforts and old traditionary methods of the early oil-painters. As the colour system of each leading artist in his turn is described, we have with it a description of his style and place in the world of art—the force and purity of the Van Eycks; and of Bellini and his contemporaries; the glowing tenderness of Perugino; the intensity and more than microscopic refinement of Leonardo da Vinci; the calm range and equable senatorial splendour of Titian; the mysterious imagination of Rembrandt; the correggiescity of Correggio. Thus what at first sight seems a rather limited subject turns out, when duly handled, to be one of the highest interest to all who have any real care for art. And it does not appear an exaggerated statement if we say that Sir Charles has here given us a legacy hardly inferior in value to that which England owes to his untiring exertions in the National Collection.

There is something, it seems to us, eminently characteristic of Englishmen (and eminently characteristic, it may be added, of the distinguished author), in the scheme of the book, as here set forth. We often hear now, with an iteration which would almost be tedious were it not so graceful, so lively, and so discursive, of the Englishman's practical helplessness and theoretical incapacity when compared with the style in which people manage things in France or Germany. And certainly the scheme of this book does appear small in comparison with the vast pretensions of such a writer as M. Taine, in his recent essays on the Italian and Flemish schools. The one starts from oils and resins; the other, from the conformation of the country, the races who have inhabited it from primæval times, and the whole course of its subsequent history. Sir Charles aims at showing the little steps by which the employment of certain "vehicles" led the artists on to form their style; M. Taine professes to account for the genius and works of Hemling or Rubens by laws which compelled their appearance, and governed their hands by an irresistible fatality. And M. Taine's book leaves one with the impression of a clever writer who has never once had a glimpse of his subject, and in whose essay it is the least portion which bears reference either to what the painters aimed at or to the merit of their works—art, in his history, being truly minima pars sui; whilst in the other, beside the exhaustive treatment of the technicalities which the author undertakes to investigate, all that he has included, in his progress, upon the style and value of the artists has that peculiar authority which belongs to the careful judgments of a painter upon his own profession. The same contrast holds good in respect to the style of the two writers—Taine sparkling, cold, too clever for confidence, untouched by the soul of his subject, and hence never touching the reader's; Eastlake temperate, chaste, keeping always within the phrase rather than exceeding measure, yet rising with the occasion to a certain sedate and impressive eloquence when he describes those works of which no one but the artist himself can adequately feel the amazing and unapproachable excellences.

The volume opens with a name which, even after the lapse of six centuries, no one who has loved and felt with the greatest of the Italian poets can write without a certain emotion. The chapel in S. Maria Nuova at Florence, founded by Folco Portinari, father to Dante's Beatrice, was the place which the taste of a descendant and namesake of Folco, some hundred and fifty years afterwards, converted into what one may call the first collection of oil-paintings seen in Italy. Sir Charles traces this innovation to the commercial connexions which the Portinari family had with North-western Europe. Besides importing Flemish pictures, they appear to have shown attention to Antonello of Messina, the painter who still preserves the traditional credit of introducing the new process into the South. Italy, probably for nearly two thousand years (if the Etruscan tomb-pictures date so far back), had been satisfied with methods in painting which generally employed water as the diluent of the colours. And the climate of the sub-Apennine districts was, in truth, just sufficiently free from dampness and liberal in light to render "fresco" and "tempera," in their many varieties, possible. Yet, even there, no one who now visits the country can fail to observe that an exceptionally favourable building and rarely found conditions of careful guardianship are essential to prolong the life of a fresco for any period which a serious artist might rationally desire. As we read that England is within, but only just within, the "wheat-growing circle," so we may say of Italy and her famous frescoes. One must descend to Sicily, or Greece, or Egypt to find a climate genuinely propitious to that delicate but delightful art. Only here and there a Giotto's chapel at Padua, a Monasterio Maggiore for Luini, perhaps a Vatican ceiling for Michael Angelo—makes one feel, by the contrast of its accidental preservation, how precarious was that method to which so much of genius and so much of history was entrusted. Hence (irrespectively of the peculiar technical merits possessed by oil-colour in depth and fusion of tint, truth united with force of tone, and facility in correction and finish), there is no cause for wonder that the Italians, although a race singularly conservative by instinct, rapidly adopted the novel and more durable method. Soon, says Vasari, "people crowded with enthusiasm to see this new and more real perfection, deeming that nothing could ever surpass it." And surpassed it certainly has not been; though the enthusiasm might have been abated had the ills that oil-painting, in its turn, is heir to—the cracked surface, the fugitive tint, the rich brown rustiness, dear to the connoisseur, the ravages of the sun and the cleaner—been foreseen by the eyes which looked on Francia and Perugino in the glory of their first freshness.

After noticing the beginnings of the art in Italy, Sir Charles recapitulates the practice of the Flemings, and then proceeds to notice its gradual development at the hands of Lorenzo di Credi, Leonardo da Vinci, Perugino, Francia, Raffaelle, the Frate, Andrea del Sarto, and other Florentines. He then treats on Correggio, in a very full and interesting chapter, concluding the treatise with a general sketch of those famous "Venetian methods" which have been the delight and wonder of all subsequent oil-painters, and the ignis fatuus to many. We may conjecture that, had life been spared, the author would have also examined the chief Venetian painters; nor is there any subject on which his patient observation and exquisite taste would have been more profitably or pleasantly employed. It is to be hoped that some of the notes on pictures observed during Eastlake's journeys may supply this hiatus, should the affectionate care which has given us this volume judge it proper to publish them. A short series of essays, mostly directed to technical details, closes the volume. They contain the fruits of a singularly precise and varied experience, and would, we should think, if illustrated by practical experiments, form an admirable basis for a course of lectures to the students of the Academy. Such lessons of practice are particularly desirable in England, whose artists are in no danger of suffering by an excess of that formal routine teaching which has elsewhere brought schools of art to a dead level of academic monotony.

With one extract, which we choose because it involves few technical details, we close our notice of the most important essay on art which the English press has given us for many years:—

> In the application of fresco-painting to architecture, the practice of Correggio differed widely from that of preceding masters: his innovations in this department may be exemplified by comparing his cupolas with the ceiling of the Sistine chapel, by Michael Angelo. That great painter, though a master of foreshortening, has not, in the instance referred to, supposed his figures to be above the eye, but opposite to it, so that they are still intelligible when seen in any other situation, as, for example, in an engraving; Correggio, on the other hand, in his cupolas, always aimed at producing the perspective appearance of figures above the eye; and the violent foreshortening which is the consequence renders his figures unsatisfactory except in their original situation, and when seen from below, where their effect must at first have been marvellous. But, after all, if the object of art be to meet the impressions of nature by corresponding representation, it is evident that foreshortening on ceilings or cupolas, as it necessarily presents the human figure and all objects in a mode absolutely foreign to our experience, must, more or less, depart from the plain end of imitation, and can only excite wonder at the artist's skill. It remains to observe that the foreshortenings which Correggio has introduced in his cupolas are, in most cases, incompatible with all but a general expression in the features, as the heads are almost always represented as if seen from below. All nobler objects were thus overlooked in the pursuit of a favourite excellence, and Correggio ever sought the attributes of perspective opposed to qualities of the mere surface; . . . to pierce in appearance the surface of a cupola with ascending figures, notwithstanding the amazing difficulty of the undertaking, was an enterprise quite to his taste.

ROBIN GRAY.*

IF the whole of this novel had been equal to the first volume we should have had to record a real and very striking success. Though based on the decidedly dangerous experiment of amplifying a ballad so well known, so perfect in itself, and so pathetic as "Auld Robin Gray," it is very satisfactorily done so far; and if we object to this elaboration of a poem the very simplicity of which stirs our imagination more than any amount of detail can satisfy, it is because we think the broad suggestiveness of poetry a higher kind of art than the minute particularization which passes by the name of novel-writing. Also because we think that all these second presentations of a well-known story, these after-growths from an old-established stem, are mistakes in themselves, and more likely than not to be weak and unsatisfactory. We cannot, however, say this of the first volume of Robin Gray, almost the whole of which has been worked with great delicacy and skill, and which is as good for the kind of thing as can be.

We need not repeat the story so far. The leading lines are precisely those of "Auld Robin Gray"—two young lovers, with not sufficient means to marry on, Jeamie's sea voyage to make the crown a pound, reports of his death, the father's broken arm, the mother's illness, the cow that was stolen away, and Auld Robin Gray who comes a' courting in the day of want, and who is finally accepted under the pressure of poverty and the parents' need. Then Jeamie turns up again, and sees Jeanie at her own home, and with the kiss immortalized by the ballad they tear themselves away. After this the likeness between the poem and the story is at an end. And with the likeness we come also to an end of the verisimilitude and naturalness of the tale.

The villain of the book, and the worker of all the mischief to every one, is Nicol McWhapple, the Laird of Clashgirn, an elder of the kirk, a hypocrite, forger, murderer, smuggler, and everything else that is bad. He is a placid, cunning little man, with a small shrunken body and a lame leg; his keen face runs from the high cheek bones to a sharp point at the clean-shaven chin; he has a sallow complexion, a pawky smile, a habit of drooping his eyelids "over his small, pale, ferroty eyes, and occasionally giving his head a jerk forward like a hawk dabbing at its prey." This pleasant person has, it seems, in times past taken in and supported Jeamie Falcon and his mother, when they came wandering to Portlappock in distress. He tended the mother in her illness and buried her decently when she died, and afterwards brought up Jeamie as a kind of feeless servant—half son, half servant—out of whom good work was got and little given in return. When the lad wants the farm of Askaig, and two years' grace for stock, that he may marry Jeanie Lindsay, the old lean laird refuses him; so Jeamie thinks he has nothing for it but to go to sea, Portlappock being a fishing place where every man is a sailor. He therefore engages himself in one of Clashgirn's boats, which is heavily insured, and commanded by Ivan Carrack, a Highland skipper with a more than mortal stolidity of face and character, and an inexhaustible capacity for whisky. Before starting, however, Girzie Todd, the old fishwife, warns him against joining Carrack and "the Colin." But as she will give him no reason why she says "The Colin's doomed," Jeamie only answers, "Toots Girzie!" and takes his own way. When fairly at sea he finds that something is amiss, though he cannot say what. The men look at him coldly; the skipper drinks, swears, and stares with his calf eyes incessantly, and lays some mysterious crooked spell on Jeamie, who, do what he will, can never right himself. Once the ship is set on fire, and Jeamie is "blamed," though innocent; but there is no chance of his position bettering, for McWhapple and Carrack have agreed between them to lose the brig, and Jeamie with her, and the old fable of the wolf and the lamb has to be carried out. But such crimes as murder and arson on the high seas have to be committed cautiously, so that it is a little time before Carrack can succeed in firing the ship, which at last he does, unseen by any of the crew and suspected only by Jeamie and one other. When the boats are lowered and the men safely seated in them, Jeamie is sent below for the log; at the same moment the mainmast topples over, there is a terrible explosion, and the blazing wreck sinks hissing into the water. Of course the lad is assumed to be burnt or drowned, and the boat pulls into shore. When news comes to Portlappock of his loss, the Lindsay distress culminates, and Jeanie marries Robin Gray. But the Robin Gray of the book and the Auld Robin Gray of the poem are not the same men. He of the book is a man of green middle-age but looking younger, a fine, hearty, healthy, Scottish farmer in the prime of life, and one of whom any woman might be fond. He had seen Jeanie grow up from a wee bit wean to a braw and sonsie lass; and he had loved her once and for all, before he was aware of her attachment to Jeamie. When he asks her to marry him she tells him that her heart is in the grave with her dead lover; but she finally consents, since he is willing to take her on her own terms, thankful to get her on any. After the marriage then, when Jeanie has learnt to love her husband dearly and to be calm and happy, come Jeamie's return, the meeting, and the kiss; and then Mr. Gibbon's coda.

Jeanie says nothing to her husband of the dead lover's reappearance, but he hears of it from McWhapple, with sly hints, cautions, and inuendoes intermixed. He is annoyed that Jeanie does not confide in him; but she keeps silence to avoid giving him pain, jealous as he is, until such time as she shall know that Jeamie has left Portlappock. Jeamie does not leave. Wishing to revenge himself on Ivan Carrack for the misery he has wrought him, and knowing that he fired the brig, he stays in the place, at a desolate out-of-the-way shieling beyond the Brownie's Bite and up by Askaig, where Girzie's daft son Wattie, and Lang Rob Keith and his wife, keep him company. Carnieford, or Robin Gray, straightforward and generous if jealous, goes over to Askaig to see Jeamie and make all right with him; but he does not find him; and on that same day a strange man comes in the Clashgirn gig for Jeanie, with a message to haste away to Askaig with clothes, &c., for her gudeman is lying there badly hurt, and she is wanted to tend him. It is a wild day, and the "Brownie's Bite" is a growsome torrent; but she gets across the swollen waters safely, if after peril—to find no gudeman at all, but just Jeamie Falcon. By this time she has found out that she loves her husband better than her old lover, and they have a scene wherein she bitterly reproaches him for his treachery—of which he has not been guilty. Carnieford on reaching home hears the news of his wife's sudden disappearance, and tears back to Askaig like a madman, coming upon Jeanie and Jeamie sitting in the kitchen, the one looking dour and the other disconsolate. Then ensues a tremendous hubbub. The farmer refuses to hear reason, or to believe in the innocence of wife or man. He and Jeamie have a quarrel and a fight; and for one reason or another they all—husband, lover, Lang Rob, Wattie the idiot, and Jeanie—rush out of the house, and into the tremendous storm of the night, and all wander right away to the foaming spate of the Brownie's Bite. Here Jeanie hears the sound of trampling and struggling—by a sudden flash of lightning sees two men fighting on the very edge of the abyss; and then a shriek tells her that one has been hurled into the water. An instant after a man stumbles against her; it is her husband who grips her arm, asks what is amiss, and, when he sees who it is, lets her fall to the earth, and disappears. Some days after this a body is found jammed among the rocks of the fall. The head and face are so battered that they are not recognisable, but the clothes, which are Jeamie Falcon's, leave no doubt as to its identity. He and Wattie Todd the idiot are both missing; but before the corpse is found Girzie has set off on a search for her son, sure that he is away with Jeamie somewhere. When the body is recognised as Jeamie's by the clothes, Robin Gray of Carnieford is arrested as the murderer.

Jeanie, sure of his innocence for all that appearances are so fatally against him, now bends all her wits to his defence; and among other things—after having made and signed a deposition eminently damaging to him—she goes off to Clashgirn to watch the old laird, whom, together with Carrack, she suspects of foul play somehow. She sees him leave the house at dead of night, and follows him to the beach, where he signals a brig lying-to in shore. A boat comes off, and Ivan Carrack comes in her. He and McWhapple have a talk which reveals much to Jeanie, who is listening in a hollow hard by. But an incautious movement betrays her, and Carrack seizes her after a hard chase. He binds her hand and foot, gags her mouth, and takes her with him on board the brig, where he makes love to her in his uncouth Highland fashion. The brig has only two sailors in her—one a certain ill-looking Donald; and the other, Grainger, a queer, hirsute, surly fellow, who speaks but little, keeps himself in the shade, and has a habit of concealing his face as much as he can. But to this man Jeanie appeals for protection; and though his odd ways leave her in doubt as to whether he will aid her or not, he nevertheless inspires her with confidence. She is so sure that her husband did not murder Jeamie Falcon, and so sure too that Clashgirn and Carrack have had a hand in the deed, that she would give her life to get back to Portlappock, if only she could right Robin while there is yet time. After a brief season of suspense, during which she is locked up in the cabin knowing nothing of what is going on above, she finds herself at Portlappock, with Grainger in charge of the brig, and Donald and Ivan Carrack prisoners in the hold.

And now everything comes to light. Grainger is Jeamie Falcon disguised, and the rightful possessor of Clashgirn, which McWhapple, as his father's trustee, agent, and friend, had filched from him, the proofs of his rightful possessorship lying with Girzie Todd; the poor daft idiot Wattie is the murdered man, and murdered by Ivan Carrack, with Clashgirn's connivance; Ivan is Girzie's brother, and McWhapple is the father of the boy, so that father and uncle together have compassed the death of the son of the one and nephew of the other. The laird and the skipper are arrested, and the laird dies in his cell, but the skipper is hanged, wanting more drink; Jeamie travels, and finally marries a young lady of his own station, and one better fitted for the Laird of Clashgirn than poor Jeanie would have been, which is doubtful; and after a long time of severance and probation, Robin and Jeanie come together again, the birth of a young Carnieford helping in that desirable result.

This, then, is the outline of the story, and it is a curious patchwork of idyllic tenderness and wild sensationalism. Nothing can be quieter than the first volume, nothing more upheaped and strained than the last two. It is as if they had been worked by different hands, and they produce the same effect as a badly matched piece of cloth. Two things strike us as scarcely natural in the treatment—one is, that Girzie Todd should have kept so religiously the secret of her son's parentage for all those years, seeing that a slip of this kind does not tell much in Scotland against any man, especially if unmarried, and seeing also that it is scarcely possible to hide such a thing in a country place; and the other is, that Jeanie's sudden attachment to her husband alternates rather inharmoniously with her passionate love for Jeamie, only so lately shown. She would scarcely have upbraided the lover for the sake of the husband so bitterly as she did, if she loved him as she is assumed to have done. One or the other is painted in too strong colours, and the alternation is both too sudden and too extreme. The character of Girzie Todd is admirable in the beginning, though afterwards she too goes off into turgidity and extravagance; but McWhapple and Ivan Carrack are melodramatic monsters without much life-likeness, considering their circumstances. It is a pity that so delightful an opening should have so unsatisfactory a continuance and ending; but it only shows how much more difficult it is for Mr. Gibbon to construct a good plot than to work pleasantly and well on one already made to his hand.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. LITTRÉ'S Dictionary * is still going on, and the twenty-first livraison justifies in every respect the success which the previous ones have obtained. Ménage, Furetière, the Dictionnaire de Trévoux, Napoléon Landais, Bescherelle, nay, the Académie itself, must yield to the new lexicographer who, single-handed, has given us in such gigantic proportions the history of the French language. We might easily fill pages with remarks of every kind suggested by this excellent work. Amongst the archaisms duly registered by the author, for instance, the word perdurable occurs, and M. Littré observes that it is a pity such an epithet should have become obsolete. Again, we say inexorable, inextricable, implacable; why should we not employ the corresponding affirmatives exorable, extricable, placable? Fashion has admitted the former and rejected the latter, and fashion in this as well in as many other instances has proved a very absurd guide. M. Littré's etymologies, derived from an accurate knowledge of the laws of comparative philology, would have seemed exceedingly tame to Ménage, who used, as our readers know, to coin Latin words whenever he failed to find some ready made. But we have learnt, in these degenerate times, to be more cautious than our forefathers were, and we think it safer to confess our ignorance than to venture upon fantastic and hypothetical derivations. With reference to the verb plaire, M. Littré remarks that the original form of the infinitive was plaisir, from placēre, whereas the form which is now exclusively admitted can only be accounted for on the supposition that the writers who introduced it accented placĕre with the penultimate short. The slang or argot of which M. Lorédan Larchey has given such amusing specimens in his Excentricités de la Langue française, is also admitted to the honour of a notice in M. Littré's Dictionary; thus, under the article pompier, literally a fireman, we are told that this epithet is familiarly applied to drunkards.

The new editions of the Greek and Latin classics commenced by Messrs. Hachette appear to have been very well received. One of the best Virgilian scholars of Germany has given to M. Benoist's Bucolics and Georgics an amount of praise which is highly flattering if we consider from what quarter it comes; M. Weil's Æschylus and Euripides are likewise productions of great merit, and now we have to notice an edition of Cornelius Nepos † prepared by M. Monginot, one of the lecturers at the Lycée Bonaparte. In his introduction to the volume, he has had of course to discuss the question of authenticity which still divides the opinions of German critics. Rinck flatly maintains that the biographies generally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos are a mere forgery; Nisson regards them as the production of an abbreviator. M. Monginot refutes both these opinions with considerable skill, and bestows much praise upon the Latin author's style, contrary to the view adopted by Rinck, who allows prejudice to warp his judgment in the most absurd manner. The question of literary excellence is an important one, no doubt; but that of accuracy is still more so in the case of an historian. M. Monginot admits that Cornelius Nepos was often satisfied with information taken from doubtful sources, and further, that he did not generally turn his materials to the best account. He is often guilty of exaggeration, and the praise he bestows upon his heroes becomes fastidious by its monotony. Still, notwithstanding all these faults, Cornelius Nepos deserves to be numbered amongst the best Latin authors of what we may call the second order—men of talent, not men of genius. M. Monginot's text is remarkably correct, and the notes, printed in double columns at the foot of every page, contain abundance of elucidatory matter. The volume gives us not only the complete biographies, but all the fragments which time has handed down.

The second and concluding part of M. Privat Deschanel's Traité élémentaire de Physique ‡ is now before the public, and students who wish to gain a general knowledge of natural philosophy without being obliged to pore over complicated mathematical calculations will find in it one of the best popular text-books we have ever seen on the subject. M. Jamin's lectures at the École Polytechnique are destined for the select few; M. Deschanel's audience will be of a more miscellaneous description. Several hundred woodcuts, and three chromo-lithographs, illustrate the apparatus described and the experiments for which that apparatus has been provided.

Under the title l'École d'Athènes § M. de Julleville has given us a very interesting monograph on a rather obscure point of literary history. The political glory of Greece became, no doubt, a thing of the past when the Romans subjugated the country which had been the head-quarters of freedom; but, as far as Athens was concerned, the rule exercised by the masters of the world proved almost beneficial. For three centuries an uninterrupted succession of political disturbances and calamities had arrested that literary activity which had done so much to ensure the glory of Greece; but when the Roman legions brought with them order and security, a kind of renaissance took place which, if less brilliant than the famous era of Pericles, at any rate lasted longer. From the period of the Roman conquest to that of the invasion of the Barbarians, Athens retained her proud position as the intellectual centre of the civilized world, the metropolis of literature, philosophy, eloquence, and poetry. It is true, as M. de Julleville remarks, that the sources of inspiration were dried up for ever; but if the revival of intellectual pursuits amongst the Athenians did not produce men of genius, it brought forth a whole array of commentators, rhetoricians, versifiers, and Sophists, whose works are not destitute of merit, although that merit may be of an inferior class. M. de Julleville begins by describing the state of society at Athens during the fourth century of the Christian era; he shows what were the schools of philosophy and of eloquence; he exhibits the amusing rivalries of lecturers and teachers; and then proceeds to give us an account of the principal Sophists who lectured on eloquence or philosophy—Julianus, Panætius, and Himerius. Do these men deserve, he asks, the contempt with which we look down upon them in our own day? We find fault with their utter want of thought; we sneer at the emptiness of their polished sentences; but we should remember that these last representatives of Hellenic culture were almost worshipped by their contemporaries, and the popularity they enjoyed must have been the result of certain qualities which we are unable to appreciate, placed as we are amidst entirely different conditions of life and of energy.

M. Labatut's Histoire de la Préture * is the first instalment of a work on the Roman magistracy. Much has been written on the laws of Rome, its constitution, its political and administrative history; but the topic selected by M. Labatut does not seem yet to have engaged the notice of the learned, especially that portion of it which refers to the Prætors, their functions and their importance. Rein, Becker-Marquardt, Gottling, and the other German scholars whose works touch upon the wide subject of Roman administration, did not make use of all the resources offered by the science of epigraphy; and M. Labatut believes, rightly we think, that the inscriptions which Mommsen, Borghesi, and Henzen have brought to light supply a number of facts not to be found in literary productions, strictly so called. He has, therefore, made epigraphy his chief study, and has reproduced all the inscriptions which could throw any evidence upon the question which he attempts to deal with. Law and history are two sciences closely connected together, and especially in the case of the Romans it is impossible to view them separately; therefore, although the book of M. Labatut is that of a lawyer, still the student of history will find it extremely valuable, and may use it with confidence as a lucid and full commentary on Livy, Tacitus, Suetonius, Dion Cassius, and the other historians of the Roman Commonwealth.

After having devoted two years to the review of Italian art, M. Taine now takes his pupils to the Netherlands †, and endeavours in the first instance to explain how peculiarities of race, instinct, and physiological qualities have determined the Dutch and Flemish schools of painting, stamping them with merits which are exclusively their own. The nations whose influence has principally told upon the progress of civilization may be arranged in two separate and well-defined groups; and whilst among those who belong to the great Latin family the Italians are undoubtedly the foremost, considered from the artistic point of view, the Dutch and the Flemings occupy the same position in the Germanic race. According to his favourite method, M. Taine accounts for the peculiar features of the schools of art he now describes by facts which are sometimes trivial, and sometimes susceptible of an interpretation quite different from the one he suggests; but his remarks are always interesting. Truth, he says, is the chief aim of the Dutch and Flemish painters; they have constantly tried to represent things as they saw them, without any arrière-pensée; and that is why they are, in his opinion, superior both to the Germans, for whom painting is only the picturesque embodiment of religious or metaphysical ideas, and to the English, whose constant endeavour is to portray characters and feelings.

M. Taine's new volume belongs to M. Germer-Baillière's Bibliothèque de Philosophie contemporaine. In the same series we have also to mention another work ‡ on the well-known and oft-discussed question of independent or extra-religious morality. M. C. Coignet finds fault with the nineteenth century, because, in the matter of political government, it aims at bringing about a compromise between mediæval ideas and the principles established by the French Revolution. We are endeavouring, he says, to put new wine into old bottles, to recast antiquated doctrines instead of dismissing them altogether; in short, we are just now the victims of expediency. Hence the uncertainty, the apprehensions, the scepticism which prevail around us, and which cramp the energies of the social system. Must we then, by throwing away the traditions of the pre-revolutionary epoch, rush into the other extreme of founding the new order of things upon the teaching of materialists? No, says M. Coignet; from the point of view of independent morality, right is neither a conception of universal reason, nor an external law of nature; it is the human fact par excellence, it is the affirmation that man is a free agent. We shall not attempt to refute this proposition, but we may simply ask M. Coignet how he can isolate man from the circumstances amidst which he is placed, and where he finds the sanction and the motive of the principles which govern both individuals and society?

It is amusing to see how certain writers understand the art of criticism. M. Caro, one of the most eminent metaphysicians of the present day, publishes a work entitled Le Matérialisme et la Science, which we had occasion to notice some months since. Being one of the lecturers of the Sorbonne, and therefore occupying an important position in the French University, he receives and accepts an invitation to one of the Emperor's parties at Compiègne; thereupon M. A. Ranc remarks, most logically and good-naturedly, that it is no matter of surprise if we find M. Caro composing weak refutations of materialism, since such works are rewarded by Imperial patronage. Literary criticism of this sort is so utterly contemptible that it would be quite below notice if, unfortunately, it was not a common offence amongst our neighbours. Party spirit runs so high in France that the most upright and disinterested author cannot escape calumny as soon as he has by any untoward circumstance attracted the favourable notice of the powers that be. What would M. Ranc say if we were to accuse him of defending materialism from interested motives, because his patrons pay him for his feuilletons and occasionally invite him to dinner? This singular piece of criticism forms part of a compilation which professes to give the history of the political, literary, and artistic events of the past year.*

M. Maxime Ducamp publishes the first volume of a work which promises to be both amusing and instructive; it is a history of Paris as Paris now is. Instead of taking us back to the days of Lutetia, to the Emperor Julian, and to the Misopogon, M. Ducamp confines his remarks to the present state of things, and attempts to do for us what Mercier did so admirably for the Parisians of the year 1732. Who has not read that curious tableau de Paris, where all the attractions, the dangers, the beauties, and the imperfections of the mud metropolis, as it then existed, are duly registered and described? M. Maxime Ducamp's work is of the same kind, with this notable advantage, however, that most of the objectionable things referred to by Mercier have now disappeared.† The streets are paved, the police is much better managed than even under the rule of D'Argenson, gas has everywhere taken the place of those famous lanternes which formed such convenient auxiliaries to the guillotine, and M. Haussmann, in thorough contempt of archæology and the picturesque, has swept away entire quarters which had nothing to recommend them but old historical associations. Truly the Parisians are taken care of with a zeal, a tenderness, an assiduity which far exceeds what they deserve; for, as M. Ducamp remarks, they are like the children of Israel in the wilderness—they expect manna to fall from heaven on their especial behoof, and heaven, being interpreted, means the Government. If the bread is bad, the wine adulterated, the dogs unmuzzled, the cab-drivers rude, and the omnibuses dirty, it is all your fault, M. Haussmann. M. Maxime Ducamp says in his preface that he will carefully abstain from politics; we must, therefore, consider the gentle banter with which he garnishes the result of his researches as a hors-d'œuvre which must not be too critically examined. The post-office, the telegraphs, the public conveyances, the railways, and the Seine, with its various adjuncts, form the subject of this excellent volume.

The new edition of the amusing letters on Italy written by President de Brosses about the middle of the last century deserves mention ‡ here, although M. Colomb has added nothing to the recueil which he published some years ago, and which we reviewed as soon as it was issued. But it is well to remind our readers of publications which might otherwise escape their attention, especially when they come from abroad, and are not advertised in due course by the English newspapers. We can only repeat here what we formerly said—namely, that President de Brosses studied Italy precisely as an accomplished Frenchman of the eighteenth century would have done; that is to say, with a correct perception of artistic beauty, and with a due sense of the treasures of every kind which the archæologist and the historian meet so thickly assembled around them; but in other respects he was a thorough satirist, and his views of Italian society, Italian manners, and Italian prejudices are marked by a tone of sarcasm and levity sometimes carried to excess.

Beaumarchais may be named amongst the contemporaries of De Brosses who represented most completely the tendencies of the eighteenth century on the other side of the Channel. He forms the subject of a small brochure published under a somewhat ambitious title§, and which does not "reveal", whatever the author may say, anything further than the details which M. d'Arneth gave us in a pamphlet published last year at Vienna. Beaumarchais had been sent in 1774 to Germany, by the French Government, for the purpose of obtaining the suppression of a pamphlet most insulting to the Queen Marie-Antoinette, which had been clandestinely printed abroad. No sooner, however, had he reached Vienna, than the author of the Mariage de Figaro was arrested by M. de Kaunitz as being the veritable Simon Pure, and thrown into prison, where he remained for a month. M. d'Arneth believes that the Austrian Minister's suspicions were well-founded, but this can hardly be the case, since Kaunitz, after having written to Sartines, the French lieutenant de police, felt himself compelled to apologize to Beaumarchais, and to give him an indemnification of 1,000 ducats for the annoyance and the disgrace which he had inflicted upon him.

M. Dupanloup devotes a very sensible and interesting volume * to an inquiry into the studies which are most suitable for women. He shows that in French fashionable life even the taste for reading is considered slow amongst ladies, and that those who wish to do something better than discourse for ever about millinery, horse-racing, and balls must be contented with taking up a book on the sly, for fear of seeming pedantic and pretentious. Not only is the intellectual part of a woman's training examined in this volume, but also the general routine of her life, and the sum of those duties which she is to perform if she would rightly understand her true vocation.

Madame Gervaisais is a novel † which might pass for the work of the author of Le Maudit. We have called it a novel, but the story is a very subordinate matter compared with the wonderful psychological analysis displayed in the delineations of the heroine's character. Madame Gervaisais arrives one fine morning in Rome—a free-thinker, it is true, but otherwise extremely accomplished; her child, of whom she is passionately fond, is with her. By degrees she falls under the influence of the priests. The confessional absorbs all her time, the Church gets possession of her fortune, she forgets even her child, and finally dies at the very moment when her brother rushes forth to rescue her. Messrs. de Goncourt have thus produced a clever book, but the idea they have attempted to work out strikes us as thoroughly unnatural. However active may be the imagination of any woman, however easily she may be led astray by her feelings, it is absurd to suppose that the ceremonies of Saint Peter and the pomps of the Vatican alone are sufficient to throw her into the extravagances of asceticism. Such conversions are beyond the range of probability, especially when they make a woman discard the common feelings of a mother. Messrs. de Goncourt might perhaps quote the example of Madame Pernelle in Molière's Tartuffe; but both she and Orgon her son merely talk about their deadness to natural feelings, and when the time comes for testing his sincerity, Orgon gives way. Madame Gervaisais has at any rate a decided advantage over the other novels of Messrs. de Goncourt, it is not repulsive, it interests as a psychological study, and would be readable were it not for that affected and maniéré style which spoils all the productions of the par nobile fratrum.

It is a long time since we have met with one of M. Alphonse Karr's publications; that is to say, it is a long time since we have been treated to a few pages of real humour, shrewd common sense, and quiet but telling satire. Why his new book should be called the Dragon's Teeth ‡ we know not, but the amusing author of Fa Dièze has accustomed us to out-of-the-way titles. On the present occasion he discourses of things in general, and from his flower-garden at Nice he takes a survey of the whole civilized world. The Dents du Dragon are not a tale, but a series of observations and maxims interspersed with anecdotes and autobiographical details. M. Alphonse Karr describes in a certain passage the council of fairies assembled at his birth, explaining how an old creature who had not been invited on the occasion revenged herself by bestowing upon the child the gift of common sense which would eventually bring him into all kinds of scrapes. We do not know whether our author has ever had any reason to repent of the fatal boon, but he is scarcely just to himself when he says that in literature he has always failed of success. He will certainly be appreciated by all those whose opinion is worthy of being valued—those, we mean, who do not think that speech has been given to man for the purpose of concealing his thoughts. As for amateur gardeners and persons fond of flowers, they have long since professed for M. Alphonse Karr the most frantic admiration.

THE BUDGET.

IT has been the rare fortune of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER to gratify the House of Commons and the country with a pleasant surprise. When all men looked that he should curse them with a tax or a loan, he has blessed them altogether. The revenue returns of the financial year presented a gloomy and fuliginous appearance, and it was generally apprehended that the reduction of the Estimates would not alone produce an equilibrium. Mr. LOWE has maintained, in the midst of lugubrious anticipations, unbroken silence, congratulating himself perhaps on an opportunity of exemplifying the artistic precept, Non fumum ex fulgore, sed ex fumo dare lucem.

There is no need of a loan; the Income-tax is not increased, but reduced by a penny in the pound; and Mr. GLADSTONE has promised the repeal of that corn-duty which has loomed as a gigantic evil in his imagination from the time when he resigned without ever having thought of abolishing it during his seven years' tenure of office. The taxes on certain kinds of locomotion are reduced to a point at which it will evidently not be worth while to keep them in existence. Some of the assessed taxes are rendered less oppressive; and, above all, ambitious householders will have the opportunity of powdering the heads of their footmen without the painful sense of contributing to the wants of the Exchequer. When PITT first imposed the tax, his opponents, headed by Fox and the Duke of BEDFORD, attempted to cripple his efforts against France by setting the fashion of dispensing with powder; but the custom seemed to be so thoroughly established that the law allowed the father of six unmarried daughters to compound at a reduced rate for the decoration of his family. It is uncertain whether Mr. LOWE's concession will produce the effect of reviving the use of powder. The sacrifice of revenue is for the present less than a thousand pounds, and if the tax has operated as an impediment to fashionable caprice, it has been so far inconvenient and unprofitable.

Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN, who only two days ago exulted in the chronic employment of denouncing the law on fire insurance, is to be pitied for the loss of his favourite grievance. With a reserve the converse of tragic irony, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER refused to discuss isolated projects for the repeal of taxation on the eve of the Budget. He could at his pleasure have answered the appeal to his liberality by explaining that Mr. SHERIDAN, like a New Zealand commander, was cannonading a fort which had been already evacuated. There is no longer room for eloquent expositions of the iniquity of imposing a tax on prudence and forethought. The Insurance Companies will profit largely by the repeal of the duty, which can scarcely fail to increase their business. Twenty years ago a proposal to repeal the shilling duty on corn would have diffused indignation and alarm through every rural district. Sir ROBERT PEEL, according to his custom, made the most of the imaginary securities by which he vainly hoped to reconcile farmers and landowners to the repeal of the Corn Laws. The shilling duty seemed to recognise the abandoned principle of Protection; and it was defended on more plausible grounds as a harmless source of revenue. The small amount of the impost renders it doubtful whether the price of home-grown corn has really been increased by the trifling tax on imported produce; and Mr. LOWE himself fails to trace the incidence of the duty; but the abolition of the only remaining protective duty is conformable to sound principles. Mr. GLADSTONE's attacks on the duty, when Lord DERBY and Mr. DISRAELI were in office, were chiefly founded on an assumption, unnoticed by Mr. LOWE, that the tax on corn interfered with the transit trade. It happened that corn was not included in the terms of the Acts for bonding merchandize; and, consequently, although imported grain might be purchased on board ship for export free of duty, it became liable to the tax as soon as it was stored in a warehouse. The reasons for excluding corn from the privilege of bonding were not conclusive; but, as the revenue can afford the sacrifice, the Government is probably well advised in abolishing the tax altogether. When Mr. BRIGHT next encourages American Protectionists by the assurance that free trade is but imperfectly adopted in England, he will be puzzled to find a single duty which has a collateral tendency to benefit any class of producers. The other taxes which are to be repealed have been judiciously selected, and it would have been right to abolish instead of diminishing the most mischievous duties on locomotion, even if it had been necessary to retain for another year the taxes on fire insurance and hair-powder. The seizure of the first occasion for diminishing the Income-tax proves that Mr. LOWE's financial and political doctrines are sound. There can be little doubt that in another year the per-centage will be reduced to fourpence in the pound; and it will not be desirable to attempt any further diminution. It is perfectly just that incomes should be subjected to direct taxation, but experience proves that as the rate increases the returns are less and less trustworthy. Schedule D becomes comparatively honest when the temptation to fraud is measured by fourpence in the pound; and it may reasonably be expected that in the absence of war or of extraordinary disaster a fourpenny rate may become permanent during a considerable number of years. The indolent facility with which Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. HUNT resorted to the Income-tax for the means of meeting the cost of the Abyssinian war tended to facilitate a revolutionary extension of direct taxation. It is perhaps not without a sense of future danger that Mr. LOWE hastens to reverse the mischievous policy of his predecessors. He may fairly hope in his next Budget to propose reductions of indirect taxation which will reconcile all but fiscal fanatics to a simultaneous re-establishment of the rate of fourpence in the pound.

The large surplus was entirely unexpected, although the curtailment of the Estimates by nearly three millions provided a considerable margin. Mr. LOWE's calculations of the revenue for the ensuing year are not unduly sanguine, for trade has since the winter been slowly and steadily reviving. As the charge of four millions and a half for the Abyssinian war exactly swallowed up the surplus, it would have been impossible to effect a reduction of taxes if Mr. LOWE's benevolent disposition had not been combined with much administrative ingenuity. By a series of alterations in the time and mode of collecting the taxes he hopes permanently to diminish the cost of raising the revenue, as well as to increase the receipts; and by accelerating the payment for the present year he provides the surplus which he afterwards liberally and judiciously distributes. Financiers instinctively disguise their operations when they mix up capital and revenue; and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER did not expressly state that in anticipating future income he was virtually raising a loan, though he resorts, not to the money-market, but to the taxpayer. There will be little disposition to criticize in an adverse spirit a contrivance which has produced great and unexpected relief; or, if any financial purist complains that the Abyssinian charge is not properly covered by the income of the year, he may be consoled by remembering that in 1866 and 1867 Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI adopted the converse process of applying revenue to capital purposes, by converting a portion of the perpetual debt into terminable annuities. It has been often shown that a great hardship was imposed on payers of Income-tax by the mode in which the late Government provided the money first required for the Abyssinian war.

Mr. LOWE evidently shares the opinion that exceptional outlay ought to be distributed over a series of years; and, if he is right in believing that his new mode of collection will be advantageous in itself, he is perfectly justified in profiting by the accompanying windfall; or, to use more accurate language, in picking up the fruit which he has himself shaken from the tree. There can be no difference of opinion on the expediency of substituting official tax-gatherers for parochial amateurs; and although excisemen will exercise additional vigilance, moderately honest taxpayers will welcome change which removes their establishments and their private affairs from the curious supervision of neighbours. In his estimates of revenue, Mr. LOWE has been prudently modest; but there can be no doubt that in the absence of disturbing causes his expectations will be considerably exceeded even if rich men should once more disappoint him by obstinately refusing to die. With the exception of the cotton trade, the principal branches of industry are in a tolerably healthy state; and the rise in the rate of interest shows that commercial enterprise is reviving. Mr. LOWE has commenced his career with prosperous auspices, although at the commencement of his speech he wisely propitiated the jealous Powers by dilating upon the unhappiness of his circumstances.

MR. MILL ON ENDOWMENTS.

MR. MILL shines much more out of Parliament than in, and it is very satisfactory to those who admire his great ability and originality to meet him again in the calm field of philosophical discussion. He has contributed an essay on Endowments to the current number of the Fortnightly Review, which is marked with all the good sense, width of view, and temperate advocacy of proposals out of the beaten path, which used to charm and instruct his countrymen before the favours of the electors of Westminster tempted him into freaks of irritability and violence. The whole subject of endowments is one of the deepest interest to a generation which has decided to assume a control over vast masses of property devoted by persons, long since dead, to special uses, but which is only very gradually working out something like definiteness and distinctness in the conception and application of the principles that ought, for the future, to regulate the enjoyment of the property of which it has arrogated to itself the virtual ownership. What the general policy is which the State ought to adopt towards religious endowments, is a question full of problems the intricacy and seriousness of which we are just beginning to appreciate, but which at present England is not called on to settle. The immediate concern of the State is with educational endowments; and in this sphere it may be said that the English public has arrived at some preliminary resolutions, which in the next few years will probably be carried out with more or less completeness. These principles of action seem to us to be the four following:—The State has resolved that it will apply the endowments of which it has taken possession, that it will use its controlling power, and that so far as it contributes fresh funds, it will contribute them, in the first place, to provide education of different kinds on such a scale that every class may get what it really wants; in the next place, so that the education they gain shall be of the very best kind in each department; thirdly, so that this education shall be as varied as possible; and lastly, so that those in every rank of life who have a real natural aptitude for the highest education shall receive it. The first of these aims will be realized when a system of national elementary education shall be established, when Mr. FORSTER'S Endowed Schools Bill has provided the means of setting up efficient district schools for secondary education, and when the two great Universities are made national institutions. Much has already been done to make the higher education varied, and too much has perhaps been done in the way of constituting ill-devised and nearly useless Professorships. The elementary education will get better and better when a national system is instituted, and it has greatly and rapidly improved in recent years; and the class of teachers in the secondary district schools will be so much better than the present masters of obscure grammar-schools that the elevation of English secondary education must [...]rily follow on the passing of Mr. FORSTER'S Bill. Great [...]s have been made to raise the higher education also to [...]hing like its proper level, and a very large amount of money is now applicable every year to aid young men, who are supposed to be deserving, in acquiring this higher education on cheap terms, and to reward those who show proficiency in it. But, although these sums are not entirely wasted, they are often ill applied, and are employed without any general notion having been formed of the objects to be arrived at; and scarcely a beginning has been made towards providing that the education given at the Universities shall be what it ought to be. Our present difficulties with regard to educational endowments relate to University endowments almost exclusively. Elsewhere, although we have not got what we want, we can see what it is that we do want. We want a thoroughly good and a universal system of elementary education, and that very promising boys shall be passed on and brought up gratis, or nearly so, at the secondary schools. We want a thoroughly good secondary education, and that really promising boys should be sent to the Universities and there be educated at scarcely any expense. All this is, theoretically, plain-sailing enough. But when we come to the Universities, and attempt to decide on the way in which the enormous funds they possess shall be applied so as to secure the greatest amount of education of the highest kind, and in what shape and to what extent they shall aid and reward persons desirous of this education and capable of profiting by it, we are met with very great puzzles, which the reforms hitherto carried out at the Universities either do not solve at all, or solve in a very unsatisfactory way.

The great failure in these reforms, the radical blunder that has been committed, is that no attempt has been made to make education a profession. It is only a temporary occupation which does well enough for a few years, and which offers to a clever young man a pleasant, sociable, rather luxurious, and apparently useful life, until he can decide how he shall settle himself in the world. Or else it seduces able young men into accepting permanent situations, which tempt them in moments of despondency with a small certainty, and doom them to a long life of obscurity, disappointment, and uselessness. The key to a solid and thorough reform would probably be found by omitting at the outset to think what funds this or that college could or would apply to payments for education, and by considering simply what is wanted. The higher education must be in the hands of men of two classes—the men who teach, and the men who find their main occupation in study, in experiments, in carrying on the general acquisition of European knowledge, in making England one of the primary centres of intellectual effort. The teacher may also be the student and philosopher; but the two things are separate, and a University wants men of both classes. It wants a great many good teachers, and it wants some philosophers. If it wants these philosophers, it ought to pay for them. There ought to be a career of education and philosophy on which men can enter as they would on any other career. No one on beginning a profession expects to get on all at once; but every one wants to be able to hope for something worth hoping for. A University has nothing to do with the private habits and lives of those whom it employs. It is not its business to enable them to marry, or to prevent them from marrying. All it has to do is to get the right article and to pay for it properly. Opinions will always vary as to figures, but in order to gain something like definiteness as to what is meant, we may say that a really competent man who gives himself up to the higher education at the University, should be able to see his way to a minimum income of twelve hundred a year. Nothing under that will enable the Universities to compete with the Public Schools and with the varied attractions and openings of London. There is not the slightest want of means to make the higher education a profession at the Universities, if only this were accepted as the application of the funds derived from endowments and from the payments of students, which is the one essential and primary thing to be attained. College livings, scholarships for students, fellowships for absentees, are all of utterly subsidiary importance, until the Universities have secured the highest possible education, by getting the best possible teachers, and the most learned and philosophical men they can find, in the main departments of knowledge and inquiry.

But, as Mr. MILL [...] out, the State has to deal, not only with the past, but w[...] the future, and it may lay down rules which shall affect [...]owments in coming years. Shall it permit endowments [...]all? Shall it require that all endowments shall from the outset be subject to its control? Shall it fix a period after which the fund shall cease to be held in accordance with the will of the donor? It is the principal object of Mr. MILL to caution his contemporaries against too indiscriminate a hostility to endowments, and too much State interference with them. He is all for encouraging the minority who from time to time have odd crotchets, and who want to see them fairly tried. Some enthusiastic admirer of organization [illegible]ly, it appears, proposed that no gift for public purposes [illegible] be given except through the medium of State officials, [illegible] would do what they thought best with it. Mr. MILL is [illegible]ly incensed by this audacious enemy of the liberty of the individual, and crushes him accordingly. Every one ought, he says, to be able to give or leave by will money for any endowments not absolutely contrary to law, and the State should entirely abstain from controlling the application of the money. But then the power of bequeathing for public purposes should be restrained within the same limits as those which confine the power of testators in favour of private persons. The law says that no man shall control the destination of his property, so far as regards private persons, beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. A testator shall, Mr. MILL suggests, have exactly the same, but no more, control over his property if he chooses to prefer public to private interests. He should be able to say what institution should profit, and on what conditions, by his money during a term which should fairly represent the limitation enforced in case of gifts to private persons. Perhaps fifty or sixty years might be taken as a not inadequate term. It is very seldom that in real life a testator manages to control the disposition of his property for so long as fifty years after his death; but still it might be possible for him to do so, and a term ought to be taken for endowments which should represent rather the extreme cases of testamentary control. When the time had expired, the endowment would lapse to the State; but whether the State ought to continue the existing application of the fund, if it saw no objection in this application, Mr. MILL forbears to discuss. If we think only of educational endowments, there seems no great difficulty; the State would have no means of judging whether particular religious endowments were or were not beneficial. If a Grammar School only educates one scholar in each year, it obviously fails; but if a Society for the Conversion of the Jews converts one Jew a year, does it succeed or fail? Religious endowments would therefore be in all probability allowed to lapse absolutely to the State; and if the State got into the habit of appropriating religious endowments, it would be apt to think it might as well take all the endowments it could get. All this is in the region of very distant speculation. There is no chance of any such limit being imposed on public gifts as Mr. MILL suggests, but such suggestions are by no means without practical value. They are quite worth discussing in connexion with present politics. How far it is desirable to let the State—that is, the permanent clerks of departments under the spasmodic control of chiefs interfering, not as having special knowledge or wisdom, but as representatives of a Parliamentary majority—fetter the action, be it wise or foolish, of individuals, is a very pressing question. As we get accustomed to political discussion, we feel more and more how difficult it is to deal properly with the various and complicated interests of English society, and how much study and knowledge ought to go to form a judgment. Naturally, therefore, we turn for guidance to those who have given long and special study to any subject; but these people with special knowledge all wish to see their own ideas carried out, and the easiest way, they think, of having this done is to get some department of Government charged with the execution of their projects. These well-informed, earnest men, are therefore always pressing us more and more within the region of State control; and it is very desirable that men with a general philosophical power, like Mr. MILL, should constantly remind us of what is to be said on the opposite side, and should even present their views in such odd and unexpected ways as by offering, as the true theory of endowments, that people should be able to gratify their whims and air their crotchets for fifty years after their death, and that then, when they have had their fair share of posthumous fun, their money should be absorbed in the Consolidated Fund.

LORD STANLEY ON POLITICS.

LORD STANLEY'S political speeches at Glasgow were much less valuable than his Address to the University. His manly recommendation of studies which train the intellect for exertion contrasted favourably with the passionate misology in which Mr. FROUDE concurs with Mr. LOWE. In his advocacy of severe preparation for a laborious life Lord STANLEY was not embarrassed by any conflict between conviction and practice, or by the sense that a paradoxical situation required an apology. The opinions which he afterwards expressed on foreign policy, though not less sincere, were far more questionable than his defence of learning. It is perhaps well that Englishmen should become accustomed to the great change in national policy which may be a necessary consequence of the vast extension of military establishments on the Continent. Every addition to the average size of armies renders voluntary enlistment more inefficient as compared with conscription; and the adoption of steam and of armour diminishes the maritime strength of the nation which relied for its naval supremacy on the numbers and quality of its seafaring population. As long as existing conditions regulate the relative force of different Powers, it will be expedient for England to withdraw in great measure from the attempt to exercise general influence on Europe; but when public opinion is entirely unwarlike, there is little use in peaceful exhortations which are unavoidably overheard by contemptuous rivals. It was especially injudicious in Lord STANLEY to refer slightingly to the Belgian guarantee, which is still binding in law and in honour. It is indeed possible that circumstances might furnish an excuse for non-performance, by rendering the redemption of the pledge obviously impracticable. If France and Germany were to agree on the seizure and partition of the Low Countries, no other Power could interfere, except by verbal protests; but it is scarcely the function of an English statesman who has just retired from the Foreign Office to invite aggression by anticipating an iniquitous combination which may probably never occur. The immediate danger to Belgium proceeds exclusively from France, which has hitherto avoided a direct collision with English policy. It is prudent to be prepared for difficulty, but diplomatists have no business to think aloud. Lord STANLEY'S reference to the American dispute was conventional, and therefore harmless. As the Minister who negotiated the abortive treaty, he cannot but be disappointed; but he properly expresses a hope that unfriendly language may not be followed by hostile acts. He is justified in the belief that no party in America meditates immediate war, but the bitter injustice which animates the whole population is undoubtedly dangerous. The chronic ill-will to England has assumed an active form, and it is not in the nature of Americans to resist or to rebuke any popular error. The most accomplished journalists vie with the lowest demagogues in unreasoning vituperation. The Nation, which stands on the intellectual level of the best European periodicals, descends into a blind and hysterical fury whenever it refers to England; and the Philadelphia Correspondent of the Times gravely declares that Mr. MOTLEY will be instructed to demand the unconditional payment of the Alabama claims, and an apology for the recognition of belligerency. The Government of Washington will evidently not surprise the people of the United States if it should unhappily prepare for a rupture by wanton insult.

The Conservative working-men must have been perplexed by Lord STANLEY'S profession of political faith, unless they were intelligent enough to perceive that his position was as anomalous as their own. The adherence to the Conservative party of a politician as free from prejudices as Mr. LOWE, and far colder than Mr. GLADSTONE, seemed to require explanation; and although Lord STANLEY'S intellect is of the most straightforward character, he was compelled, like a French philosopher, to explain by ingenious theories the result of purely historical causes. His party was chosen for him in his youth; and, as the connexion is confirmed by time, he necessarily finds it more difficult to transfer his support to his natural allies. His personal importance enables him to draw largely on the patience of his party, although from time to time he is forced to vindicate his formal consistency by his vote. At the beginning of the last Session he condemned the Irish Church in a deliberate speech, and, finding himself overruled by his colleagues, he thenceforth maintained unbroken silence. If his services could have been spared, he would scarcely have been allowed to bury himself in foreign affairs while the Government of which he formed a part was contending against an overwhelming preponderance of numbers, of argument, and of ability. Since his retirement from office he has only supported his friends by a silent vote, nor would his absence from the division have occasioned general surprise. It would perhaps not have been expedient to furnish the House with the explanation of his conduct which he has confided to the Glasgow Association. The working-men whom he addressed must have wondered whether Lord STANLEY'S opinions were identical with the Conservatism which they have been induced to profess. It may be safely assumed that their local teachers and the promoters of their organization have dealt both with the Irish Church and with general politics in an entirely different spirit. The Conservative working-man is not accustomed to hear that Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues are influenced by purely conscientious motives; nor can he easily reconcile the defence of the Irish Church with an avowed sanction of total disestablishment and of partial disendowment. Much may be said on either side as to the comparative importance of separation from the State, and of deprivation of property. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, like Lord STANLEY, attached little value to the political condition of the Church, while Mr. GLADSTONE took the more imaginative view that recognition by the State was a possession of a higher order than material wealth. The thoroughgoing opponents of the Government Bill denounce the entire principle of political and economical abolition. Their zealous followers can understand the charge of sacrilege and spoliation, but they would scarcely be excited to enthusiasm by a proposed modification of the sacrilegious and predatory scheme. Lord STANLEY coolly declares that a Christian Church ought not to care for titles or secular privileges; and he admits that any surplus of ecclesiastical revenues may fairly be applied to temporal purposes. For once a plausible compromise is far more indefensible than indiscriminate resistance. In common with the angry partisans whom he despises, Lord STANLEY fails or refuses to appreciate the only adequate reason for the abolition of the Irish Church. The measure will tend to conciliate the Roman Catholics and to pacify Ireland, unless it wholly fails in its purpose. For any smaller object it would have been unjustifiable to attempt so exceptional an enterprise; and it would be worse than idle, if anything is done, to do less than the occasion requires. The half measure which is recommended by Lord STANLEY and Sir ROUNDELL PALMER would be almost as obnoxious to the Irish Protestants as Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill, and it would neither terminate nor mitigate the agitation which may perhaps be closed by the total destruction of the Establishment. Moralists have doubted whether AGAMEMNON was right in sacrificing his daughter to obtain a fair wind for the Grecian fleet; but it would have been incomparably more unjustifiable and more foolish, when the goddess demanded her life, to cut off her leg or her arm. It is certain that the mutilation of the Establishment would not propitiate the powers which keep a tempest perpetually blowing in Ireland.

Lord STANLEY'S judgment is perhaps unconsciously biassed by the necessity of excusing his co-operation with the party of resistance. A detached Liberal, holding a command in the enemy's camp, he forms for himself, as it were, a permanent Cave. Agreeing with his adversaries on great principles, he can always excuse his antagonism by objecting to the details of their measures, and by denouncing errors or unsuccessful experiments such as the release of the Fenian convicts. Few Bills are perfect, though Mr. GLADSTONE'S has at least escaped the fatal defect of incompleteness. If it is necessary to find an argument against the measure, it can only be objected that the Bill is too sweeping where a smaller measure would have been useless. On ordinary occasions Lord STANLEY may exercise a useful function by criticizing the application of doctrines which he accepts. In his half-hearted opposition to the Irish Church Bill he furnishes Mr. GLADSTONE with additional authority, though he withholds from him a vote which is not indispensable. If it is said that Lord STANLEY'S opposition is moderate and reasonable, it must be answered that it is only tolerable because it is likely to be ineffective. In a close contest, where his vote might have turned the scale against the Bill, he would have won a triumph, not for himself, nor even for Mr. DISRAELI, but for Mr. HARDY and the enthusiastic majority of the party. The ostentatiously sophistical oration of Mr. DISRAELI probably indicated total indifference to the establishment or endowment of the Irish Church. The leader of the Conservatives may plead the doubtful excuse that he was obliged to keep the party together, and that, not being allowed to be silent, he resorted to phrases which could by no possibility support the Conservative cause. Lord STANLEY'S mind is not so constituted as to enable him gravely to propound the insoluble puzzle that religion begins where philosophy ends; but, not being prepared wholly to throw his party over, he complains that Mr. GLADSTONE has not limited his bid for peace to half the reserved price as fixed by the vendor. Perhaps the best excuse for Lord STANLEY'S anomalous attitude is the success with which he has maintained it during a political life of twenty years. His reception in Scotland affords an additional proof that he still retains in some measure the confidence of both parties. The Conservatives are proud of a leader whom they know to be exempt from their own prejudices; and the Liberals forgive the formal opposition of a candid and sympathizing adversary. If the bat in the fable had been recognised either by the birds or the beasts, the moral of the story must have been reversed.

THE DEBATE ON THE FRENCH BUDGET.

THE most logical of nations does not boast the most logical of Legislatures. The general discussion of the Budget in the Corps Législatif ran through the greater part of its course without so much as a reference to the seemingly appropriate subject of pounds, shillings, and pence. M. ROUHER has been the unwitting author of this curious anomaly. When the Deputies reassembled after Christmas, he was able to stave off more than one awkward discussion on the plea that the conduct of the Government could be most conveniently criticized in connexion with its financial policy. It was a tempting argument at the beginning of February, but it may be doubted whether the Ministry had an equally good opinion of it at the beginning of April. A danger postponed is not the same thing as a danger averted; and after the speeches of M. THIERS and M. FAVRE, M. ROUHER may perhaps regret a suggestion which, though it served his purpose at the moment, had such latent capabilities of being turned to account by his adversaries. If he has succeeded in keeping the Opposition silent for two months, the delay has only injured the Government. Nothing has happened in the interval to blunt in the least degree the edge of M. THIERS'S sarcasms, and, with a general election coming on in May, one damaging speech after Easter is worth at least two before. The electors have so much the less time in which to unlearn their lesson.

If France were under an arbitrary Government of the ordinary type, even the most accomplished orator might fail to invest with sufficient freshness the accusations levelled against it. The particulars of oppression might vary from time to time, but the substance of the indictment would necessarily remain the same. It is the singular inconsistency between the professed principles and the actual institutions of the French Empire that affords the Opposition such an inexhaustible opportunity for attack; and M. THIERS could not have wished for a more effective weapon than he found in a simple enumeration of the essential characteristics of free governments. He put aside all the open questions of politics—the value of standing armies, the comparative advantages of Protection and Free trade, the precise relation in which the Church ought to stand towards the State. Upon such points as these different nations, or different parties in the same nation, might reasonably entertain different opinions. But upon the conditions which determine whether a nation does or does not enjoy political liberty, there is absolute unanimity. They include freedom of the person, freedom of the press, freedom of election, freedom of legislation. Where any one of these is wanting, the liberty of that country is imperfect; where all are wanting, liberty cannot be said to exist. After stating this principle, M. THIERS went on to apply it to France at the present moment. How can freedom of the person consort with the loi des suspects? A French subject is at the mercy of every functionary in the Empire. He may be subjected to injuries and insults of all kinds through official blundering or official spite, without having any remedy whatever. M. FAVRE supplied an illustration of this fact which on less trustworthy evidence would almost pass the bounds of belief. A young French lady travelling in Brittany was arrested by a gendarme for no other reason than because an old beggar woman she had passed on the road chose to claim her as her daughter. She was kept in prison for two days, by order of the Juge de Paix, till her papers could be obtained from Paris. On their arrival she was sent to the Juge d'Instruction, thirty-five miles off, subjected by him to a long examination, and then detained for three days more until further proofs of her identity were forthcoming. "I tried," said M. FAVRE, "to obtain redress "for her, and we were only laughed at for our pains." It will be seen that the facts as here stated involved no political considerations whatever. It was only a flagrant case of false imprisonment, destitute of any colourable justification in the first instance, and aggravated in its later stages by a needless exhibition of judicial stupidity. But the armour which the French Government throws round its agents secures them equal impunity whether their ill-doing be civil or political. When the doctrine that the King can do no wrong is thus extended to the humblest member of the official hierarchy, individual freedom must be in a poor way.

In spite of the changes lately introduced, the press is not much more free than the person. The changes no doubt were good so far as they went. A Frenchman can now start a newspaper without preliminary authorization, and the Government has no longer the power to suspend or suppress journals at pleasure. But the removal of these disabilities is not the same thing as establishing the liberty of the press. It amounts at most to untying its hands and letting it fight the Government at its own proper risk. In thirteen months, says M.

FAVRE, 118 press prosecutions have been instituted, an aggregate fine of 135,000 francs has been inflicted, and the sentences of imprisonment have made up a total of more than nine years. Such is the record presented by the first year of the new press law, and while the conditions of the contest remain unaltered the result is not likely to be different. Where the publication of a subscription-list constitutes an offence, and a magistrate virtually chosen for the occasion constitutes the tribunal, the instances in which an accused journalist comes off victorious are certain to be extremely few. Nor is freedom of election in any better plight. By a system of grouping which would delight Mr. DISRAELI'S heart, the French Government has contrived to infuse a rural element into the town constituencies which greatly modifies their naturally democratic tendencies. A series of electoral districts, re-arranged according to circumstances, is as useful an instrument as a Minister of the Interior can desire. Then the voting-papers which contain the name of the official candidate are distributed by the Government agents along with the electoral cards. When the elector is an ignorant peasant, he naturally supposes that to vote, and to vote for the official candidate, are equally duties imposed on him by the local authorities; and even where political enlightenment has gone somewhat further, the mere fact of having the voting-paper sent to you, instead of having to get it for yourself, is safe to secure a certain percentage of votes. With more active minds the Government goes to work in a different way. It cannot rival the Opposition in promises of legislative or administrative reform, because it might be highly inconvenient to have the fulfilment of them demanded hereafter. But it has got one advantage in which the Opposition has no share. It can put its hand into the national purse and distribute its contents among any number of well-disposed constituencies. Whether by the loan of a picture or the concession of a railway, by a grant of public money or a contract for public works, the Government is always waiting to be gracious to the district which has made good its title to consideration by returning the right man. Still, in spite of all these precautions, the wrong man gets in here and there. It is not enough, therefore, to put checks on the freedom of election. Freedom of legislation must be restrained as well. The Corps Législatif must not elect its own President, lest he should not interfere at the proper time and in the proper interest. It must not have the right of initiating measures, for fear the Government should have a law made against its will. It must not put questions to Ministers when it likes, because to answer or to refuse to answer may be alike inconvenient. And behind all these bulwarks of absolutism lies one stronger than all, the absence of a responsible Ministry. If, by some strange combination of chances, the Government should be defeated in the Corps Législatif, no constitutional precedent would necessitate its taking notice of the fact. So long as the Ministers enjoy the confidence of the Sovereign, it is a matter of little moment whether they add to it the confidence of the representatives. The circumstances of the hour gave M. THIERS an admirable opportunity of pointing the moral of his sermon. Whether France shall or shall not enjoy political liberty is a question of immediate interest to every Frenchman, for it means whether it shall rest with the nation to choose between peace and war.

M. ROUHER'S reply was not worthy of the attack which it called forth. The most noticeable thing in it was his acceptance of M. THIERS'S statement that the feeling of the towns was against the Government. He avowed that his main reliance was on those agricultural masses who combine austere lives, high notions of duty, and a devoted attachment to the rights of property, with a legendary worship of NAPOLEON. It is no slight advantage to have the support of twenty-six millions who "judge the Government with impartiality," and, what is more to the purpose, will not fail it on the day of voting. Armed with this consciousness, the Government can afford to bear with "the capricious temper and the national inclination for criticism" which characterize the intelligent classes. We ask your confidence, it can say to them, but whether you give it or not makes next to no difference. We ask you not to hurry us forward any faster than we wish to go, but the dead weight of resistance we can command is a sufficient guarantee that any attempt to do so will be so much wasted strength. So long as it can dispense with the goodwill of the educated minority, it is a secondary question with the Imperial Government from what quarter it derives support. The peasant, who even now is hardly sure whether it is the First, the Second, or the Third NAPOLEON that occupies the throne; the workman, in whom Socialist instincts are uncontrolled by any acquaintance with the facts of history or the laws of economic science; the shopkeeper, whose highest ideal of Government is something that shall stand between him and the Red Spectre—to any one of these the Empire may appeal with some chance of success. From his life-long quarrel with intelligence, NAPOLEON III. might be the worthy hero of a political Dunciad.

IRISH LOYALTY.

THE fire of indignation seems to burn very fiercely in the hearts of Irish Protestants, and of their supporters and admirers over here; but we cannot help hoping that there is rather more smoke than flame, and that, when passion has had its way for a little, reason and common sense will begin to prevail. It seems to us a good sign that, in proportion as a speaker has a character to lose for prudence and knowledge of affairs, in proportion as he comes under the ordinary influences that tell on educated laymen, and in proportion as he seems able to see Ireland and the history of Ireland from an impartial point of view, he is inclined to advise submission, and to try to make terms with the Government. As Lord POWERSCOURT wrote to say, it is hard on the Irish Church that it should be represented by a set of firebrands when it has men in it who are capable of looking at affairs soberly, and of studying Ireland as a part of the British Empire. The firebrands have all their own way now, and we do not grudge them the opportunity of giving a last wild scream to attract the attention of England. But they do not appear able to carry with them the weight and sense of Irish Protestantism, and the most violent and abusive language comes from those in whose mouths it does most harm to the cause they support. Some of the Bishops have been getting wild lately, exceeding all the bounds of decorum, and showing in a marked degree the petty, feminine, spiteful, silly spirit of opposition from which ecclesiastics of all nations and ranks find it so difficult to escape. The mild Archbishop of DUBLIN opened the Irish Conferences by terming the present Cabinet, including the amiable and excellent CHANCELLOR, "garotters." The Bishop of CORK, descending to a bathos of episcopal joking in which even his chaplains could have scarcely seen anything to laugh at, said that BILLY GLADSTONE and his Bill might go to the wall. The reporters, wishing at least to give some point, even of a dangerous sort, to the imprecation, gave BILLY GLADSTONE and his Bill a worse destination. But the Bishop explained that he only meant a joke about bill-stickers. The Bishop of MANCHESTER has taken occasion to describe the PRIME MINISTER as a disappointed, baffled, self-conceited spouter. Now these outbursts of bad feeling and bad taste in bishops will probably do the Church more harm than if all their temporalities had been taken from the speakers; and they deprive the Irish Protestant movement of at least half its political importance. We may be quite sure that at this time of day a great measure of national justice will not be very seriously impeded or delayed by assemblies presided over by Bishops who talk language of which laymen of education and position would be ashamed. If Lord STANLEY had used at Glasgow anything approaching to the language employed by the Bishop of MANCHESTER, he would at once have lost caste. He would have shown a mind distinctly of the second order, and would have been guilty of a piece of bad taste which no one can conceive him committing. When Bishops use bad language, and make very silly, malevolent jokes about a Prime Minister, and sensible laymen of the position of Lord POWERSCOURT publicly remonstrate against the fury of firebrands, we feel that there is something of what the Yankees call "bogus" in the movement. It is not led in such a spirit and by such men as to make it really tell on English public opinion. It will run its course and spend its strength, and England will be only confirmed in the determination not to protect a wholly anomalous ecclesiastical institution merely that people imbued with the traditions of Protestant ascendency, and violent with a blind and indecorous violence, may have their swing, and keep up the glories of a militant minority in Ireland.

But there is something even more "bogus" in this movement than the febrile talk of excited prelates, and that is the talk, which is offered as if it were really meant, about the Repeal of the Union. Even Lord STANLEY seems to be dismayed by the thought that we shall lose that hold on Ireland which the loyalty of the Irish Protestants gives us; and speaker after speaker at these Conferences either says that Irish loyalty will be altogether extinct if Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill is carried, or goes a step further and hints that the Protestants will actually go in for Repeal. We are bound to say that there are plenty of sensible men who protest against such language, and point out that it is silly and false, and not at all calculated to effect the object for which it is used. But there is enough of it to make it worth considering; and, if we begin to consider it, we are immediately struck with a feeling of wonder at finding what a very odd sort of thing Irish loyalty must be. It has nothing to do with attachment to a reigning family; for, if Irishmen like the QUEEN now, they cannot begin to dislike her because she acts strictly in the path of constitutional duty, and assents to a Bill passed by her Parliament. We do not blame them for their separation of loyalty from the reigning dynasty, for the old idea of loyalty is visibly dying out in Europe, and it is unfair to raise a prejudice against them which Englishmen might share if it did not happen that the throne is now occupied by a Sovereign peculiarly acceptable to every class. But when Lord VENTRY, for instance, says that disestablishment will take all the soul out of Irish loyalty, he means, we suppose, that the Irish Protestants will cease to feel any affection towards England and any desire to co-operate in carrying out English policy. They will be sulky and hostile. They look upon themselves as an army of mercenaries who have been engaged to keep down Ireland for the English, and who, if disappointed or not paid as handsomely as they think they ought to be, will turn against their employers. Such an idea is not unnatural, for it is derived from old historical traditions; but when we understand what this Irish loyalty is, we see the price we have to pay for it. If we want our mercenaries to be faithful and do their best for us, we must keep them in good humour. They will then fight for us; but if we stint them in pay or honour they will fight against us. They will not of course do anything illegal or treasonable, but they will try to thwart and baffle and disappoint us at every turn. The answer is simple. If these are their terms, they are not worth having at the cost. The system of holding down Ireland by a Protestant sectarian minority is visibly failing in these days. It will no longer work. It demoralizes us, it demoralizes our instruments, it demoralizes those whom they endeavour to coerce. If the soul is to be taken out of Irish loyalty by disestablishment, let it be taken out. We do not want loyalty with a soul in it which involves us in perpetual hostility with three-fourths of the population of Ireland. It is not going too far to say, that the very object of disestablishment is to take the soul out of this curious sort of loyalty, and what Lord VENTRY represented as the great blot in the Bill is to the large majority of the constituencies of the United Kingdom its greatest attraction.

But when these exasperated loyalists say that if Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill is carried they will go in for a repeal of the Union, who can blame them? What on earth have they, of all people, to gain by Repeal? Supposing the Act of Union was repealed to-morrow, can even the worst joker on the Irish Episcopal Bench believe that the affairs of Ireland would be regulated by an assembly at all like the brief-lived Irish Parliament in the memories of which a certain set of Irishmen affect so much to glory? The old Irish Parliament was a conclave of the leaders of the minority of the Irish people, sitting to determine what use it should make of the physical force of England. The new Irish Parliament would be an assembly of the representatives of the Irish priests and the Irish peasants meeting to discuss to what uses it would apply the possessions of the minority. The existence of such an assembly would probably be a curse to Ireland, and a nuisance to England; but it would simply be destruction to the Irish Protestant landowners. The supposition, it must be remembered, is that a repeal of the Union would be extorted from England by the Irish Protestants acting in conjunction with the Irish Catholics. If we yielded at all, we should yield to the Irish nation, not to a section of it; and the Irish nation, if permitted to regulate its own affairs, would certainly regulate them according to the views of the majority. England would not interfere to back up the minority, and we do not suppose the Irish Protestants contemplate going through a civil war merely to spite us. They would not try to win their way by force, and therefore they must accept the political system, which in all probability would be based on universal suffrage and the Ballot, that the majority would choose to adopt. Putting aside the danger to which the tenure of their estates would be exposed, how, it may be asked, could they hope to get their views carried out in any single department of Government? There is also the radical objection to the scheme, that there is no reason to believe the bulk of the Irish nation want Repeal. Those who in their blind hatred of England long for political separation do not want Repeal, but an Irish Republic under the protection of the United States. This is the future of which the released Fenians are thinking when they state at public dinners how they long to appeal to the "logic of the sabre." They would scorn a mere provincial independence, such as that with which Orangemen try to frighten us; and if the soul of Irish loyalty died out, and the Orangemen united themselves with the most ferocious of the Irish enemies of England, they would be utterly unable to control the monster they had created, and might easily be forced to concur in designs which they would be aware must be ruinous to all Irishmen of their class, and steep the whole country in the dregs of misery. The Protestants, if they raised the cry of Repeal, would probably find themselves in the difficulty of having no one to join them unless they went in for something much wider and more perilous than Repeal. But we may forbear to press them with this difficulty, as we may also forbear to hint that it is not so particularly easy to force, or bully, or frighten Englishmen into Repeal or anything else. We will suppose that England would offer no serious objection, and that the Fenians would give up a Republic, and be content with a provincial Parliament. Even in this case, which is the most favourable that disloyal Orangemen could desire, Repeal would simply mean utter political extinction to the Irish Protestants and their leaders. If therefore these good people in their present crisis of panic and delirium tell us that they will cut off their nose to spite their face, and place themselves, without any hope of assistance from England, at the mercy of a provincial Parliament returned by peasants and priests, we can only say that we do not in the least believe that they mean what they say. This threat of Repeal is like the threat of angry children who, when they are scolded, cry out that they will leave the house and live all by themselves. If the Irish Protestants would only reflect for a moment how impossible it is that English and Scotch Liberals should be moved by such a threat, they would be shamed out of giving utterance to such nonsense, and would fall back on the bad jokes and bad language of their Bishops, as being at any rate less likely to have their hollowness instantly detected.

THE SPANISH CONSTITUTION.

IN the probable event of the adoption by the Cortes of the draft prepared by the Committee, the Spaniards will enjoy whatever benefit may arise from a creditable Constitution. The project, like all other contrivances of the kind, derives its ultimate origin from England; but theoretical progress is more rapid than historical growth, and Continental systems are in some degree modified by the doctrines of the French Revolution, and more especially by the superstitious belief in universal suffrage. The Committee of the Cortes had several domestic precedents before it, and more especially the formula of 1812, which was once thought the charter of European Liberalism. Since that time there has been one instance, in Belgium, of a new Constitution which for nearly forty years has been found compatible with order, with freedom, and with prosperity. If Spain is less ripe than Belgium for liberty, the country possesses the inestimable advantage of secure independence; and it is possible that the Spanish Constitution may consequently outlive the model from which it will have been practically copied. It would have been well if Spain had been able to obtain the co-operation of a King belonging to the upright and sagacious family which produced King LEOPOLD of Belgium and Prince ALBERT of England. If King FERDINAND could have been persuaded to withdraw his refusal of the Crown, the Spaniards would have had the great advantage of commencing the practice of constitutional government under a prince who would not have placed his prerogative at the disposal either of a soldier or of a priest. It is indispensable that a King of Spain should be a Roman Catholic; but the German type of orthodoxy has no similitude to the superstitious bigotry of Spanish or Neapolitan BOURBONS. The Duke of MONTPENSIER also belongs to an able and reasonable family, but his wife, from whom he derives any claim which he may possess, shares the prejudices of her sex and [illegible] l the Duke himself has not succeeded in acquiring [illegible] It is perhaps only a sentimental grievance that, if the Duke of MONTPENSIER were elected, M. GUIZOT is still alive to enjoy the triumph of having, after many years, succeeded in the most heartless intrigue of modern times. His autobiography shows the perfect complacency with which he would regard the price of his success, consisting in the moral and political ruin of Queen ISABELLA, and in the prolongation in Spain, for more than twenty years, of alternate or simultaneous anarchy and despotism. It is singular that the choice should have rested, in 1869 as in 1846, between a Prince of ORLEANS and a Prince of COBURG.

The framers of the Constitution wisely commence their task by providing securities for personal liberty. Kings and Parliaments are but instruments of government, and it is not illogical that the ends to be attained through a Constitution should be allowed precedence over the means. Some years ago a great English lawyer introduced into the House of Lords a curious Bill formed of a series of negations of as many judicial decisions recited in the clauses for the purpose of being overruled. The Committee of the Cortes may be supposed to have traversed in a similar spirit all the practical rules of government which have been enforced by all the Ministers of the late unfortunate reign; but perhaps it was impossible to enunciate sound doctrines without appearing to condemn the practice of NARVAEZ and GONZALEZ BRAVO. Arrests, except for a criminal charge under competent authority, are directly prohibited. If no sufficient security for the enforcement of the prohibition is provided, it may perhaps be thought the business of the ordinary Legislature, rather than of the Constituent Cortes, to invent something analogous to the writ of habeas corpus, and to the obligation of justices of assize to deliver or clear the gaols whenever they hold a Session. If the Article of the Constitution is adopted and observed, the consciousness of exemption from arbitrary imprisonment will furnish Spaniards who take part in political life with a new and pleasant sensation. Public functionaries who interfere with personal liberty, or with the privacy of letters and telegrams, will not enjoy the immunity from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals which cripples personal liberty in France. A minimum penalty of 20*l.* is imposed on an agent who detains a prisoner improperly, but the draft contains no provision for an early hearing or discharge. A Minister or a subordinate would, in the time of Queen ISABELLA, have cared little for nominal penalties which he would have easily contrived to escape; but it is evident that the Spaniards are now awake to the danger of allowing the Government to override the laws. The Cortes will possibly expunge an Article which suspends the principal guarantees of freedom whenever a law to that effect may be deemed necessary. It is not of good omen to contemplate in legislation the suspension of law; but it may be admitted that written Constitutions must differ from ordinary laws. A newly liberated community may perhaps require a transcendent or organic law, though nothing of the kind has ever been allowed in England to clash with Parliamentary omnipotence. The recent experience of America illustrates the inconvenience which necessarily arises whenever a Legislature desires, with popular approval, to emancipate itself from the inelastic restrictions of a Constitutional charter. An express recognition of the right of petition may be regarded as a commentary on one of the most extravagant among many caprices of irresponsible authority. Three or four years ago, after a dissolution of the Cortes, the majority of the late members were arrested, and transported beyond sea, for the simple offence of attempting to present a respectful petition to the QUEEN. Some of the other Articles contain a similar reference to recent abuses of power; and the whole ground of liberty appears to be covered by the comprehensive provision that everything is lawful which is not prohibited by the Constitution and the laws. The establishment of a doctrine as sound as it is sweeping, in conjunction with the right of proceeding at law against public functionaries, might almost suffice for the protection of liberty if it were certain that the Constitution would be obeyed.

The proposed Constitution enacts or declares the duty of the nation to maintain the established religion and its ministers. In matters of this kind it is the business of law to mould itself on custom and opinion; nor would a prudent Legislature, even if the question of establishment were open, by denuding the clergy of their rank and endowment, at the same time convert them into enemies and deprive itself of a salutary control over their actions. The maintenance of a Church which still commands the attachment or respect of the bulk of the population is in no degree inconsistent with the freedom of conscience which, after having been loudly demanded as a main result of the revolution, seems lately to have receded into the background of public opinion. The provision of the draft Constitution for the right of nonconformity, though it may perhaps be sufficient, is oddly framed. By the 21st Article the public and private exercise of their religion is guaranteed to foreigners, and by the 22nd Article the dispositions of the former paragraph are made applicable to any Spaniards who profess any other religion than the Catholic. The more orthodox members of the Committee probably objected to admitting the existence of a Spanish Dissenter, who is undoubtedly a rare phenomenon. In the same way a game law might extend the protection already accorded to pheasants and partridges to any bustard which may be found in the Eastern counties. The fifty or sixty Spaniards who lately celebrated a Protestant religious rite are perhaps supposed to have wished rather to startle their neighbours than to form a sect of their own.

The organic provisions of the Constitution distribute legislative and executive power according to the received arrangement. The Cortes is to be divided into two Houses; and the most original part of the whole project consists in the machinery by which a Senate and a House, both proceeding from universal suffrage, are to be distinguished from one another. The Congress, or Lower House, is to be elected by universal suffrage for three years, or until dissolution, and the only qualification of the members is that they should be twenty-five years old. The Senate is to be renewed by fourth parts every three years; and the King may dissolve at pleasure one or both Houses. The Senators must be forty years old, and they are to be elected by a body formed of the provincial deputations, and of a number of Commissioners chosen for the special purpose. The effect of indiscriminate suffrage for the Senatorial electors is to be corrected by elaborate limitations of the eligibility of candidates. The qualification is the past tenure of considerable offices, including the rank of bishop, general, admiral, and University dignitary; or the position of one of the fifty largest payers of territorial taxes, or of the twenty largest contributors to industrial and commercial subsidies in each province. A second or fourth election for certain provincial and municipal offices will also confer eligibility; and it may be supposed that the authors of the draft of the Constitution have exhausted the conditions of pre-eminent social respectability. Any recognition of the privileges of birth would have offended the prejudice against aristocracy which, in Spain as in other Continental countries, has formed a chief obstacle to the attainment of constitutional freedom. By a provision copied from an obsolete incumbrance of the English Constitution, Senators and Deputies are to vacate their seats on the acceptance of office under the Crown. It is not expressly stated whether they may be re-elected; but, as Ministers are to have no voice in the Cortes unless they are members, it may be presumed that, subject to the approval of constituents, a Minister may occupy a seat. It is not as well understood in Spain as it is in England and in France, that the supremacy of a Parliament depends on the power of making the leaders of the majority Ministers of the Crown. On the whole, as universal suffrage was inevitable, the project is creditable to the Committee, and it well deserves the favourable consideration of the Cortes.

BANKRUPTCY REFORM.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL has got his Bankruptcy and Imprisonment for Debt Bills read a second time, but it is with the understanding that several matters of principle shall be open to discussion on going into Committee. Of these questions there are three of paramount importance—the status to be given to a bankrupt after the distribution of his estate; the extent to which imprisonment for debt shall be abrogated; and the constitution of the Bankruptcy Court.

On the first of these questions a marked impression was produced by the able speech of Mr. JESSEL, who advocated with irresistible force the views which we put forward in a recent article on the subject. Mr. JESSEL showed himself a thorough master both of the principles and of the history of bankruptcy law, and after his lucid and convincing speech we cannot understand how a doubt can remain in the foggiest mind as to the propriety of holding any property which a bankrupt may acquire liable to pay the money which he owes. Mr. JESSEL pointed out, what has not been sufficiently remembered, that the notion of discharging a bankrupt from further liability after paying a certain percentage of his debts is not only an exceptional, but a rather recent, peculiarity of English law. The Roman law, which has been the foundation of nearly all the European codes, required a cessio bonorum from the debtor, but did not relieve his after-acquired property from his debts. The earlier English statutes proceeded on the same principle, and the extreme indulgence shown by our more modern Acts of Parliament may be traced to a natural reaction against the barbarous theory of our law, that a debtor might be imprisoned for ever, and if necessary allowed to starve to death in prison "for his "own fault," as a learned Chief Justice once humanely explained. While debt involved this terrible penalty, it was not surprising that relief from it should be extended to a bankrupt who gave up all his property, even though it might suffice to pay but a fraction of his debts. But imprisonment for debt has long since been deprived of all its terrors, and now it is on the point of being wholly abolished. As this hold upon an insolvent debtor's body is relaxed, it is only just that the hold upon his goods, whenever they may be acquired, should be tightened; and there is no rational line that can be drawn, short of saying that all the wealth which a bankrupt may ever acquire shall be subject to the claims of his creditors, saddled only with this condition, that so much breathing-time shall be allowed him as not to render recovery hopeless. Tenderness to debtors cannot go further than giving time without becoming cruelty and injustice to creditors. As Mr. JESSEL observed, nothing can be more distressing than to see an unscrupulous speculator, who has been bankrupt three or four times, keeping in his carriage, while his unfortunate creditors are ruined. It has been suggested not only that the liability of future property should extend to 20s. in the pound instead of 10s., but that a clause ought to be added giving to the new creditors of a man who has been bankrupt priority in the distribution of a second estate which may have been accumulated at their expense. This is obviously a fair and essential provision, but we think that the Bill already contains it by implication in the clause which adopts the existing practice of the Bankruptcy Court. The sole question, therefore, which remains, is whether the limitation of future liability to 10s. in the pound can be justly maintained. We have sought in vain for a reason for such a limitation. In introducing his Bill Sir R. COLLIER suggested, as an excuse for so anomalous a provision, that the want of it would drive bankrupts to despair and hopeless ruin. The conclusive answer to this is, that if it is wrong to drive a man who pays 10s. in the pound to desperation, it cannot be right to inflict this misery on a man who pays 9s. 6d. in the pound, more especially as the amount of dividend is no sort of test of a bankrupt's honesty, and very often is an indication of dishonesty. The clever bankrupt who robs a hundred creditors of 10s. in the pound is not more deserving of pity than the blunderer who stops at a time when he will rob half as many creditors of double that percentage. But, in truth, all the talk about the desperate position of bankrupts is nonsense under a law which (as is proposed by the present Bill) saves them from all attacks for a period of five years. No man would be more readily trusted in the City than a really honest and capable, though unfortunate, bankrupt, ready to start afresh without the possibility of his trade being interfered with for years by any of his former creditors. It is true that it may be pleasanter to a bankrupt to contemplate the prospect of acquiring a new fortune for himself after paying only half of what he owes, but it is not at all pleasant to a creditor to feel himself defrauded and impoverished that his improvident debtor may the sooner revel in luxury.

We observe that the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in his brief reply, did not recur to his original argument, and we strongly suspect that he (as every sensible lawyer must be) is more than half convinced of the soundness of Mr. JESSEL'S criticism. All that he had to urge was, that his Bill, though it stopped short of the point indicated by principle, was a great advance on the existing law and on recent attempts to improve it. This is, in a sense, true. The law, as it stands, discharges a bankrupt irrespectively of dividend, but then that is subject to the quasi-penal jurisdiction of the Court, which Sir R. COLLIER takes away, and which has proved in practice an almost total failure. Its existence, however, affords the true explanation of the apparent leniency of the present law. It had been supposed that a Commissioner could discriminate between unfortunate and fraudulent bankrupts, and it was intended to treat the one class with exceptional indulgence, and to load the other with the heaviest penalties. But this plan would not work, and the indulgence reached the rogues as well as the unlucky traders. It is now recognised that, so far as the Bankruptcy Court is concerned, no such distinction is practicable, and the motive for excessive leniency disappears. Then Sir R. COLLIER mentioned that in 1865 a Committee recommended that a bankrupt should be released on paying a dividend of 6s. 8d., whereas his Bill insists upon payment of 10s. But neither the Committee nor Sir R. PALMER, in the Bill which he afterwards introduced, could have supposed that there was any justification for such a restriction, and there is no doubt that the idea grew out of the fear that public opinion was not ripe (as we are satisfied it now is) for a larger measure. Moreover, the excellent provision for giving a bankrupt five years' respite had not then been thought of, nor had imprisonment for debt been abolished, and the timid errors of great authorities really go for nothing as precedents now that larger views prevail and sounder methods have been developed. We cannot but think that when the Bill passes into Committee Sir R. COLLIER will see the wisdom of abandoning a clause which deforms what would otherwise be in most respects an admirable measure; and we are the more hopeful, because he has already in substance withdrawn an equally obnoxious clause in the sister Bill, which also was introduced from too great deference to authority, and too timid an estimate of public opinion on the subject. We may take it as certain, after what passed in the House, that the retention of imprisonment for debts below 50l. will never form part of the Act when passed. Anything so invidious as a law for imprisoning the man who owes little and releasing the man who owes much can scarcely be imagined, and we are glad to see not only that Sir R. COLLIER does not insist upon it, but that he is very well pleased to find the House condemning a clause which he evidently dislikes as much as any of its most outspoken opponents.

There is one other part of the Bankruptcy Bill which urgently requires reconsideration. Sir R. COLLIER proposes, as Lord WESTBURY proposed, to appoint a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, who is to organize the procedure, and regulate the working of the machine. This is clearly right. One Judge will be far better than three Commissioners; but there is at least one of the present Commissioners who is fully competent to the duty, and who was generally supposed to have been designated by Lord WESTBURY for the post. The alternative project of reducing the Common Law Bench by transferring one of the existing Judges to the Court of Bankruptcy, is a very doubtful policy. It would be impossible to recall him for the extra work of the next election, and so long as the existing system prevails of driving suitors into references, or, in other words, compelling them to hire private judges of their own, it is impossible to say that the Common Law Bench is over-manned. The arrangement as to the ultimate appeal is still more questionable, and is recommended only by the fanciful propriety of carrying the appeals to the Court from which the Bankruptcy Judge has been removed. We say removed, because the scheme of the Bill is to detach him altogether from his former Court, although for no intelligible reason he is still to retain his old title. The truth is, there is no excuse for changing the present appellate jurisdiction. It has worked admirably, and has created as complete a code of bankruptcy law as imperfect statutes permitted; and as the new practice and principles of bankruptcy are expressly founded on what has hitherto prevailed without any detailed enactments, nothing could be more inopportune than to choose such a time as the passing of this measure for altering the ultimate Court of Appeal. And there are stronger reasons than the mere possession of the jurisdiction for leaving the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices in the exercise of their old functions. Their decisions have not only given satisfaction, but the Court has not work enough to do without the bankruptcy business. At the present moment there are no arrears in the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the sittings have been suspended for some weeks from want of business. Bankruptcy appeals, as a rule, are decided in a week or two, whereas if they go to a Common Law Court, they must be interrupted during the intervals consecrated to circuit business, and cannot possibly come on with anything like the rapidity which (strange as it may sound to those who remember Lord ELDON) is now the characteristic of the Appellate Court in Chancery. It would be an injustice to Sir R. COLLIER to suppose that any sectional prejudice in favour of his own branch of the profession has suggested these clauses, and if he inquires, he will learn that the bankruptcy appeals cannot be disposed of more satisfactorily than they are, and that needless delays will be the inevitable consequence of displacing a Court which is a model of speed and excellence.

We have confined ourselves to those points in which the Bill seems to require alteration, but we would not be supposed to have receded from our first opinion, that it is the most promising attempt that has yet been made to deal with a very thorny branch of law reform.

BENJAMIN HIGGS.

IT has been denied that history ever repeats itself; and we may admit that this is true so far as the great events of the world are concerned. There have not been two sieges of Troy, and there cannot be a second French Revolution of the same type as that of 1789. But human nature is a very con-scant quantity. Now and then one comes to doubt whether there is not some truth in the doctrine of Transmigration of souls,

> Ipsa eadem est: animam sic semper eandem
> Esse, sed in varias doceo migrare figuras.

Surely our BENJAMIN HIGGS of to-day does not so much reproduce, as is, our LIONEL REDPATH of twelve years ago. A mere swindler and ordinary embezzler does not represent a type of character; but the REDPATH-HIGGS—one can only describe it less as a person than as an impersonation of immoral-morality — is a type. Hitherto, with only Mr. REDPATH to philosophize and speculate upon, we looked upon him, the only instance known, as an exception, a fault, a monster, something irreducible to a place and class in the ethical division of human kind. But as science and experiment advances, and with at least two specimens before us, perhaps the time has come for recognising the claims of this the highest class of modern swindlers to its own proper place in the classification of man. It is no longer with an exceptional individuum vagum, but with an ascertained variety of modern man, that we have to deal. The late—if he is the late—Mr. REDPATH made us all stare. With the present Mr. HIGGS we seem to have something like familiarity. He does what has been done before—perhaps what is now doing all around us—what is very likely to be done again. The curiosity about him is chiefly to remark with what accurate precision of details he repeats his great original, REDPATH. We turn him over and examine him with the same interest that a natural historian inspects a humming-bird or a tortoise, pretty certain that the received and technical description of the species will be fulfilled in the particular and present instance. Our interest is rather that of illustration than of discovery.

Mr. REDPATH was a clerk—employé is the received newspaper word—of the Great Northern Railway, and he contrived to embezzle a matter of untold, or at any rate forgotten, tens of thousands of pounds. His salary was not high, but his manner of life was sumptuous, noble, and, above all, very artistic and charitable. Some demon—angel for aught we know—whispered to REDPATH, "Have a taste"; and his taste was for social amenities, high art, and the charities of life. Mr. REDPATH lived in one of the Regent's Park Terraces, bought pictures, cultivated the tastes of a connoisseur; and for local objects, parish charities, Church work, and the tale of suffering humanity, his sympathies and his purse were open. But REDPATH was a robber, though so good and charitable a Christian gentleman. To recount all this is but to describe Mr. BENJAMIN HIGGS. The EUPHORBUS of the past is the PYTHAGORAS of the present. BENJAMIN HIGGS was only a clerk, with a small salary under 400*l.*, employed by that not very distinguished corporation. the Great Central Gas Consumers' Company—one of the Companies which supply the City of London. A dingy office in dingy Coleman Street is the habitat of this Company, and the place looks so dull and dismal that one can quite understand that the official staff is not much troubled with inconvenient supervision. What Mr. BENJAMIN HIGGS has managed to convey out of this Gas Company will probably be never known; as for other reasons, so because the investigation of the accounts of a society which at the first blush of it believes that 50,000*l.* has vanished "unbeknown to everybody" will, after all, amount to very little. Anyhow 50,000*l.* is reckoned as the "demnition tottle" of Mr. HIGGS' absorption of his employers' assets — we select a superfine phrase, because to speak of thieving and robbery in connexion with a rascal so sublime and peculiar as Mr. HIGGS is unworthy of a great subject. A sort of biography has been published of "Mr. HIGGS' extraordinary career" by the Twickenham Observer; but the Twickenham Observer is neither an accurate biographer nor a good moral anatomist. He is neither a PLUTARCH nor a THEOPHRASTUS. He tells us, to be sure, and with an evident sympathy for his subject, that his respected neighbour's establishment at Teddington was of an almost princely character. But he does not tell us how long this superb household has been going on; that is, how long Mr. HIGGS has been appropriating other people's money. We have heard that Mr. HIGGS has been for more than eighteen years in the employment of the Gas Company, and that for at least ten years he has been living this lordly life. The Twickenham Observer smacks his lips as he enumerates the luxuries of Mr. HIGGS' actual mansion, to say nothing of the rising castle which was to cost 50,000*l.*; the furniture, the equipages, the nine horses, several ponies, five gardeners, eight housemaids, gold watches, and diamond rings of his luxurious subject. Mr. HIGGS must have been the hero of the story where "more "phaetons" were ordered round. These things were "the "envy of the connoisseurs," and certainly of the Twickenham Observer. But all this looks like mere vulgar display and ostentation. Mr. HIGGS had virtues of a higher order. As REDPATH cultivated one of the fine arts, and gave himself to the Muse of Painting, so the MÆCENAS of Teddington went in for the worship of Music. "His weekly parties "were graced by the presence of our most celebrated artistes." But City magnates often do this sort of thing as a mere mode of lavish expenditure. Mr. HIGGS, however, aimed higher, and touched the finer issues of humanity; it was his to seek out the poor and suffering, and to be foremost in works not only of parochial, but of general, usefulness. He hired the best musical talent of the day, and gave concerts for the benefit of schools; he is said, by useful and well-timed advances, to have averted ruin from many a struggling and hardworking man of business. Since JOB's time there never was a man of more exuberant love and charity—"the blessing of him that "was ready to perish came upon him, and he caused the "widow's heart to sing for joy."

The question then is—Can so good a man be a mere thief and robber? Can a REDPATH or a HIGGS be consigned to the ignominious obscurity and infamy which attend any mere vulgar snob who robs the till, and spends the proceeds on gin and female consumers of gin? The answer, of course, is obvious—that HIGGS' virtues were no virtues; that he went in for charity and generosity because they were excellent and most respectable forms of sumptuous living. He was as DIVES in the parable, even though he did remember LAZARUS at his gate, because he was charitable, just as he wore a big diamond ring, only for sordid ostentation and vanity. This is of course the proper and commonplace answer; but we should like to be sure of it. It would not surprise us, if we could get at the bottom of a HIGGS, to find out that some at least of this sympathy and charity was not altogether fictitious. It is perhaps possible that he looked at his charities and alms deeds with something of a fetish-worshipper's spirit. We have known people who are in the habit of going to church and saying their prayers with a spiritual intention—namely, that the race-horses on which they have made a book should win. So perhaps with a HIGGS or a REDPATH. They thought, it may be, that the undeniably good purpose to which they applied their stolen money might atone for the fact of stealing it; and just as there have been known to be bandits who will spend a good deal of money in masses for their victims' souls, so the great man of Teddington might think that he was squaring it with GOD if he gave to GOD what he borrowed from the devil. We merely mention this as a theory. It is not for us to argue out a HIGGS. We know nothing about the moral nature of HIGGSES, any more than we know about the political constitution of SIRIUS or the agricultural statistics of URSA MAJOR. We are merely speculating on a phenomenon, but which is not to us a noumenon.

What, rather, we would observe is this. We give City folks credit for being masters of their own craft. Cuique in suâ arte credendum. To be sure we do not expect to find, as we certainly never do find, Boards of Directors, and the great merchants and warehousemen, and the rest of it, very intelligent and very well informed, or particularly gifted in the way of judgment of men or things in general. But we do set them down as sharp men—good men of business, as they say—men not to be imposed upon, wise men according to their wisdom, which is perhaps a very narrow sort of wisdom, but still men clever, shrewd, and good at their books and accounts and mere money-making. We are reluctantly forced to believe this to be a popular delusion, and we begin to suspect that the credit which these City folks get for all their business habits and powers is a mere illusion and delusion. Else how comes it, we ask, to happen that this HIGGS contrived to embezzle this fifty thousand pounds out of a concern like a common Gas Company? How comes it to happen that the Directors and Committee and officials could be blinded to the fact that a clerk of 400*l.* a year was living, as he must have lived, at the rate of 10,000*l.* a year on the poor pretence of a sudden legacy and wife's trustees? Is it in any nature less stupid and perverse than civic nature, and corporate and commercial nature, the nature of Joint-Stock Company Directors, to believe that a man with means of 10,000*l.* a year should stoop to be a Gas Company's clerk for 400*l.* a year?

Not that there is anything very new in this. It is the rule for these Companies, and these Boards, and these Directors, to be swindled in this especially stupid way. In this very week we have this HIGGS case; we have also the trial of Mr. HUGHES, accountant to the Board of Works, for defalcations to a large amount, and though the accused person was acquitted, the proceedings showed that the accounts of this great body are scandalously ill kept; and we have also a clerk of eighteen years' standing in the office of the London Assurance Corporation convicted of embezzlement of some 1,700*l.* Our memory is treacherous; but we can recall at least the names of some of the great swindlers of the last few years whose crimes, consisting of the abstraction of corporate property, were never discovered by the Directors and officials till they had risen to almost fabulous amounts. SADLEIR committed forgeries and embezzlements on Railway Companies and Bank Companies in Ireland to the supposed amount of half a million, and was not found out at all. This was in 1856, a year which was rendered memorable by REDPATH's fraud and robbery on the Great Northern Railway, calculated at 250,000*l.*; and by ROBSON's embezzlements from the Crystal Palace Company, which were set down at 27,000*l.* In 1857 JOHN PAUL was convicted of embezzling what was supposed to amount to 23,000*l.*, belonging to the City of London Union, but he always had got his accounts safe through the Board of Guardians and auditors. PULLINGER's robbery of the Union Bank, extending to the amount of 260,000*l.*, was discovered by the Directors and managers by a mere accident. The DURDEN-HOLCROFT robbery of the Commercial Bank of London in 1861, which only reached the peddling sum of 67,000*l.*, was spread over years. At a later date, in 1865, the cashier of the Bank of London was convicted of embezzling some 3,500*l.* With these little facts of the commercial history of recent London before us, and with the very troublesome and heart-searching thoughts suggested by the names of OVEREND, GURNEY, and Co., and PETO and Co., shall we be so far wrong when we emphasize our growing and ever-growing suspicion that even in business matters, in their own walk, in their own proper vocations, these Boards of Directors are among the stupidest of men—or that a good many of them are ——? But aposiopesis has its necessities.

SELF-PORTRAITURE.

SOME people have a faculty of surveying themselves from without, of picturing to themselves the appearance they make, the figure they cut under striking or picturesque or unusual or even grotesque circumstances, which constitutes a very distinctive characteristic. It is not in them the moral insight of the poet, the gift of "seeing ourselves as others see us," nor is it the shadowy self-caricature sketched by nervous and often agonized apprehensions, as what they fear to be the impression made on others: it is an artistic perception, a real feat of the imagination—a picture of fact, only so far coloured and flattered as all art justifies. Nor is it a power essentially allied to egotism; other persons as egotistical, as full of themselves, as concentrated on their own affairs, may have nothing of this habit or gift. Indeed, the more remarkable examples of egotism in our experience are without it; they approach the one subject of their contemplation from another point of view: they tell us a great deal, but they do not draw pictures for the eye of our fancy of which self is the central figure. The power, such as we would define it, is purely intellectual—a temptation, no doubt, to egotism, but not the thing itself. When it is kept in perfect check, we ought to feel grateful towards it, for it is a great enlivener of talk, as well as of the more familiar style of composition; and the most effective and telling of all ways of conveying a sensation of which there is no personal experience. To borrow an illustration from autobiography, which is talk upon paper of the kind we mean. The first time a man sees himself in print is an occasion which causes a little fluster of elation, a concentration of thought, not on his subject, but on his personal relation to it. The feeling is common, but not the power to depict it in action, as we find it in Haydon, who was a remarkable instance of this faculty. He had written a letter to the Examiner, and dropped it into the letter-box with a sort of spasm. "Never shall I forget," he tells us, "that Sunday morning. In came the paper, wet, uncut; up went the breakfast knife—cut, cut, cut. Affecting not to be interested, I turned the pages open to dry, and to my certain immortality saw, with a delight not to be expressed, the first sentence of my letter. I put down the paper, walked about the room, looked at Macbeth (his picture), made the tea, buttered the toast, put in the sugar, with that inexpressible suppressed chuckle of delight that always attends a condescending relinquishment of an anticipated rapture till one is perfectly ready. Who has not felt this? who has not done this?" Now the man who does this sort of thing in conversation, who raises an image by a few skilful touches, enabling us to transport him, such as he stands before us, into interesting circumstances, is a social stimulant. The company is visibly roused to attention. It is no doubt imperative on politeness to assume interest when a person makes himself his theme, but beyond this an added excitement may be observed when a man who can express himself well on general topics is led to one of these personal displays. For one reason, his own eye quickens, his voice varies its modulations. Action, by ever so slight a gesture, relieves the monotony of our ordinary English demeanour. A little drama is performed before us. Whether the man means it for condescension or not, we are obliged to him for sacrificing reserve, which is supposed to be a national characteristic for our diversion.

But the man who illustrates subjects by his personal experience who is reminded by what comes from others of something that has happened to himself, and tells it with that relish, that play of spirit, tenderness, pathos, self-banter, incidental to the situation and which secures him willing attention, naturally finds it difficult to relapse gracefully into the general and abstract. Having been the hero of the moment, it is hard to permit the conversation to pursue a course which leaves him behind. We detect in him struggles to keep the hold he has got, and if he has voice and resolution in proportion to his other powers he succeeds, quite unconsciously, in putting a stop to all conversation that deserves the name in the circle where he reigns. All people noted for this talent are desultory—that is, they make the talk within reach of their interference desultory; for they have a very definite aim, though it happens to be incompatible with the fair discussion of topics needing continuous thought. We see in them an uneasy sense of things becoming dull and wearisome when they drift out of their own experience. They habitually assume that people cannot be interested or amused unless it is they who interest or amuse them. So it is that many a quiet thinker is snubbed into silence; while he is arranging his ideas the thread is snapped, the ground shifted, and he gives in with just a vague sense of something unsatisfactory.

The man who has abandoned himself to the fascinations of self-portraiture has no principles—which are abstract things—he has simply a picture to draw in an infinite variety of becoming lights. For this purpose he adopts views simply as picturesque settings. He is strict and austere in his principles when a Rembrandt arrangement of light and shade is indicated. Then he lays down the law; his example is a terror to the careless and undecided. Presently it suits him to be taken in the sunlight, and the austerity is all gone; he is tolerant, indulgent, latitudinarian. Now he is in full costume, gentlemanlike, fastidious, and punctilious; the next time we meet him he is in a reckless, careless vein, and affects the Bohemian. These transformations puzzle the observer, till the key is found in a repertory of good stories, or in the adventures of each day. People will simulate a hundred violent, strong, and startling opinions for the sole purpose of establishing a predominance for the hour, not with deliberate inconsistency, but because these are to them only stage properties.

Nothing leads to greater and more serious acts of indiscretion than this propensity when allowed to run riot. In the one object of painting an effective scene the rights of others are not thought of, and the character of all the accessories of the picture is at the mercy of a blind sense of the picturesque. Under its guidance the talker means so little harm, has so little positive intention, that he forgets what he has said when the occasion is over and his end is gained. The listener treats all as bonâ fide, and goes away with ill impressions of somebody—at first of the dramatis personæ, but in time of the garrulous dramatist himself. No person indulging a habit of self-portraiture is fit to direct others; he has disqualified himself from forming an unbiassed impersonal view. When by chance asked for advice, he can only fall back upon what he calls his experience, wherein he has observed, not society or the world in themselves, but only as he has acted and figured among them. But persons in any sense occupied with themselves and their own affairs cannot, even with the best intentions, assume into the position of counsellors, which needs a sympathy antagonistic to their habitual temper.

A practice of gentle detraction necessarily attends self-portraiture as a fixed habit, and that with as little malice prepense as may be, but solely from the need of playing first fiddle, of standing in the best place. Self always in the light necessarily implies others cast into the shade. In the mere interest of art the man learns to regards all his acquaintance as foils. And if we note one of these gentlemen in a compunctious mood, entertaining us with graphic confessions, we shall always find him the best of his company, nobler in his errors than his old associates, and of a higher type than they; even in the stories that tell most against himself implicating the absent more deeply than himself. Yet he has not the slightest feeling of what he is about. He would greet any of these betrayed or slandered victims with the cordiality of a clear conscience, for indeed he has not thought of wronging them, they have been sacrificed to a conversational necessity. Downright ill-nature is a rarer quality than some persons suppose. Half the detraction of society is done unconsciously and by good-natured pleasant people. As for secrets, a secret is an impossible, almost an unintelligible, check to one of these communicative folks. He cannot keep his own secrets if they involve any dramatic effects, and this frankness where his own interests might seem to be damaged by his disclosures is supposed to acquit him of all collateral obligations. Self-interest—understanding by the term any long-sighted view of personal advantage—is so far from being the motive of this lavish self-display, that it is incompatible with it. This incontinence of speech has stranded more than one clever fellow in middle life, and is pretty sure to end in a boring and mendacious old age.

But all this tells nothing against the grace and merit of self-portraiture at fit times and under the restraints of taste and sympathy. When a man undertakes to talk about himself, some picturesque touches of the sort are almost essential. It does not do to be absolutely impersonal. Wordsworth in his general poems tells us of his thoughts and habits of mind. In his Tintern Abbey and Nutting we have a glimpse of him in the body; but only, as far as we remember, in his Prelude, which is autobiography, have we a portrait. The poet there condescends to own a recollection of undergraduate elation in the first sense of powder and silk stockings, and we are obliged to him for a touch which makes us see him in a new light:—

> As if the change
> Had waited on some fairy's wand, at once
> Behold me rich in monies, and attired
> In splendid garb, with hose of silk, and hair
> Powdered like rimy trees, when frost is keen.
> My lordly dressing-gown, I pass it by,
> With other signs of manhood that supplied
> The lack of beard.

Where there is habitual reserve, a single word sometimes betrays unwittingly a consciousness of manner at some critical juncture of a man's past history. Thus Dr. Newman, in his Apologia, reports his and Froude's interview with Dr. Wiseman at Rome:—"I said, with great gravity, 'We have a mission.'" And the instinct which imprints external self on the mind's eye at the moment of realizing a career in prospect may also be seen at work at the instant of successful achievement. It prompted Gibbon's more elaborate description of what he terms his "final deliverance:"—"It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a berceau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom, and perhaps the establishment of my fame." Where such notices are rare and grave, like these, they convey a conviction in the writer of a great part to play, or of labour well done, which tells powerfully on the reader. Even where the reader and the self-portrayer are at odds as to the value and importance of the work done, or to be done, or as to his fitness for it, a genuine conviction expresses itself well in this form and engages our sympathies. We do not think a great deal of the Rambler in these days, but we like to see Johnson in the act of naming it. "I was at a loss how to name it. I sat down at night by my bedside, resolved that I would not go to sleep till I had fixed its title. The Rambler seemed the best that occurred to me, and I took it." Haydon, after borrowing 50*l*. for the prosecution of one of his big pictures, tells us, "I never wrote 'I promise to pay' with such inspired fury before"; and the image of frenzied passion for his art, in which he so signally failed, fills us with a melancholy sympathy. The only occasion when it is impossible to sympathize with this habit is where the narrator of a scene, in which his emotions are professedly engaged for others, is really taken up with the thought of how he himself looked and acted in it.

Of course wit is prone to self-portraiture, and a very convenient engine it is in softening the sting of banter and raillery when directed towards others. The man who pictures himself in trying or ridiculous circumstances may the more safely play with the dignity of others without wounding their self-love. This was one of Sydney Smith's felicities. Himself under some disguise or posture of mind or body was his constant illustration:—"I see you crumble your bread"—to a nervous young lady—"when I dine with the Archbishop of Canterbury, I crumble my bread with both hands." "If I go to a fancy ball, of course I shall go as a Dissenter." But all people's memories are full of examples.

We began with speaking of the danger incident to this gift as leading to egotistical display and the disturbance of general conversation. Yet it may exist in its greatest charm under absolute control. It was possessed by one of the best conversers we have ever known, and in this capacity the most interested of listeners; happy also in an especial power of drawing out the thoughts and experiences of others. Telling an incident that had befallen him some twenty years before, with graphic detail, characteristic humour, and self-knowledge, his wife at the end remarked, "I never heard you tell that story before." "I never told it before" was the reply.

DOVECOTS.

TIMES must be very bad indeed if a faithful few are not still left to keep the sources of society sweet and wholesome. When corruption has gone through the whole mass and all classes are bad alike, everything comes to an end, and there is a general overthrow of national life; but while some are left pure and unspotted we are not quite undone, and we may reasonably hope for better days in the future. In the midst of the reign of the girl of the period, with her slang and her boldness—of the fashionabl woman, with her denial of duty and her madness for pleasure—we come every now and then upon a group of good girls of the real old English type, the faithful few growing up silently among us, but none the less valuable because they are silent and make no public display—doves who are content with life as they have it in the dovecot, and have no desire to be either eagles dwelling on romantic heights, or peacocks displaying their pride in sunny courts. We find these faithful few in town and country alike; but they are rifest in the country, where there is less temptation to go wrong than there is in the large towns, and where life is more simple and the moral tone undeniably higher. The leading feature of these girls is their love of home and of their own family, and their power of making occupation and happiness out of apparently meagre materials. If they are the elders, they find amusement and more in their little brothers and sisters, whom they consider immensely funny, and to whom they are as much girl-mothers as sisters; if they are the youngers, they idolize their baby nephews and nieces. For there is always a baby going on somewhere about these houses, babies being the great excitement of home life, and the antiseptic element which keeps everything else pure. They are passionately attached to papa and mamma, whom they think the very king and queen of humanity, and whom they do not call by even endearing slang names. It has never occurred to them to criticize them as ordinary mortals; and as they have not been in the way of learning the prevailing accent of disrespect, they have not shaken off that almost religious veneration for their parents which all young people feel naturally, if they have been well brought up and are not corrupted. The yoke in most middle-class country-houses is one fitting very loosely round all necks; and there being no power of using greater freedom, if even they had it, the girls are not fretted by its pressure, and are content to live under it in peace. They adore their elder brothers who are from home just beginning the great battle of life for themselves, and confidently believe them to be the finest fellows going, and the future great men of the day if only they care to put out those splendid talents of theirs, and take the trouble of plucking the prizes within their reach. They may have a slight reservation, perhaps, in favour of the brothers' friend, whom they place on a pedestal of almost equal height. But they keep their mental architecture a profound secret from every one, and do not suffer themselves to let it grow into too solid a structure unless it has some surer foundation than their own fancy. For, though doves are loving, they are by no means lovesick damsels; they are too healthy and natural and quietly busy for unwholesome dreams. If one of them marries, they all unite in loving the man who comes in among them. He is adopted as one of themselves, and leaps into a family of idolizing sisters who pet him as their brother—with just that subtle little difference in the petting that it comes from sisters unaccustomed, and so has the charm of novelty if not the excitement of naughtiness. But this kind of thing is, about the most dangerous to a man's moral nature that can befall him. Though pretty to see, and undeniably pleasant to experience, and though perfectly innocent in every way, still nothing enervates one so much as this idolatrous submission of a large family of women. In a widow's house, where there are many daughters and no sons, and where the man who marries one marries the whole family and is worshipped accordingly, the danger is of course increased tenfold; but if there are brothers and a father, the sister's husband, though affectionately cooed over, is not made quite such a fuss with, and the association is all the less hurtful in consequence.

The life of these girls is by no means stupid, though it is quiet and without any spasmodic events or cataclysms of fortune in any way. They go a great deal among the village poor, and they teach at the Sunday-school, and attend the mothers' meetings and clothing-clubs and the like, and learn to get interested in their humbler friends, who, after all, are Christian sisters. They read their romances in real life instead of in three-volume novels, and study human nature as it is—in the rough, certainly, but perhaps in more genuine form than if they learnt it only in what is called society. Then they have their pleasures, though they are of an unexciting kind and what fast girls would call awfully slow. They have their horses and their croquet parties and their archery meetings; they have batches of new music, and a monthly box from Mudie's, and they know the value of both; and they go out to tea sometimes, and sometimes to dinner, in the neighbourhood; and enjoy the rare county balls with a zest unknown to London girls who are out every night in the week. They have their village flower-shows, which the great families patronize in a free-and-easy kind of way, and which give occupation for weeks before and subject for talk for weeks after; their school feasts, where the pet parson of the district comes out with his best anecdotes, and makes mild jokes at a long distance from Sydney Smith; their periodical missionary meetings, where they have great guns from London, and where they hear unctuous stories about the saintliness of converted cannibals, and are required to believe in the power of a change of faith to produce an ethnological miracle; they have their friends to stay with them—school-girl friends—with whom they exchange deep confidences, and go back over the old days—so old to their youth! and their brothers come down in the summer; and their brothers' friends come with them, and do a little spooning in the shrubbery. But there is more spooning done at picnics than anywhere else; and more offers are made there, under the shadow of the old ruin, or in the quiet leafy nook by the river side, than at any other gathering time of the country. And as we are all to a certain extent what we are made, these pleasures being the only ones known to them, the doves take to them quite kindly and gratefully, and enjoy themselves in a simplicity of circumstances which would give no pleasure at all to girls accustomed to more highly-spiced entertainments.

Doves know very little of evil. They are not in the way of learning it; and they do not care to learn it. The few villagers who are supposed to lead ill lives are spoken of below the breath, and carefully avoided without being critically studied

When the railway is carried down past their quiet nest, there is an immense excitement as the report goes that a knot of strange men have been seen scattering themselves over the fields with their little white flags and theodolites, their measuring lines and levels. But when the army of navvies follows after, the excitement is changed to consternation, and a general sense of evil brooding ruthlessly over them. The clergy of the district organize special services, and the scared doves keep religiously away from the place where the navvies are hutted. They are little better than the savages, the deputation tell them about once or twice a year, and create almost as much terror as an encampment of gipsies. They represent the lawless forces of the world, and the unknown evil of strong men; and the wildest story about them is not too wild to be believed. The railway altogether is a great offence to the neighbourhood, and the line is assumed to destroy the whole scenic beauty of the place. There are lamentations over the cockneys it will bring down, over the high prices it will create, the immorality it will cause. Only the sons who are out in the world, and have learnt how life goes on outside the dovecot, advocate keeping pace with the times; and a few of the more strong-minded of the doves listen to them with a timid admiration of their breadth and boldness, and think there may be two sides to the question after all. When the dashing captain and his fast wife suddenly appear in the village—as often happens in these remote districts—the doves are in a state of great moral complexity. They are scandalized at Mrs. Highflyer's costume and complexion, and think her manners odd and doubtful; her slang shocks them; and when they meet her in the lanes, trailing yards of silk behind her in the mud, talking so loudly and laughing so shrilly with that horrid-looking man in a green cutaway, they feel as fluttered as their namesakes when a hawk is hovering over the farmyard. The dashing captain, who does not use a prayer-book at church, and who stares at all the girls so rudely, and has even been seen to wink at some of the prettier cottage girls, and his handsome wife with her equivocal complexion and pronounced fashions, who makes eyes at the curate, are never heartily adopted by the local magnates, though vouched for by some far-away backer; and the doves always feel them to be strange bodies among them, and out of their rightful element somehow. If things go quietly without an explosion, well and good; but if the truth bursts to the surface in the shape of a London detective, and the Highflyers are found to be no better than they should be, the consternation and half-awed wonderment at the existence of so much effrontery and villany in their atmosphere create an impression which no time effaces. The first clash of innocence with evil is an event in the life of the innocent which nothing ever destroys.

The dovecot is rather dull in the winter, and the doves are somewhat moped; but even then they have the church to decorate, and the sentiment of Christmas to enliven them. The absent ones of the family, too, gather round the old hearth while they can; and as the great joy of the dovecot lies in the family union that is kept up, and in the family love which is so strong, the visits of the absent bring a moral summer as warm and cheering as the physical sunshine. But they do not all assemble. For many of the doves marry men whose work lies abroad; these quiet country-houses being the favourite matrimonial hunting-grounds for colonists and Anglo-Indians. So that some are always absent, whose healths are drunk in the traditional punch, with eyes that grow moist as the names are said. Doves are not disinclined to marry men who have to go abroad, for all the passionate family love common to them. Travel is a golden dream to them in their still homes; but travel properly companioned. For even the most adventurous among them are not independent, as we mean when we speak of independence in women. They are essentially home girls, family girls, doves who cannot exist at all without a dovecot, however humble. The family is everything to them, and they are utterly unfit for the solitude which so many of our self-supporting women can accept quite resignedly. Not that they are necessarily useless even as breadwinners. They could work if pushed to it; but it must be in a quiet womanly way, with the mother, the sister, the husband as the helper, with the home as the place of rest and the refuge. Their whole lines are laid in love and quietness; not necessarily in inaction, but their wishes and their aims are all centred within the home circle. If they marry, they find the love of their husband enough for them, and have no desire for other men's admiration; their babies are all the world to them, and they do not think maternity an infliction as so many of the miserably fashionable think it; they like the occupation of housekeeping, and feel pride in their fine linen and clean service, in their well-ordered table and neatly balanced accounts. They are kind to their servants, who generally come from the old home, and whose families they therefore know; but they keep up a certain dignity and tone of superiority towards them in the midst of all their kindness, which very few town-bred mistresses can keep to town-bred maids. They have always been the aristocracy in their native place; and they carry through life the ineffaceable stamp which being "the best" gives. They are essentially mild and gentle women; not queens of society even when they are pretty, because not caring for social success, and therefore not laying themselves out for it; for if they please at home that is all they care for, holding love before admiration, and the esteem of one higher than the praise of many. If a fault is to be found with them it is that they have not perhaps quite enough "salt" for the general taste, used as it is to such highly-seasoned social food; but do we really want our women to have so very much character? Do not our splendid passionate creatures lead madly wretched lives and make miserably uncomfortable homes? and are not our glorious heroines better in pictures and in fiction than seated by the nursery fire, or checking the baker's bill? No doubt the quiet home-staying doves seem tame enough when we think of the gorgeous beings made familiar to us by romance, and history, which is more romantic still; but as our daily lives run chiefly in prose, they are better fitted for things as they are; and to men who want wives and not playthings, and who care for the peace of family life and the dignity of home, they are beyond price when they can be found and secured. So that, on the whole, we can dispense with the splendid creatures of character and the magnificent queens of society sooner than with the quiet and unobtrusive doves; and though they do spoil men most monstrously, they know where to draw the line, and while petting their own at home—as women should—know how to keep strangers abroad at a distance, and to make themselves respected as only modest and gentle women are respected by men.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON TRADE-UNIONS

II.

We have already commented on the unsatisfactory conclusions of this Report. In fact it comes to no conclusion at all. The suggestions of the majority are half-hearted and uncertain. The Commissioners do not insist on their own recommendations. They have no faith in their own prescriptions. The Report of the dissentient minority, indeed, presents a striking contrast to this. There is nothing vague, timid, or hesitating about it. There is as little uncertainty in it as there would be in the judgment of an advocate who was allowed to adjudicate on his own case. The two Commissioners are not judges but advocates. No feeling of judicial reticence or judicial doubt for one moment restrains them. From the beginning to the end their language is uniformly and consistently this:—"Give greater powers to Trade-Unions; do away with all disabling and hampering statutes, assert the right of the workmen to combine; or, if you fetter it on the part of the workmen, fetter it also on the part of the masters." Then follows an expansive but cordial advocacy of the general benefits effected by the Unions, and a vehement denial of the charges so often brought against them.

In the face of Reports so opposite and conflicting, it is of course difficult for us outsiders to give a decisive opinion. And it will be equally difficult for Parliament to legislate in a sense which will be satisfactory to the two contending parties, and to the country at large. But this difficulty only enhances the duty of examining the question as thoroughly as possible. What is it that oppresses the Trade-Unions at present? What will be their condition when they are relieved from their present grievances? Will that relief be a good thing for themselves and the country? These seem to us the questions which mainly demand the attention of the Legislature. Now Trade-Unions, as such, are not unlawful. If they existed merely as clubs or benefit societies, to assist their members in sickness or old age, they would be as legal as White's or the Carlton. Their illegality consists in the unlawfulness of the purpose for which they are constituted, and this illegality is punished by the refusal of Courts of Law to assist them in compassing their illegal purposes. This principle is, it will be seen, very elastic, for it opens a very wide argument as to when a Trade-Union is engaged in seeking an illegal object. For instance, it may be contended that, if it proposes one illegal object at its inception, it is illegal. It may also be contended that, whatever illegal objects it may seek to compass by its institution, it should be aided by the law in furthering those other objects which are not illegal. And the statute law itself has recently come to the relief of the Unions in this respect. For, since the appointment of this Commission, an Act has been passed by which members of Trade-Unions guilty of pilfering the property of the Unions are made amenable to justice. The main question of the lawfulness of a Union turns on its doing, or attempting to do, something "in restraint of trade." The general law on this subject is of long standing and authority, although modified by statute. Still the principle remains, that acts in furtherance of an intention to coerce, by threats, molestation, or annoyance, either employers or employed, are illegal. This illegality affects the guilty persons in two ways. The persons who take a part in these acts are subject to penal consequences; while the societies which are organized for the purpose—though it may not be the exclusive purpose—of abetting these acts, are debarred from the privileges which lawful societies possess, of calling in the aid of the law to enforce their own rules upon their own members. This is, of course, a very incomplete statement of the law as it exists, with its limitations, exceptions, and additions, on the subject of combinations in restraint of trade. But still it is sufficient for the illustration of the question at issue between the advocates and the opponents of Trade-Unions. The former complain that even after the relief given by certain recent statutes, their societies are crippled through want of legal recognition, and that their individual members are liable to degrading punishment for acts which are done under the authority of the Unions, and, as the perpetrators honestly believe, done in legitimate defence of their own trade rights. The latter reply, that so long as the Unions continue to mix up with legitimate objects, such as the relief of distressed members, &c., other objects which are illegitimate and pernicious, so long should they be excluded from the privileges which they seek.

As we have observed, the majority of the Commissioners report in favour of a very slight change in the existing law. They would still enforce the present disqualifications against those societies whose rules and by-laws encourage interference with the free agency of individual workmen. To those the rules of which are not directed to such ends they would accord the facilities for such registration, by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, as would confer on them corporate rights and characters. And they further propose that those Unions which are established exclusively for benefit, and not for trade, purposes, should be registered as First-class Benefit Societies. The dissentient minority, on the other hand, claim that all laws against combinations either of workmen or of employers should be "broadly and unequivocally rescinded," and that all possible conditions of labour should be a matter of free agreement between the two contracting parties. Not satisfied with this, they proceed to contend for the explicit abrogation of the law under which picketing is now punished. As we have said before, the tone of the minority is far more decided than that of the majority. There can be no doubt what the former mean; and as their recommendations are, not indeed absolutely but comparatively, favoured by the Trade-Unions, by a large proportion of the operatives, and by those persons who consider themselves to represent their feelings, it is worth while to see what would be the relations of the workmen and their employers if the concessions which they ask were made.

Those relations would be somewhat of this sort. The majority of the operatives in most branches of trade would be members of some Union. They would join their Unions for a twofold object; that of being supported during illness, slack work, or disability, and that of being supported during strikes. The money which they contributed towards them would go into one common fund, which would be burdened with both these charges, and, in some few cases, with the additional charge of superannuation. About one "intelligent operative" in a hundred would ever think of calculating for himself the ability of the Union to bear these burdens; and if an actuary told him that his society could not possibly stand the double strain for two years together, and that practically, in relation to its published promises, it was already insolvent, he would receive the warning with incredulity or indifference. He and his fellows would enter it for the purpose of enabling themselves to combine against the masters. Any form and any object of combination would be legal. They might combine in sections against individual masters, or they might combine in the aggregate against the whole body of employers. They might combine to raise wages, and to shorten time; to get additional holidays, to extort fines from the employers under the name of "treats," "feasts," "gatherings," "excursions;" to oust from employment unpopular foremen, obnoxious apprentices, workmen from particular districts, or men under five-foot six. Not only would they be able to oust them, but they would be able to prevent them from getting employment elsewhere. Dreading no penal law but that which punished actual assaults, they could resort with impunity to the thousand arts of worrying and annoyance which are now punishable as acts of "molestation." No man who was in the Union but would be liable to be made an instrument of persecution; no one out of the Union but would be liable to become its victim. Is it too much to say that such a state of things would be, if not literally fatal, at least desperately prejudicial, to the trade of the country? The working-men—the "intelligent working-men," whom every cowardly idiot that can write fulsome English has been bespattering with mawkish praise for the last ten years—would be the masters of the industry of the country. And what masters! Let any man who sees a body of them hanging about the premises of an obnoxious employer during a strike, and waylaying fellow-workmen who refuse to submit to their dictation, judge what they would become when armed en masse with such powers as Mr. Harrison would give them. But without troubling himself to observe and judge by inspection, a man may arrive at a pretty accurate estimation of their contingent behaviour by reading the evidence which was elicited by this very Commission. It is probable enough that the printers and engineers would, under all conditions, observe a moderation equal to that with which their advocates already credit them. But of the other and less educated trades—carpenters, masons, bricklayers, brickmakers, painters, plasterers, and a score of others—the existing evidence leaves no room to doubt that the gift of additional legal powers would only arm them with additional powers of extortion. Given societies of men, imperfectly educated, without the opportunity or the desire of reflection—with a greed proportioned to their ignorance, and a blind self-confidence proportioned to their greed—given, too, a legal recognition, and the power both of controlling their own members and of bullying those who were not their members, how is it possible that they should not crush the employers in the unequal conflict? It is useless to say, as the author of the third Report says, that the days of violence have passed away, while the outrages of Sheffield and Manchester live in the recollection of us all. The spirit which dictated those outrages animates many of the societies of the least skilled artificers. The present state of the law holds it in some restraint. The changes which Messrs. Harrison and Hughes propose would remove all check. The tyranny which is exercised by the Manchester and Bradford bricklayers and masons over their employers would not only continue, but continue in an enhanced degree. The Unions, recognised by law, enjoying legal authority over their members, and exempt from any penalties for picketing, would be not only terrible to the employing class, but formidable to the non-Unionist class, which they would finally crush or absorb.

The struggle would soon become desperate between the employers and the labourers. The labourers' object would be to appropriate the largest share of the employers' capital among themselves—in short, to enjoy the advantages without incurring the risks of partnership. This is indeed what their spokesmen distinctly avow now, and what, in fact, the Preston operatives have been contending for. But what would Capital do in this phase of the contest—Capital, which is the most timid and sensitive of industrial agencies? Why, Capital would decline the contest. We do not mean that every great productive organization would be immediately closed; but there would be a cessation of that enterprise which initiates new undertakings. The men with small or borrowed capital who were already at the head of great establishments, would abandon them, and those with small capital, who were intending to begin an industrial career, would renounce their intention. Nothing shows more clearly the ignorance or the thoughtlessness of the operative classes than their persistent assertion that all employers are wealthy, whereas many employers have but little money, and that money borrowed. These are the people whose talent and energy have built up many of the greatest industries in England. But their influence and exertions would be lost, if operative Unions were allowed to dictate to them the proportion of profits which they were to receive, and of wages which they were to pay. The larger and wealthier capitalists would have the alternative of two courses. They would either transfer their operations to Continental cities, or they would agree to the terms proposed, and reimburse themselves by increased prices. In either case the ultimate sufferers would be the consuming public, thus compelled to pay more dearly for the cost of production. The double loss sustained by the country would be enhanced dearness of price to the home consumers, and diminished exportation to foreign countries. The countervailing benefit would be a great but temporary increase in the wages and luxuries (mainly beer and tobacco) of English artisans.

In the face of this prospect, we confess that we regard with favour the proposal which the Commissioners have only hinted at; namely, the legalization and encouragement of those Unions which are exclusively Benefit Societies, and the discouragement of those which are intended to support "strikes." While we resent and resist the insolent attempt of the operatives to appropriate an undue share of that capital which is the only source of wages, we heartily sympathize with every effort to husband the resources of the thrifty workman, and shield him from the dishonest artifices of rotten and pretentious associations. And we fear, moreover, both the social and economical consequences of allowing guilds of workmen to re-establish generally in favour of their own class the vices of an obsolete Protectionism, after they have undermined and destroyed all that gave support to the industry, independence, and ambition of the individual workman.

LORD STANLEY AND THE GLASGOW STUDENTS.

IT would be hard to conceive two human compositions more utterly opposite to each other in every possible way than Lord Stanley's Rectorial Address at Glasgow and Mr. Froude's Rectorial Address at Saint Andrew's. Mr. Froude went to Saint Andrew's to flatter his hearers, to revile institutions which he wilfully misunderstood, and to win a cheer for himself. Lord Stanley at Glasgow seems to have been equally successful in winning a cheer, but he won it in a more honourable way. That is to say, Lord Stanley behaved with proper self-respect and with proper respect to his hearers; Mr. Froude broke down in both ways. We can believe that Mr. Froude's address was the more taking, because it is always very taking to hear oneself praised and one's rival cried down. But it is no high compliment to one's hearers to set this kind of entertainment before them. Mr. Froude appealed to the worst feelings of his temporary academical subjects at Saint Andrew's. Lord Stanley appealed to the best feelings of his temporary academical subjects at Glasgow. Instead of abuse and misrepresentation of other people, Lord Stanley gave the Glasgow students sound and practical good advice for themselves. And the Glasgow students seem to have thoroughly appreciated this higher kind of diet. Nor do we think so ill of the Saint Andrew's students as to believe that they would not have appreciated it also, if they had had the good luck to have it set before them.

The Times does not give us Lord Stanley's speech in full. He began, we are told, with "a graceful reference to his distinguished predecessors in the Rectorial chair." The "reference" was followed by an "allusion," which the Times seemingly did not look upon as "graceful"—an "allusion to the present prosperous condition of Glasgow University." This seems an odd subject for an "allusion"; one would have thought that it was the subject of all others on which a new Lord Rector would speak out plainly and openly. It would be easy to do so without in any way pandering to local vanity. But for Lord Stanley indirectly to allude to such a subject, while talking about something else, would show a remarkable indifference to the institution of which he is made for a short time the chief. It would be something like the indifference to his own life shown by the American who, when stabbed by a bowie-knife, "fell down, remarking that he was a dead man." But we do not believe that Lord Stanley made any allusion at all; we have no doubt that he spoke straightforwardly about the prosperous state of things at Glasgow, and we should greatly like to know what he said. At any rate, he went on to give the Glasgow students a series of counsels of perfection which, if they are duly carried out, will do a great deal to make the prosperity of Glasgow University abiding. Lord Stanley is, throughout his speech, not brilliant, hardly powerful, but everywhere acute, observant, and sensible. He sends up no squibs and crackers like Mr. Froude, but all his suggestions are not only worth listening to, but worth carrying out in practice. Once only does he make the least contrast between the English and Scotch University systems, and then he makes it in a way to which no reasonable Oxford or Cambridge man can object. It is undoubtedly true that the Scotch Universities do give far greater advantages to poor students than Oxford and Cambridge. And now that the fever of reform has passed away, now that it is again lawful to hint that non-resident fellowships have a tendency to become unprofitable sinecures, it may perhaps also be lawful to hint that this difference between Oxford and Glasgow is partly owing to the conversion of the endowments which were meant to support poor students into mere prizes for those who do not want them. No one can blame Lord Stanley for making this comparison in the way in which he has made it. But then his way of making it is very different from Mr. Froude's way. Mr. Froude deals with the shortcomings of his academical parent in the spirit of Ham; Lord Stanley deals with them in the spirit of Shem and Japheth. Mr. Froude is so delighted with bringing accusations that it would almost seem to be all one to him whether his accusations are true or false; he talks as if he would be sorry if Oxford and Cambridge were reformed, because then he would lose the pleasure of abusing them. Lord Stanley at once strengthens himself and comforts himself by his belief that a large amount of opinion at Oxford and Cambridge is on his side. Through the greater part of the speech which follows we shall have little to do but to go through what Lord Stanley says, and to set our seal to each stage of it. There is something worthy of special attention, as coming from one in Lord Stanley's position, in what he says as to the duty of all men—those who have no need to work for their bread as well as those who have—to find themselves some real work, some real and useful occupation of their time, of some kind or other. On the whole we do not think that we have much to complain of in this way in our men of rank and fortune; there are doubtless good, bad, and indifferent among them, but, considering their special temptations, the number of the good seems really as great as we have any right to look for. Lord Stanley says, with great truth, that there are some men who seem born mainly for action, others who seem born mainly for thought; that there is room for both classes in the world, and that each temperament is commonly the better for a certain admixture of the other. This saying is fully borne out by the long line of English statesmen who have been distinguished in other ways besides that of statesmanship. Lord Stanley speaks with equal truth of the struggle which is needed in the first instance to form habits of real work, and the force which those habits acquire when really formed, and the actual pain which unemployed time gives to the man who has formed them. He then goes on to speak of the cry of over-work, which he truly says is "bad enough," but that "it is probably a cause of less suffering in the aggregate than the consciousness of faculties unused and energies that can find no vent." No doubt there is such a thing as over-work, but no doubt also, as Lord Stanley says, there is "a good deal of prejudice and misinformation on the subject." He is probably right when he adds that cases of men crushed in youth by excessive mental strain are nine times out of ten the result of simple mismanagement. As for over-work, one would think that no class of people were more likely to be over-worked than lawyers in great practice who are also members of Parliament. Yet certainly no class of people seem to live to so great an age and to keep their wits so unimpaired to the end as the men who have gone through this double strain on their powers.

And now we come to the part of Lord Stanley's speech which perhaps concerns us most nearly. There must be many people at other places, if not among the Glasgow students, who ought to writhe, if they are still capable of writhing, at Lord Stanley's enforcement of the absolute necessity for every purpose, whether of action or speculation, of a perfectly accurate habit of thought and expression. This, Lord Stanley truly says, is "something which is almost entirely within our own power to acquire, and which nature unassisted never yet gave to any man"; and he adds, with equal truth and perhaps with a certain bitterness, "this is, as far as I can see, one of the very rarest acquirements." How rare it is we see daily in the mass of inaccurate statements which are given to the world in speaking and writing, and in the way in which most people have come to look on accuracy of thought and expression as a matter of no consequence whatever. A man who takes care to be accurate himself is commonly called a pedant for his pains; a man who hates inaccuracy and censures it in others is not only called a pedant, but is conveniently supposed to have some sinister motive for his censure. The advocates of inaccuracy, and it is a class neither small nor without influence, will do well to ponder what Lord Stanley says about "that habit of accurate thought and expression" which it is "almost entirely within our own power to acquire." He then goes on:—

> For it implies a good deal—carefulness, close attention to details, a certain power of memory, and the habit of distinguishing between things which are alike, but not identical. I lay stress on this because it seems to me the characteristically distinguishing mark of good and faulty teaching, of real and unreal learning. The best thing is to know your subject thoroughly, the next best to know nothing about it, and to be aware that you do know nothing; the worst is to know a little, and to know that vaguely and confusedly.

Lord Stanley then speaks of the merits and defects of competitive examinations. Whether they do really act, as he thinks, as an effectual check on the imposture of half-knowledge, we may be allowed to doubt, but nothing can be better than his remarks on the imposture of half-knowledge itself:—

> What a man can write out clearly, correctly, and briefly, without book or reference of any kind, that he undoubtedly knows, whatever else he may be ignorant of. For knowledge that falls short of that—knowledge that is vague, hazy, indistinct, uncertain—I for one profess no respect at all. And I believe that there never was a time or country where the influences of careful training were in that respect more needed. Men live in haste, write in haste—I was going to say think in haste, only that perhaps the word thinking is hardly applicable to that large number who, for the most part, purchase their daily allowance of thought ready made. You find ten times more people now than ever before who can string together words with facility, and with a general idea of their meaning, and who are ready with a theory of some kind about most matters. All that is very well as far as it goes; but it is one thing to be able to do this, and quite another to know how to use words as they should be used, or really to have thought out the subject which you discuss.

We now come to the only point on which we are inclined to have any battle with Lord Stanley, and on that point we have only half a battle. What he says on "classical training" is comforting to read after the nonsense of Mr. Froude. Lord Stanley stands up for the old classical training, not as the only possible training, but as a training which has many distinct merits of its own. Instead of sneering, like Mr. Froude, at "old Greek and Latin," he warns his readers against "the folly of treating classical study as a thing antiquated and useless." Here comes our only point of difference, or more truly the only point in which we look on Lord Stanley's argument as defective. Lord Stanley seems to have no more notion than Mr. Lowe or Mr. Froude of the real position of the Greek and Latin languages and of the Greek and Roman history. He still speaks of classical training as a distinct thing, as if Greece and Rome, and the languages of Greece and Rome, stood wholly by themselves, and had no bearing on the languages and history of any other times or nations. We have often made the remark, and we have no doubt that we shall often have to make it again, that the great discoveries of comparative philology in the nineteenth century ought to cause as great a revolution in our system of education as the revival of Greek letters caused in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The truth to be insisted on is that there can be no such thing as purely "classical training," no such thing as purely "modern training," or that, if there is, both modes of training must be utterly defective and worthless. No lover of sound knowledge will, if he can help it, talk about "the classics," any more than he will talk about "the Saxons." What people need is to understand that the study of language is one, that the study of history is one, that man, at any rate Aryan man, is essentially the same always and everywhere, that every part of his history has a bearing upon every other part. Glasgow students, and all other students, should be taught that rightly to study the history of Greece and rightly to study the history of Britain are exercises of exactly the same faculties, and that either process is imperfect without the other. They should be taught that to learn Greek and to learn German are exactly the same process, and that Greek without German or German without Greek loses half its value. People who, like Lord Stanley, allow any distinction to be drawn between "classical" and "modern" studies, are really giving up the only ground on which "classical" studies can be rightly defended. The "folly and pedantry" of which Lord Stanley complains is simply the folly and pedantry of talking as if Greeks and Romans were not really men, as if they and their languages and everything to do with them were something by itself, something which had no bearing upon human affairs. Lord Stanley does not seem to realize, any more than Mr. Lowe and Mr. Froude, that the educational evangel to be preached for some time to come must be mainly the preaching of Grimm's Law.

Another passage, if it is rightly reported, seems to show that Lord Stanley does not thoroughly take in the difference in position between primary and secondary authorities. He is made to say:—

> Even those who feel most thoroughly the incomparably wider range of modern thought will seldom deny that in precision, in conciseness, in dignity of style, and in verbal felicity, the great writers of ancient times have scarcely been equalled. It is suggestive to think how, under the influence of the mercantile principle, making books to be paid for in proportion not to their merits, but to their length, and of the lifelong hurry which prevents us from studying condensation, such narratives as those of Cæsar and Tacitus would in modern hands have swelled into the dimensions of a modern historical compilation, with the certain result that they would have occupied in men's memories no more enduring place than this last.

We doubt about the accuracy of the reporting here, mainly because of the word "compilation." "Compilation" is a favourite penny-a-liner's word, probably because penny-a-liners do not realize any form of writing except compilation. It is not at all unlikely that the reporters have substituted "compilation" for some other word used by Lord Stanley. He can hardly have meant to contrast Cæsar and Tacitus with Goldsmith and Mrs. Markham. Perhaps he said "composition," and meant to take in all modern historical writings. To give any force at all to the contrast, he must have meant to contrast Cæsar and Tacitus with modern historical writers of some real position. But Lord Stanley forgets the difference between Cæsar narrating his own exploits, or even Tacitus the history of a not far distant gene[illegible], and a modern painfully working out the history of events some cen[illegible] old by the process of sifting innumerable statements made at or soon after the time. A modern historian makes his work longer, not because he is paid according to its length—for he is not paid according to its length, sometimes he is not paid at all—but because both he himself and his readers have a keener historical sense than the contemporaries of Cæsar and Tacitus, because they feel far more strongly the necessity of producing and testing the evidence for every statement that is made. This is true even of those who write of contemporary events. Mr. Kinglake could no doubt make his history shorter. But he could not make it so short as Cæsar made his. For Cæsar said just what he pleased; if anybody told another story, he took no notice of it; while Mr. Kinglake has to harmonise as many different statements, and to point out as many prevalent errors, as if he were writing of things which happened a thousand years back. This is equally true of "classical" and of mediæval authorities. As the Times says in its lofty condescension, "we are inclined, from this point of view, to think that injustice is often done to those so-called 'dark ages.'" Lambert of Hersfeld may not be the equal of Cæsar or Tacitus, though he comes a great deal nearer to them than Lord Stanley or the Times is likely to imagine. But he who now writes the history of the times for which either Cæsar or Lambert is an original authority must make a longer story of it than Cæsar and Lambert did, simply because he stands in a wholly different position from Cæsar and Lambert. And after all, why stop at Cæsar and Tacitus? We trust that the names of Thucydides and Polybius would not have been wholly unknown in the ears of Glasgow students. And the two great Greek historians themselves illustrate our position in different ways. Thucydides writes down what he saw or heard from eye-witnesses. Polybius, writing of events before his own day, has constantly to stop in order to comment on and to refute the statements of other writers.

Lord Stanley thus seems to have still to learn the true position of that "classical" training which he defends by a sort of happy instinct. But however defective his address may be in this respect, nothing can surpass the wise and practical character of the advice which he gives his hearers, and it is pleasant to have the antidote coming so soon after the bane.

THE CLERGY OF A DISENDOWED CHURCH

"UPON the whole," says De Tocqueville, reviewing the condition of the Gallican Church in 1789, "I question if there ever existed in the world a clergy more remarkable than the Catholic clergy of France at the moment when it was overtaken by the Revolution—a clergy more enlightened, more national, less circumscribed within the bounds of private duty and more alive to public obligations. . . . They had in truth no defects but those inherent in all corporate bodies, whether political or religious, when they are strongly constituted and knit together; such as a tendency to aggression, a certain intolerance of disposition, and an instinctive, sometimes a blind, attachment to the particular rights of their order." This illustrious writer also points out that the corrective of the celibacy of the French clergy was their permanent endowment and participation in landed property. The estates of the clergy kept up a national and independent spirit in the order, and, without endowments and without the family tie the clergyman must, from the nature of the case, be an alien in the midst of a civil community scarcely any of whose social interests can directly affect him. De Tocqueville's conclusion is, that to convert clerical incomes into mere salaries is only to promote the interests of the Papacy, and to renounce an important element in the general political freedom of a nation. This thoughtful language is worth the consideration of those well-meaning, but fanatical, persons who view with equanimity, if they are not disposed to hail with positive satisfaction, the prospect of exchanging the established clergy of the Church of England for a more religious, as they say, and more earnest, body of disestablished and disendowed ministers of religion. What they want is a beatified ideal—a priesthood entirely devoted to spiritual things and the sublime vocation to which they are ordained—a Church freed from the chains and shackles of human institutions and secular authority—owning no supremacy but that of the great Head of the Church—with entire freedom to develop its own doctrine and to settle its own discipline—a free and voluntary society, doing its own work in its own way, relieved from the perils of false brethren, and untrammelled by the cowardice of weak brethren; all holiness, all purity, all peace, all love. It is of course cold work to contrast facts with theories, and the world we live in with the fairy realms of fancy and the ideal; but, to use De Tocqueville's words, we question whether there ever existed in the world a clergy more remarkable than the clergy of this Church of England which now is. Whether or not they come up to this exalted standard, may be very fairly questioned: defects, faults, weaknesses they undoubtedly have. Many of the clergy are narrow-minded, many of them weak, many of them, and very naturally, sacerdotally inclined; some violent, some foolish. But, as regards the institution, it is to the mere student in politics and social matters a very wonderful one. The English clergy are a corporate body, incorporated for the very highest social ends; they are not only the ministers of religious worship and the channels of public instruction, but they are for the most part the directors of youth and education, the guardians and standards of public morality. And at the same time, they are citizens, and citizens, too, freely mixing with, and therefore cementing together, all grades of society, all varieties of intelligence and education and rank. They have that one advantage which the Gallican clergy had not. A married clergy represents and values the family as well as the State. They have, by the fact [illegible]

[illegible] their order is kept [illegible] pensating balance of family ties and their rights as citizens. The English clergy, such as it is, is the gradual growth of modern society. The institution has, by slow degrees, and unconsciously, like all true growths, worked itself out of all sorts of circumstances, and by all sorts of helps. Like the English Constitution, it has come to be by being. The Church of England clergy do not fulfil any abstract conception; perhaps do not answer to an ideal clergy; but they are. Without the old ante-Tudor Church, without the Reformation period, without the beef and carrot-eating epoch of the chaplains at the second table which Macaulay tells us about, nay, without the lazy afternoon of the Georgian days, the existing institution could not have come to be; and it is idle to say that, without the Establishment, and all the good and evil of establishment, a clergy such as that which now is were impossible. They have been a factor of our present civilization just as much as they are the creature of historical England and all that this great and complex idea comprises. Again to strike our keynote, this is a most remarkable clergy—remarkable both for its prominent excellences and perhaps for its palpable shortcomings.

What should we get in exchange for this remarkable clergy under disestablishment and disendowment? A set of men who would be very likely to exhibit more prominently the externals of religious zeal, and who would, quite conceivably, give themselves up more unreservedly to spiritual things. But they must, even without adopting the rule of clerical celibacy, be much more a caste than the present institution of an established clergy is. Their social position would be distinctly marked and fenced off. Their business would be religion, and nothing but religion. They would be regarded, and would regard themselves, as a peculiar order, with no country but the Church, with no social obligations but to their own spiritual vocation. It is possible —but we are not going to argue this point, though we are by no means prepared to concede it—that religion and the faith would gain by superseding the semi-secular clergy of the day by this more professional type of priest. We are only concerned with the fact that a disestablished and disendowed clergy would be altogether, except in church, an institution not only different from, but opposed in conception to, an Established Church. It is simply ridiculous to suppose that, with all the existing clerical conditions changed we should have the same raw material to work with. As it is, there are clergy and there are clergy. We have the intellectual, intelligent, highly-educated clergyman, consorting with nobles as his equals, which they are often by birth, sometimes by fortune, always by education; the solid, matter of fact, temperate country parson, of Mackworth Praed's type; the forward, pushing town parson, to whom popularity and pew-rents are powers; and the vulgar, ignorant fanatic, who occasionally culminates in an Irish bishop. These varieties we have, and they have their value, their good as well as their evil; but there would be few varieties in the disestablished Anglican parson of the future. For a time something of the same character would survive; as Rome was not built, so Rome did not perish, in a day. But gradually, or rather very rapidly, not only would the clerical level sink, but the clerical character would be entirely changed. In the great towns we should have active clever men of the Ward Beecher type, men making great incomes, and very much of despots over their thriving and money-making flocks. And we should have the petted shepherds of the sectarian petite église, the spiritual directors and tyrants of the women, and of the husbands who think that religion is a very proper employment for females and feminine-minded men. And we should have, both among High Churchmen and Low Churchmen, the supple obedient nominee who is patronized and instructed and interfered with and bullied by the great man of the congregation who finds the money, and keeps a church and parson as an easy means of ministering to his own state and importance and reflecting his vulgar munificence. But the independence, the freedom, the pure liberal spirit of the English clergy would be gone. As to the country parishes, to suppose that their church administration would rise much higher than it does under the present voluntaryism of Dissent is futile to argue.

This aspect of the matter, however, has been so often argued that we prefer to dwell on another consideration. It will be said that all we are arguing for may be summed up in the single word that the clergy ought to be gentlemen. We are not going to be driven into saying what ought to be on this or that theory; but we do say that it is a remarkable thing—again to harp on De Tocqueville's string—and more than this, that it is a very excellent thing, that for the most part we have in the English Church gentlemen for clergymen. The old Gallican Church had gentlemen priests; the pleasant memories of the old Abbés, and in Ireland of the St. Omer and Douay priests, recall the fact. Ultramontanism and disendowment have made the French clergy what they are; and the same may be said of the Belgian clergy, and we believe of all the clergy of the Western obedience except Austria. And there may be, or rather there is sure to be, an Ultramontanism which has nothing to do with Rome. An unendowed and free Church as naturally develops that spirit—which among Romanists takes the form of Ultramontanism—as stagnant water is favourable to the growth of duckweed. We shall under disendowment escape neither the stern, cold, self-annihilation of the Jesuit spirit, nor the petty pedantry of the Jansenist. The future clergy will reflect, not the spirit of Oxford and Cambridge, but the narrow-mindedness of the diocesan seminary. And freedom from State control will very soon settle down into the irresponsible authority of the Bishops. The King Log of the Privy Council would be replaced by such King Storks as those to whom the French curés of the disendowed Church are subject. The lower clergy will lose all those guarantees against episcopal tyranny which they now possess, while the Bishops themselves will have no choice but to be always meddling, always arbitrary, and always despotic. Public life and national interests will be a blank to the clergy of the future. In such a system, who will be an office-bearer? The reply will be twofold. Some will say:—Even admitting these consequences, they are not so very terrible. We shall, to be sure, lose the present type of clergy, but it will be superseded by a higher, a more religious, more devoted, more consistent, less secularized type. The Apostles were not gentlemen, and they had no University degrees. To which nonsense we may make the retort that, had the Gospel taken its beginnings in England and the nineteenth century, it is assuming a good deal to say that its authorities and teachers must, from the necessity of the case, have been publicans and fishermen. The other answer is to deny our forecast, and to urge that a disendowed and disestablished clergy will be made up of precisely the same materials as the present English clerical body is composed of. If anybody really believes this—there are plenty who say it and who do not believe it—we decline to pursue the dispute with them. They and we take such different views of human nature, calculate upon the existence of such very different human motives, read so differently the state of things in which they are, that we have no common ground on which to argue. We have tried to show that Establishment, with all that belongs to it, its good and evil, its worldliness and political excellences, has made the English clergy what they are; and then we are asked to believe that, every one of these efficient causes ceasing, precisely the same results will follow from precisely the opposite system and principles.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY.

IN order to judge of the necessity for an alteration of the law regarding the property of married women, it will be useful to ascertain what the law now is, and how it works. The old Common Law, as administered in the Courts which are guided by its rules, has been innovated upon by Courts of Equity, which have had respect in their decisions to the circumstances and requirements of modern life. The advocates of the Bill now before the House of Commons contend that the exceptions engrafted upon the Common Law by Equity ought to become the rule. But, if the existing system works well in practice, it ought not to be altered merely for the sake of theoretical perfection. It was said last year in the House of Commons that this measure is not desired by five per cent. of the women of England, and it certainly is not desired by anything like five per cent. of the men. But it has been taken up by a few busy people, and there seems to be no hope of their being prevailed upon to lay it down. The Bill was got rid of last Session by referring it to a Select Committee; and we are happy to find that that Committee left its work incomplete, so that the Bill may be got rid of for the present Session in the same way. We were told a year ago that the Bill required extensive amendments, and would receive them in Committee, but here it is again, in the very words which we have read before. Let it, therefore, be sent to another Committee; and when it emerges, the House of Commons, and perhaps the House of Lords also, will be called upon seriously to consider whether the busybodies are to have their uncontrolled way.

The only persons on whose behalf it can seriously be pretended that a change of law is necessary are the wives of working-men immoderately addicted to beer; and it would be monstrous to alter a state of law which is generally beneficial for the sake of a portion of one class of the community. The Committee which sat last year would have been usefully employed in framing some clauses of a Bill to give protection to the earnings of the wives of spendthrift husbands. But when it is proposed to offer this protection, the answer is that the feelings of the wives would be hurt by making application for it. The law must give protection without their asking for it, and therefore the law must give it also to many other women who do not ask for it, and do not want it. There is absolutely no evidence of the desirableness of the change as regards the middle and upper classes, and it really is going rather too far to propose to make a sweeping innovation for the supposed benefit of the lower class. We are sometimes threatened with the coming of a time when the poor will divide among them the property of the rich. But until that times does come the rich may surely be allowed to enjoy their property in their own way. The examples which are produced of the hardship of the existing law come usually from the observation of clergymen or ladies who visit among the poor. Thus an East-end incumbent states that "he had to help a poor woman through her confinement." Of course he means that he lent her money, and not that he helped her more immediately. She had saved from her earnings a little money to meet this emergency; and her husband, who was a drunkard, beat her, in her weak condition, in a most brutal manner until she delivered up her money. The simple-minded clergyman adds, that he does not think the husband would have behaved thus if he had not known that the money was legally his own. He gets drunk and beats his wife when she is near confinement, and yet he will be certain to respect any right which the law bestows upon her. Even if we could adopt this opinion we should still say that the law of property is made for men and women in general, and not for husbands who beat their wives to extract from them the money which they have saved to buy baby-linen. The authors of this Bill resemble another set of busybodies who want to close public-houses against sober people in order to prevent drunkenness. As soon as the wife becomes legally entitled to her savings the husband will abstain from interference with them; or if he does not, the wife, under the Bill, may apply to a judge of a County Court to make such order as he may think fit. The happy prospect is offered to these judges of being called upon to decide questions which may arise between husband and wife "as to the title to or possession of personal property." We cannot help thinking that it ought to be provided in the Bill that all County Court judges should be married, and that their wives should sit with them when they exercise this jurisdiction. The duties of these judges are likely to be increased in another way by this Bill; for when married women become capable of contracting, they will be liable to be sued upon their contracts, and the County Court judges, with or without power of imprisonment, will be expected to compel them to pay their debts. But then the question will arise, what are their debts? At present, if the wife orders provisions for her household, or clothing for her children, she renders her husband, generally speaking, liable to pay for them. The law considers her as her husband's agent in giving orders. But if she is agent, she cannot be at the same time principal; and therefore we suppose that, under the Bill, she will in general make her husband liable for the orders she may give, and escape liability herself. Considerable litigation may probably arise upon the question whether a wife contracted as agent or as principal, and married women will frequently be called upon to appear on examination and cross-examination in Courts of Law. In our view, this would be a great evil, but perhaps, in the view of the philosophers, it would be a great good.

It may be assumed that the Committee of last Session said all that could be said in favour of this Bill, but on looking at their Report we find that they do not say much. They describe correctly the "judicial legislation" of Courts of Equity, which has produced a system by which persons able to afford the expense of a settlement avoid the consequences of the Common Law, and which creates between husband and wife a relation different from that which the Common Law contemplated. It would be a reasonable criticism upon this system to remark that the law ought, by its own force, to do that which can only be done by settlement. But after the law has been altered, as this Bill would alter it, settlements will still be necessary. Under the present law, the husband can spend the wife's money if there is no settlement. Under the proposed law the wife herself could spend it. In either case it is equally likely to be spent, and prudent parents who arrange marriages for their daughters would desire to guard equally against both contingencies. The evidence taken by the Committee of the operation of the proposed law in Vermont and other States of America is inconclusive. Whatever may happen there, we know quite well what would happen here. English wives would part with their property at the solicitation of their husbands, whether that solicitation took the form described by the simple-minded clergyman already mentioned or some other form. And what the husbands left unconsumed would be devoured by the sons. Indeed, the Bill contemplates that marriage-settlements would still be made, and there can be no question that they would. But besides a description of the operation of the new law in the Northern United States, we find among the literature of this subject a description of the operation of the old law in the South. It appears that, now that the slaves have become free, they can contract legal marriages, and the consequence of these marriages, in some or all of the Southern States, are the same as under existing English law. The black husbands are entitled to live upon their wives' earnings, and for the most part they choose to do so; and it is said that, to remedy this evil, the law which has been adopted in some of the Northern States ought to be adopted also in the South. If we suppose this change to be made for the imagined benefit of the blacks, without regard to the social habits and feelings of the whites, we shall get some notion of the reasonableness of what the authors of this Bill desire to do in England. They complain that the means of recovering debts against the separate estate of a married woman through the process of a Court of Equity under the existing law are expensive and unsatisfactory; and they would like wives to be summoned into Courts of Law with the same facility as husbands. We believe that the great majority of Englishmen would dislike such a state of things excessively. The few women, and the very few men, who would desire it, had better depart from this obstinate old country, and found somewhere a colony which shall be an example to the world. The colonists can establish among themselves female suffrage, and married women's property, and marrying with a deceased wife's sister, and any other legislative inventions which are treated with neglect at home; and they can have for their governor Mr. Mill, or some other member of the sect which takes a philosophical, rather than a practical, view of the relations of the sexes. The Committee say further that among persons of small means, marriage settlements are impossible on account of their expense, and of the difficulty of procuring trustees. It would not be difficult to devise means of facilitating settlements, but that is, we suppose, a work too small and humble for these magnificent projectors. They have really nothing else to say in support of their proposal as regards the upper and middle classes, and they must necessarily rely upon the benefit which they suppose it will confer upon the classes in which wives earn wages. "Very numerous cases of hardship occur. It is not uncommon for husbands to take their wives' earnings, to spend them in drinking or dissipation." The law at present gives protection for the wife's earnings only in the case where the husband has deserted her. It has been proposed to extend these orders to the cases of women whose husbands are intemperate, reckless, idle, or cruel; but this proposal is too sensible and moderate to please the busybodies. They are like Naaman the Syrian, who would have done some great thing at the bidding of the prophet, but was disappointed at being told only to wash and be clean. "Few women, while continuing to live with their husbands, would come forward to claim in public a protection which would involve giving publicity to their domestic grievances." Begging pardon of the Committee for using so plain a word, we say that this is fudge. A woman whose husband comes home drunk and beats her is unfortunately incapable of keeping her domestic grievances from publicity. Her unhappy condition is perfectly well known to her neighbours in the court or street where she lives; and, besides, it would be quite possible to provide that applications for protection orders might be made to magistrates privately. We observe that, if husband and wife differ under the new law, the unhappy County Court judge who has to decide between them may be called upon to admit them to his private room. Of course it will be his duty to hear the wives in person and at full length, and he will not easily be able to exclude dissertations upon the beauty and intelligence of "baby" as irrelevant. We can only say that, if this clause of the Bill is to stand, there ought to be tacked to it a provision that for the purposes of County Court business the day shall consist of forty-eight hours.

VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS AND THEIR CRITICS.

IT is hard to say whether the Volunteers have suffered most from the indiscriminate praise of admirers who are really unconscious enemies, or from the unfair criticism of enemies who affect to be judicious friends. The first of these evils has long since disappeared, and wholesale censure is the present diet of our citizen troops. Mr. Cardwell gave the cue when he pronounced that the one thing to be dreaded was too great an increase of the Volunteer army; and ever since that unlucky dictum the Times has, with an excess of zeal, thrown itself into the task of disparaging the Volunteers. It has put on two slashing military writers to cut them up, root and branch, and they have done their work with a will. Perhaps in saying this we are guilty of exaggeration; for, after all, Hippophylax and the Military Critic must surely be one and the same person. Indeed it is difficult to believe that two officers should be found in the army so alike in the style of their criticism and the unfairness of their comments as the authors of the letters of Hippophylax and of the military criticism on the Dover Review.

It is so easy to run down any large organization like the Volunteers. The method is obvious. Pick out a fault committed by an individual—if he is a Volunteer so much the better, but if not, a General Officer straight from Aldershot, or a Dover rough will do if only he happens to have been present in the same field with the Volunteers. Having dwelt on the enormity of the error, slide easily in the next paragraph from the singular to the plural, and wind up by attributing the fault to the whole body of Volunteers as their habitual practice. Having done this, sigh over their want of discipline and training, and tell them that if they don't speedily improve they ought to be abolished altogether, or at least compelled in future to pay the whole instead of half of their expenses. Is this an overcoloured picture of the military criticism of the Times? We will try it by the only fair test. We will take every specific complaint made in the two letters of the Military Critic, and examine how far they depart from the tone which we have attributed to this slashing writer. And as we mean to be as scrupulously fair to Hippophylax or his double as he is conspicuously unfair to the Volunteers, we will admit that the Volunteers have not, and cannot have in time of peace, the same exact and rigid discipline which prevails in the army. When called out and put under martial law this last finish will be readily acquired; but in the meantime it should be remembered that Volunteer commanders have only one punishment—dismissal—by which to control the occasional black sheep, who are to be found quite as numerous and quite as black in the Line as in the Volunteer army. You cannot have a force of 170,000 men without a bad subject among them. The British army is not such a force, but no one condemns the whole British army because occasional breaches of discipline of an aggravated kind are committed by ill-conditioned privates or foolish officers. Substantial discipline in the great body of the force, and prompt expulsion for every serious offence, are what we have a right to expect from the Volunteers; and if this standard has not been absolutely attained, we will go as far as any Military Critic in enforcing the obligation. But certainly if there are any grounds for suggesting that the Volunteers, as a rule, are wanting in discipline, they are not to be found in the letters of the Military Critic of the Times.

Taking his accusations in the order in which he preferred them, we find, first, that seven 18-pounders had to be got up a steep serpentine road to the heights, and that a traction engine in charge of its own engineers was sent to do the work. In consequence of unscientific coupling there was some difficulty in making the long and heavy train work smoothly round the bends of the road, and the Volunteer officer, not knowing or pretending to know much about the management of traction engines, very judiciously availed himself of the assistance of a bystander who understood this peculiar sort of work. The result was that the guns arrived at their station in due time, but the Military Critic thinks it a great disgrace to the whole body of Volunteers that a Volunteer Artillery officer, who had probably never seen a traction engine before, was not an adept in managing a train of guns in tow of such a monster. Probably, if an accident had happened on the railway from the bad coupling of the carriages, the Military Critic would have laid the blame on the Volunteers who were seated inside; and he might have done so with just as much reason as existed for his criticism on the management of the traction engine train. This will serve as a good index to the spirit in which the Critic approached his task.

The next complaint which is specially put forward as an illustration of the "Voluntary Principle" is that, at the last moment, the Railway Company departed from the programme of trains which had been arranged between them and the War Office; and this really serious offence on the part of persons over whom the Volunteers had no control is coolly laid to the charge of those who suffered by it. The letter which appeared on Monday contained not a single definite accusation, except that the engineers of a traction engine and the traffic manager of a railway had done their duty badly, together with some criticism, which may or may not have been deserved, of the programme framed by General Officers from Aldershot. And yet on these principles, and these only, our candid critic winds up with this bit of fine denunciation:—"Who is or can be responsible for the transport of the Volunteers? And we cannot avoid asking, Is it their wish to be a body of organized soldiers, giving their services freely to their country, or that most useless and dangerous of all possible assemblies—an armed crowd without leaders and without discipline? These are the questions that cry for solution, and until they are solved the citizen soldiers may ask in vain for further pecuniary aid from the Government."

The Volunteers, if we know anything about them, are always grateful for intelligent criticism from the army, but to revile and threaten them because railway managers and traction engine drivers are ineffective is surely not the way to cure any defects with which they may be justly chargeable. The letter which followed the review is just as unfair as that which preceded it. It is admitted, as it could not but be, that the men showed creditable alacrity in mustering a second time after General Lindsay's ill-judged order had been recalled by the Duke of Cambridge, and then the candid critic proceeds to point out a few of the prominent faults which apparently he had gone to look for. The first accusation is that, when one corps was marching past, "a man roughly dressed and walking defiantly with his hands in his pockets" appeared on the flank, in disregard of the general order that no Volunteer was to march past in plain clothes. There is not the slightest ground suggested for believing that this "rough" was a Volunteer, and if he was found where he ought not to be it was the fault of those (certainly not Volunteers) to whom the duty of keeping the ground was assigned. "Why," asks the Critic, "did the men permit so extreme a breach of military courtesy?" May we not answer, because if in the middle of the march past they had stepped out of the ranks and knocked the intruder down they would really have been guilty of the want of discipline with which the Military Critic so unjustly charges them? "Then came the battle, and," adds the Critic, "all the faults of last year were aggravated." Very likely; but whose faults were they? "Fire was delivered from lines 1,000 yards distant." This constantly happens, and no one laughs at it more than Volunteers, but if military men set over them give orders which Military Critics think ridiculous, are the Volunteers to show their discipline by refusing to obey? A host of analogous blunders are referred to. Defenders retired without reason. Their right flank was unsupported and overlapped by the enemy. Skirmishers were pushed too far forward, and no one knew how to take advantage of the situation. Nay, so intermixed were the lines that one officer did not know whether troops in his front were meant to represent friends or enemies. To crown all, the left of the invaders was marched under a fire from heavy guns which must have destroyed every man. What does all this amount to? Simply that the Generals commanded badly, and therefore that the Volunteers are to be reviled as wanting in discipline.

At last we come to a charge which really does purport to touch the Volunteers themselves. "The skirmishers did not look out for cover." A very pertinent answer was given by an officer who wrote to the Times to say that there was no cover to look out for, and even if it had been otherwise, the fault—undoubtedly a very grievous one, if it had been committed—is not peculiar to the Volunteers. Who has not seen red-coated skirmishers disdaining cover at Aldershot and Shorncliff, and intent only on keeping the measure of their six paces, and preserving the dressing of the line? The truth is, that the light infantry drill of the Red Book is the worst possible training for genuine skirmishing, and that both Volunteers and regulars require to learn something much more real than they are usually taught. In all that we have quoted we have not found a single error for which the Volunteers could be held responsible, and we have mentioned every specific statement but one which the Military Critic has made to their disparagement. A single charge remains, and it is this—one Volunteer out of 20,000 disgraced himself by recklessly throwing his rifle at a hare. He was, it seems, already somewhat notorious, and he has since been dismissed from the force. When it is the practice to estimate the discipline of the British army by the conduct of the most insubordinate private in the ranks, it will be time enough to condemn the whole Volunteer force because one man has committed a fault for which he has been deservedly expelled. Oh, but says the Military Critic, the hare ran by the men's feet just before the review commenced (when of course they were standing easy), and several of them slashed at her as she passed. Of course this was wrong in the Volunteers, just as it was wrong in soldiers of the Line to do the like in the Crimea, when on actual service in the face of an enemy. We do not mean to excuse such levity even at a sham-fight, but if a more aggravated fault has not been thought to destroy the character for discipline of the regular army, it is a little hard that the entire body of Volunteers should be pronounced an undisciplined crowd for an irregularity committed, as it would seem, by a single battalion.

It is very unfortunate that officers who might really give instructive hints to the citizen soldiers who almost worship the uniforms of the regular army, should destroy their legitimate influence by such pitiful criticism as this. Volunteers have much to learn and are eager to be taught. As brigadiers especially they are greatly in want of instruction, and in a thousand details of duty any competent soldier might give fruitful hints to most of them. But they will look in vain for instruction to the letters of a Military Critic who declares them, as a body, unworthy and ill-disciplined, because they were badly handled at Dover by General Officers and not very well treated by railway officials.

THE GUARDIANSHIP OF NATIONAL MONUMENTS.

It seems that it is not in Ireland only that the present Government looks on the antiquities of the country as objects worthy of its notice. The remarks of Mr. Layard on Friday night, in answer to Sir H. Verney, will cause satisfaction, but satisfaction not unmixed with anxiety, in the minds of all lovers of art and history. Something must be done to stop the havoc which is constantly in progress among our national antiquities; but when Mr. Layard goes on to hold up France to us as a model for imitation in this respect, we begin to fear lest the remedy should prove to be worse than the disease. Our ancient buildings and ancient monuments of every kind are left to themselves. Their preservation or destruction is a matter of haphazard. They are mostly the property of individuals or corporations over which there is no public control. The owner of an ancient castle or abbey may, if he pleases, pull it down. The Chapter of a cathedral church may "restore" it in such a way as to be almost as bad as pulling it down. Both may be restrained by regard for public opinion, but there is no legal check upon them. It is only over those objects which are formally Crown property that the Government has any direct control, and there is no security that a Government department will have either more taste or more liberality than a private owner or an ecclesiastical corporation. The whole thing is a matter of chance; some things are well cared for, some are not; everything depends on the personal disposition of those to whom the accident of property or office may give a control over them. The results are certainly not satisfactory, yet it is hard to say what system to substitute. Setting aside the great difficulty of which Mr. Layard spoke—the difficulty arising from the private nature of many of our most important monuments—there is the further question whether a Government official would be likely to take better care of them than those who have the care of them as it is. Take our sepulchral monuments for instance; they stand open to two dangers—destruction and what is called "restoration." Of the latter a ludicrous instance lately happened in Bristol Cathedral. One of the most striking points in that small but deeply interesting minster is the grand series of sepulchral niches, containing the tombs of Abbots and others. At Bristol, as at other places, many of the figures are more or less mutilated. What is to be done with them? If the missing piece could be itself replaced, no one would hesitate about replacing it. If the mutilation was done yesterday, so that the missing piece could be restored with absolute certainty, the strongest objector to putting new pieces of cloth on old garments might perhaps be inclined to stretch a point. But when the mutilation was done years ago, and the restoration could be only conjectural, the case is quite different. The mutilation is part of the history of the monument; the intrusion of any modern work would be a breach, so to speak, of its personal identity. In this Bristol case certain of the old Abbots have lost their noses, and the missing noses are being replaced by new ones. We were told, with all seriousness and by way of consolation, that the noses were carefully copied from the noses of living members of the Chapter. Now we know of no reason to think that the most uninterrupted corporate succession will always secure identity of noses in the holders of the same office. Can we be certain that the nose of Pius the Ninth is a faithful reproduction of the nose of Saint Peter? Still less, when we consider the interruption to corporate succession at Bristol which happened in the days of King Harry, can we feel at all confident that the nose of any member of the present Chapter perfectly represents the nose of an Abbot of the fourteenth century. The modern dignitary may have a Roman or Grecian nose, while his mediæval predecessor had nothing better than a snub. Nothing is plainer than that the mutilated figure should be left without the feature which it has so long lost, and which can be replaced only by guess-work. But would the Abbots' faces be any safer if, instead of being under the care of the Chapter, they were under the care of a Government department? Nothing would be gained by imitating, instead of the noses of the Dean and Canons, which are at least real ecclesiastical noses, the mere secular noses of the Prime Minister or the First Commissioner of Works.

To rise from single figures to groups of figures, and to whole buildings, take the case of the west front of Wells. There is talk of "restoring" it—a word which simply makes one shudder till we know better than we do at present what is meant by restoring it. If the thing is to be made all spick-and-span new, French fashion, the "restoration" is simply the cruellest form of destruction. We not only lose the real thing, but we have a sham thing palmed off upon us instead of it. A church or any other building must be repaired when substantial repair is needed, even at the cost of substituting some new stones for old ones. But the purely ornamental portions, statues and their canopies and such like, are valuable only as being the original work of the original artist; the best modern copy is worth no more than a copy of a picture by a great master. The copy may be useful enough in its way as a subject for study; but if it is put as a substitute in the place of the original, it is simply an imposture. The west front of Wells Cathedral is by many people—not by us—looked on as the finest front in the kingdom. It is undoubtedly the richest display of mediæval statuary in the kingdom. But the whole charm and interest of the statues consists in their being genuine work of the thirteenth century. New statues, old statues with new arms, legs, or noses, would be simply worthless. Do all that is needed in the way of substantial repair; do all that can be done in the way of preservation of what is left; but innovate in nothing, replace nothing that is purely ornamental. We go inside the church, and what we see there makes us tremble for what is to be done to the outside. One of the discoveries of the nineteenth century is that our ancient churches need warming. Well and good; if we are so much more chilly than our forefathers, physical necessity must be obeyed. Ingenious men must find out some way of reconciling the comfort of the living with respect to the great works of the dead. The Chapter of Bristol, to make up for their sins in the matter of Abbots' noses, have warmed their church in a way which is quite harmless. The stoves are unobtrusive, they are not particularly ugly, and with a little more trouble they might have been made positively pretty; they have no chimneys; they do not stand in the way of anything, and they do not do harm to anything. The question has evidently been cared for by those in authority. So, for the matter of that, the Abbots' noses must have been also, but the result of capitular thought has been happier in one case than in the other. At Wells the report is that the whole thing was left in the hands of a common tradesman of the town, and the result certainly looks as if the report were true. The stoves are many times bigger and many times uglier than the Bristol stoves, and—we expect to be called on to confirm the statement by the oaths of compurgators, but it is literally true—holes have been knocked in the vaulted roof to let through the hideous chimneys of the hideous stoves. That any of our cathedral churches could have been so dealt with in the year 1869 sounds beyond belief; but it is true. The chimneys run through both roofs, and, as King James said of tobacco, "the horrible Stygian smoke thereof is most like unto that of the pit which is bottomless." Complaints are rife; one man fears for the painting on the roof, another for the matchless stained glass, another for his own lungs. But this is not all, nor is it the worst. Among the other acts of havoc done some years past, the tomb of the famous Bishop Beckington, the great benefactor of the city and a notable statesman of the fifteenth century, was despoiled of its splendid canopy, which, for what cause no one can guess, was carried off and set up by itself elsewhere. Will it be believed that, for the comfort and convenience of one of the new stoves, this splendid work of art, the memorial of a great man and a local worthy, was subjected to a still further mutilation? A piece of the canopy was actually carried away and put among lumber. And it is an almost stranger comment on the way in which these things are left to shift for themselves, that the coming into residence of a canon of more taste and knowledge caused it to be put back again. With these facts before us, we tremble for the fate of the west front.

But would matters be mended by Government interference? As it is, the thing is a matter of chance. Among Chapters, rectors, private owners, some are wise and some are foolish, and if some things are destroyed by the foolish ones, other things are saved by the wise ones. We feel sure that the late doings at Wells and Bristol could not have happened at Ely or Chichester. The danger is that a Government department would lay down some inflexible rule which would really do more damage than the haphazard system. And as Mr. Layard holds up France as our model, we unhesitatingly say that they do not manage these things better in France. In France there is one law of universal destruction—destruction taking two forms, sometimes that of restoration, sometimes that of demolition pure and simple. In England there is no such recognised trade as the "démolisseur"; in France he abounds, and mediæval buildings are among the commonest materials of his craft. In England the fortune of war, the chance of a sensible man being found in local authority, saves something; in France everything is doomed. The ancient work perishes, and no man takes it to heart, because very often no man off the spot knows anything about it. Criticism is forbidden; censure on Government doings, even on a Government architect, would of course be treason. Our readers may remember some of the remarks which we have made from time to time on the havoc which has been lately wrought in Normandy and elsewhere in France. It is a literal fact that some of our comments were translated into French by some of the Norman antiquaries, and circulated—in manuscript. It would not have done to print or to read them openly. At the meeting of the Society at which they would naturally have been read aloud, the Prefect of the Department was to be present, and it would not have been allowed to censure a Government work in the Prefect's hearing. We have at this moment before us a tract of M. Bouet's, describing—he can only venture to describe—the wanton destruction of the church of Germigny, one of the few remaining buildings of the Carolingian era, dating from the days of the great Emperor himself. When M. Bouet was there the "démolisseur" was at work; by this time thechurch of 806 has most likely vanished from the earth. Now we do not want this system in England; we are better off as we are. Caernarvon and the Tower of London have not undergone the fate of Falaise. The church in Dover Castle has been more lucky than the church of Germigny. Still, when France is held up as a model, we begin to be afraid. We doubt whether a Government department would really do better through the whole length and breadth of the land than the existing local authorities do. But if Mr. Layard can find out some way of bringing the really enlightened opinion of antiquaries and men of taste to bear, in whatever form, alike on Government officials and on local authorities, he will be doing a good work. Something should be done to save what is left of the historical monuments of the country, but we are not clear that what Mr. Layard seems to hint at is the best way of doing it.

DENOMINATIONAL EDUCATION.

THE signs of a coming reaction are sometimes perceptible even before the tendency against which it is a protest has reached its full development. Careful observers may see some reason for thinking that this is the case just now with regard to secularism in education. To all appearance the country is only waiting for the Irish Church Bill to be out of the way in order to establish a comprehensive compulsory system, from which religious teaching of any kind will be authoritatively excluded. The name of denominationalism stinks in the nostrils of every advanced Liberal. To hold that there may be more food for the intellectual faculties in the most cut and dried of theological text-books than in the multiplication table, or in a list of polysyllables, is regarded as ample qualification for a place in the limbo of fools and bigots. The three R's, in their severest simplicity, are the ideal of human attainment. They comprise all that is necessary for man to know, and the proudest function of the State is to send round the policeman to see that every man knows them. Even in this full tide of confident and self-satisfied secularism, there are eddies here and there which suggest that the stream may not always flow in the direction in which it now sets so strongly. The immense difficulties which will be entailed on the State by anything like an open breach with the voluntary agencies to which we are indebted for most of what has hitherto been done in the way of popular education, and the certainty that legislation which imposes disabilities upon denominational schools, or weights them unduly in the race, will bring about such a breach, do seem, now and again, to be coming home to the minds of politicians. Those who are on the look-out for indications of the future of English education may perhaps find some in a "Preliminary Report" on the Homerton Training College, lately submitted to the Privy Council by Mr Matthew Arnold. There is a significance about this word "preliminary." The normal school at Homerton is not a new institution. It was founded in 1852, but it was not till 1868 that it admittod the visits of a Government Inspector. It belongs to the Congregational Board of Education, an organization formed in 1843 "to promote popular education, partaking of a religious character, and under no circumstances receiving aid from public money administered by Government." Within certain limits to be hereafter noticed, it professed to "entertain the most cordial consideration for all other Evangelical denominations" which, "rejecting Government aid," are willing to co-operate in offering "a firm and general resistance to State interference." The existence of a large number of good schools bound together by this common hostility to Government aid was a standing argument against the present system. The weakness of auxiliary grants is that they do least where most is wanted, and the only answer to this objection is that they bring out a vast amount of educational activity which might otherwise lie entirely dormant. If, however, the same activity can be shown to exist elsewhere without the same stimulus, the force of this defence is considerably weakened, and the Committee of Council has to sustain the double accusation that it will not help a great many poor schools, and that it is not allowed to help a great many rich schools. Whatever injury the system has hitherto received from this latter source, it will now receive no more. In June last the Congregational Board "unanimously resolved to apply for admission of the Training College at Homerton and of the elementary schools of Congregationalists to a share in the Parliamentary Grant," and all provisions as to the rejection of State aid have now disappeared from the rules. It was this application that led to Mr. Arnold's visit to Homerton.

The Report from which we take these facts supplies us with another of the symptoms to which we have referred. Mr. Arnold has not the character of being an over-ardent admirer of denominational education or an over-zealous opponent of State control. But he draws a moral from his visit to Homerton which seems to concede the principle of the present system even, while it advocates an alteration in its form. The groundwork of the educational organization now admitted to share in the Parliamentary Grant is different from that of any of the schools hitherto supported from this source. The schools under the Congregational Board resemble the ordinary denominational schools in insisting upon distinctive religious teaching, and they resemble the British and Foreign Schools in dispensing with the imposition of any denominational formulary as a condition of admission to union. But, on the other hand, they are unlike the ordinary denominational schools, "in that they are not merely for Anglicans or for Wesleyans, but for those who hold 'Evangelical views of religion,'" and they are unlike the British and Foreign Schools, "because, being for those who hold 'Evangelical views of religion,' they exclude Socinians and Roman Catholics." Upon this Mr. Arnold offers an interesting and suggestive comment:—

> The distinction is remarkable, because the denomination thus, in fact, adopted is identical with the denomination common to all the State-aided Protestant schools of Germany, and under which all bodies of Protestant Christians in that country unite. State-aided schools in Germany are divided into Evangelical schools and Catholic schools; and, in my opinion, this is the very best division which can be adopted, recognising essential differences and effacing non-essential; and it is, I think, one which, though it might be distasteful to certain parties and individuals, would on the whole recommend itself, if it could be followed, to the feelings and judgment of the people of this country. It is true, Germany has in Luther's Short Catechism a formulary which all Evangelical bodies agree to unite in using, and this is a great advantage. For want of some formulary of this kind the religious teaching of Congregational schools has to depend on the Bible gallery lesson; and it may well be thought that too much is thus left to the individual teacher. Still in seizing this notion of Evangelical Protestantism as the basis of the religious character of their schools, and in guarding this, so far as they could, from being a mere unreal colourless thing, made up of vague generalities, the Congregational Board have had the merit of conceiving a type of popular school better suited, probably, to be the public school of the bulk of the people of this country than either the so-called National school or the Wesleyan school on the one hand, or than the British school, or still more than the secular school, on the other; and their conception has in it, in my opinion, elements of utility which may well bear fruit in the future.

We do not wonder that this broad confessional distinction takes such hold of Mr. Arnold's fancy. No doubt its adoption, supposing it to be possible, would remove many of the objections to which denominational education is obnoxious. At present the unavoidable waste of energy is immense. In one and the same town there may exist a Church school under the control of an Evangelical clergyman, a Wesleyan school, a Congregational school, and a Baptist school. The characteristic differences by which the conductors of all these institutions are separated from one another hardly show themselves in the ordinary course of teaching; indeed, they are not considered of sufficient importance out of school to put any solid barrier between the professors of the several creeds. The Evangelical clergyman and the ministers of the various chapels to which the Dissenting schools are attached may be on the best of terms between themselves. They may make common cause on the platforms of Bible and Tract Societies. They may exchange congratulations on their common hold of all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and on their common preaching of the Gospel. They may have a good word to say, both in and out of the pulpit, about their respective missionary enterprises. They may cherish a common horror of Romanism, Ritualism, and Rationalism, and give their heads a common shake at the names of Archbishop Manning, or Dr. Pusey, or the Dean of Westminster. And yet, notwithstanding all this concord, four complete sets of educational machinery have to be kept going to do work which might be better got through with one. It is only natural that educational reformers should chafe at the spectacle, but Mr. Arnold is the first, so far as we know, who has boldly proposed to amalgamate into a single organization all those schools which agree upon essential points, and only differ upon non-essential—the definition in each case being taken from the admissions of their own conductors. Englishmen are broadly divided, he would say, into Catholics and Protestants. Let us ignore minor differences on the one hand, and exceptional eccentricities on the other, and remodel our educational arrangements to meet actual facts.

In arriving at this conclusion Mr. Arnold has not been quite careful enough to look at the whole case. Perhaps a single example may be enough to remind him of his omission. He proposes to divide State-aided schools into Evangelical schools and Catholic schools, and we presume to entrust their management to boards representing these two confessions. Under which category would he include a Ritualist school? On the testimony alike of friends and foes it is not a Protestant school. Its conductors repudiate the name, and find their English vocabulary fail them when they have to characterize the "Protestant heresy." But they denounce with equal energy the claims of the Roman hierarchy in England, and are denounced by them in return with at least corresponding vehemence. It would be difficult, we fear, to construct a Board either on the "Evangelical" or the "Catholic" models which Mr. Arnold desires to borrow from Germany, that would receive into union a school of which Mr. Mackonochie was the patron. We have purposely taken an extreme instance, but the same reasoning applies in a greater or less degree to the whole High Church party. In constructing his scheme of the future, Mr. Arnold has forgotten the Anglican Church—rather a serious omission, when educational agencies in this country are under discussion. The friends of the Church of England say she is both Catholic and Protestant; her enemies declare that she is neither. But both statements point to the same set of facts, and both express an undoubted, if inconvenient, truth, that she touches her neighbours on both sides. This or that section of her clergy may have more affinity with religious bodies outside her pale than with other sections within it, but they cannot be treated as a whole except on a separate and independent footing. At the same time, we agree with Mr. Arnold in thinking that the accession of the Congregational Board to the Government system is an event of considerable importance. Every reduction that can be effected in the needless cost of education is a gain so far as it goes, and we do not see why an Evangelical Board may not in time absorb all the various forms of Evangelical Dissent. The result of this change would be to reduce the number of denominational schools, and to render the British School a meaningless and unnecessary compromise. Nor would there be any objection to allowing such Anglican managers as wished to do so to put their schools in connexion with the "Evangelical" organization to which they would be really allied in sympathy—such connexion of course only lasting as long as the parish clergyman desired to maintain it. In this way the number of schools in the same district might be very much reduced, and the State fund would be proportionately enabled to bear the expense of aiding such separate schools as might continue to represent really essential distinctions.

A NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE House of Commons, which cannot upon its ground-floor hold the whole Gladstonian phalanx, and whose galleries refuse to seat half the shrunken forces of the Opposition, stands respited for judgment. Mr. Headlam showed his appreciation of the cruel mercy which may be expected from a public prosecutor when he declined to press for an immediate sentence; for he must have felt that, the longer judgment might be deferred, the sharper would certainly be the final condemnation. In truth, the defence was not inadequate, but simply non-existent. Lord Bury indeed was funny, and Lord Elcho sternly severe upon the peccadilloes of seat-seeking members; Mr. Dodson played the contented official, and Colonel French raised his wild Celto-Norman war-cry; while Mr. Hunt, speaking in easy and imposing majesty from the front bench, which he fills and adorns, could not understand what the inferior herd of independent members meant by inconvenience. But, with these exceptions, the voices of all who cared to speak were unanimous in their condemnation of the existing chamber. Lord John Manners, whose Parliamentary experience is some sixteen years longer than that of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, only differs from his predecessor, Mr. Cowper, in thinking the matter serious enough to warrant the joint action of both Houses; while his successor, Mr. Layard, summed up the evidence for the prosecution with fatal force of logic; and even Mr. Gladstone, sitting by the side of his for once silent Finance Minister within two days of the Budget, could find no better reason for arrest of judgment than the transparently perfunctory plea that, inasmuch as some two hundred odd members were new to Parliament, they could not be supposed competent to vote on so abstruse a question, capable as they might be of subverting a Church Establishment. There was not even room to raise a sentimental feeling on the other side. Those who were most anxious to do justice to the memory of Sir Charles Barry, and those who were so determined to do injustice to it as, like Colonel French, to arraign the son for the father's assumed misdeeds, combined in admitting the actual House as it stands to be a mistake. With such unanimity of sentiment, it is for the present purpose hardly worth inquiring on whose shoulders the original blame rests; and we therefore content ourselves with stating that, while it is our conviction that a grave error was committed, we consider that Sir Charles Barry was cruelly misled by amateur and incompetent advisers, and in particular that the mutilation of his original chamber was decided on in hot haste and with scandalous levity. The main lines of the ground-plan had been long before irrevocably settled in those lazy and unbelieving years which followed that grotesque outburst of rose-coloured democracy in which the young days of the first Reform Bill had frisked. Melbourne then reigned, and a full House might mean a majority for Peel. Besides, members then measured their sitting privileges by the standard, not of the broad-gauge first-class, but of the close-squeezed mail-coach. Acoustics were a mystery, and ventilation a myth. The Penny Post was still pooh-poohed as the absurd crotchet of a fantastical theorist, while the forms of the House continued to recognise the safety-valve of petitions as giving an opportunity for minor members to let off their little speeches on the biggest topics to empty benches. All these circumstances, not to mention the still infantine condition of the Reporters' Gallery, favoured the snug old theory of a little House in which to do solid business, make occasional telling speeches, and settle off questions with the comfortable assurance that the chances of injury to life or limb at even the most crowded divisions were much less than could be anticipated at any average City pageant.

How all this is now changed we will not waste time in indicating. We desire rather to show how moderate and conservative the changes are which Mr. Headlam's Committee recommended after sitting during two Sessions. Had they demanded a huge hall like the French or the American House of Representatives, with a seat, a desk, and stationery for every member, we should have simply asked whether they intended to follow up their claim by proposing such a revision of the Standing Orders as would enable members, Washington-fashion, either to put their speeches in as read, or else, having secured their regular hour, to underlet it in driblets to their friends. No such thing, we are glad to say, was even suggested. The new House, as proposed by Mr. Barry, will give regulation sitting room (gallery included) to nearly one hundred less members than the full complement of the House, while no ostensible means of compulsory inattention will be forthcoming within the chamber. The sittings will still be benches, ranged in opposite platoons, and all the traditionary arrangements will be preserved; indeed, it is proposed to make the House a trifle shorter than the present one. The extra accommodation will be furnished by increasing the width, so as to bring a larger number within the same distance from the chair. The site of the proposed chamber is, luckily, found on a spot which will leave the present House available for use till the last day's sitting of the Session preceding the flitting. It is composed of a court-yard of the present Palace, now useless in every respect, a division lobby the reason of whose existence will disappear with the abolition of the legislative chamber on which it hangs, and dining-rooms in which no one who has once dined there would ever again by preference take a meal. By a lucky chance this area lies just between the present House and the library, so that the new building can be erected without disturbing any of the existing arrangements which are worth being preserved, and it will bring about both the abridgment of distances which are now found to be very troublesome, and also the addition of sundry conveniences which Parliament does not at present possess. Of these the most obvious is the creation of a private lobby for members adjoining to the House, which will be provided by the retention of the present House of Commons, restored to its genuine condition of architectural dignity. This lobby will not be a mere lounging place, for in connexion with it a vote-office, a post-office, and a refreshment stall are to be arranged. It may be a joke to outsiders to hear that no member can now go in or out of the House, to post a letter or say a word to a friend, obtain a Bill or snatch a morsel of refreshment, without having to run the gauntlet of a mob of lobbyists, who constantly plant themselves at the public door with the express intention of waylaying and running down their impotent victims; but the nuisance is very serious, both to the sufferers and to general business itself, and if the constituencies desire to maintain Parliamentary representation as in any degree an unpaid and gentlemanly calling, they must not grudge or grumble at the abatement of the grievance.

We should be only tiring our readers if we recapitulated the other House arrangements in which Mr. Barry's plan is confessedly superior to the existing structure. It is enough for us to say that we consider it good economy of public time and of the energies devoted to the service of the State to induce members to make their club of the House rather than of any mansion in Pall Mall. In the interest of our own craft, we feel bound to repeat the general opinion that journalists have just cause for complaint both as to the quantity and the quality of their present accommodation. The new plans show a notable improvement in both these respects, while the provision of a few spare rooms, to enable Ministers to carry on responsible government without an absolute sacrifice of many hours otherwise available for office work, is a simple act of Christian charity, and of rudimentary common sense. All these advantages Mr. Barry avers that he can provide for some 120,000*l.* without incurring the extra cost and temporary inconvenience of having to run up a provisional House. We agree with what Mr. Tite meant to say—while he most perversely contrived instead to utter a sentiment which will for many a day expose him to the cross-fire both of architects and of employers—that so great a gain would not be unreasonably purchased even at double the outlay.

It is the first axiom of good housekeeping to lodge one's servants comfortably and sufficiently. The nation will show itself both foolish and niggard if it acts on less liberal principles towards its representatives; and the House of Commons will be both cowardly and deficient in self-respect if it does not claim the right of judging whether a third of a century's experience has not entitled it to ask for facilities for doing the nation's work which were not thought of in 1835.

REVIEWS.

LIFE OF RAVIGNAN.*

IT is a remarkable comment on the present system of ecclesiastical training and discipline in the French Church that its two most eloquent preachers—who, of all its priests in this century, have exercised incomparably the widest and deepest religious influence, especially over men—had their minds and characters formed outside the walls of the Seminary, and only passed afterwards from a lay career to the ministry of the altar. Both Lacordaire and Ravignan were educated at public schools, and had practised at the bar before they mounted the pulpit. And we may be very sure that their influence would never have been what it was had their natural force of character and keenness of intellect been cramped from early boyhood by the narrow caste-like system of drill which has made the great body of the modern French clergy—as a Cardinal Archbishop publicly boasted last year—a vast army who have no will of their own, and simply move in slavish obedience to their commander's word. It is precisely to those qualities which are usually crushed out or twisted by such a process that the Dominican and the Jesuit alike, though in different degrees, owed much of their wonderful success as spiritual guides. A breadth of sympathy, a tenderness of affection, and, to use the words of his biographer, the "distinguished" bearing of "a finished gentleman," were to the last conspicuous in Ravignan. The same might be said of Lacordaire, who displayed also a more marked individuality than twelve years of Jesuit discipline, before he was suffered to commence his public life, left to his great compeer, and a gift for winning the affections and moulding the character of boys peculiar to himself. That his antecedents gave Ravignan a special aptitude for forming a sound judgment on questions of the day and dealing with men of the world, is expressly admitted by his biographer, though he hardly appreciates all that is implied in the admission. And the very brief account he gives of his hero's early life—which is the least satisfactory part of the book—supplies sufficient data for inferring a good deal more. On the whole, Father Ponlevoy has discharged his task well. There are several chapters which will not have much interest except to those who take up the work as a hagiography, and indeed broad hints are thrown out that Ravignan ought to be canonized. To the general reader, however, it will commend itself on two grounds—first, as the life of a very remarkable man, whom it is impossible not to admire and respect; and secondly, so far as it throws any light on the characteristics and position of the "Society of Jesus," with which he had identified himself.

Ravignan was born in 1795, and was twenty-seven before he resolved to become an ecclesiastic, and, later in the same year, to pass from the ranks of the secular clergy to the Jesuit noviciate. He was distinguished from early childhood for his piety, and for the warmth and depth of his attachments. His biographer tells us that the friendships he formed were lasting, and that almost all the companions of his boyhood remained doubly his friends in after life. It was the same with his family affections, which survived his breaking with the world. When a priest he frequently said the Requiem Mass for his parents, and never approached the altar without praying for them. His old schoolmaster, who appears to have been an irreligious man, was won by him on his death-bed to repentance; and when he was himself dying, two of his last interviews were with M. Berryer, who had been his colleague at the bar, and a young foreigner whom he had shortly before received into the Roman Church, and who parted from him in an agony of tears. He has indeed truly enough depicted his own character when he says in a letter to his brother· "Whatever bears the mark of religion and of friendship can never fail to make the most lively impression on me." The grief of his mother (his father had died when he was still a schoolboy) on his determination to become a priest, and far more at the completer severance involved in his adoption of the Jesuit order, was therefore a severe trial to him, and apparently his only trial in taking the step to which he had long felt himself drawn. He was probably not mistaken in writing to his brother on the occasion: "I sacrifice nothing for God." His true feeling about it would have been exactly expressed in the words of a well-known poem of Dr. Newman's:—

> We give but what we cannot keep,
> What we have ceased to love.

In October, 1822, he entered the Jesuit noviciate, and only in 1835 commenced his public career by preaching the Lent Conferences at Amiens. The next year he preached at St. Thomas's Church in Paris, and in 1837 first occupied the pulpit of Notre Dame just vacated by Lacordaire. From that year he regularly delivered the Conferences there every Lent till 1847, when his health began to fail. These Conferences closed in Holy week with a Retreat, and a grand Communion of men on Easter Sunday. His biographer thus describes the final ceremonies:—

> Those who have been present know the effect when, at the opening of the evening instruction, the psalm of the penitent is chanted alternately by the voices of children, and by the voice of a whole people; when, on Good Friday, after a sermon on the Passion such as an Apostle can preach, the procession of holy relics winds through the close ranks, who bow as it passes; and especially when, on Easter morning, three thousand men, with humility in their hearts and a holy confidence on their brows, come forward, in order, to the sanctuary where the chief pastor of the diocese, and the orator of Notre-Dame, are sharing the joy of distributing the Bread of Angels; they will tell us that a scene more worthy of heaven is not seen on earth. The old church had witnessed many sacrilegious outrages, many royal solemnities; it now witnessed what made amends for the insults it had suffered, and what recalled its most august celebrations. And who can tell the influence exercised upon the present generation by these thoroughly Catholic and almost national ceremonials.

After 1846 he continued to preach at intervals till 1852, but not at Notre Dame, for which he had no strength. As an orator he was not equal to Lacordaire. With his intense earnestness and profound conviction of the truth of the message he had to deliver, he possessed in a rare degree that ἠθικὴ πίστις which Aristotle rightly reckons one of the main secrets of persuasive utterance. On one occasion a Protestant minister who was present at Notre Dame observed, "He has preached without speaking a word, and the sermon is ended before being begun." Another auditor more enthusiastically declared that when he entered the pulpit no one could say whether he had ascended from the earth or come down from heaven. His preaching in London, during the Great Exhibition of 1851, does not seem to have attracted very general attention, but his society was courted by persons of all ranks and creeds, and he was himself greatly impressed with "the staid, serious cast of opinion, the religious instinct, the respect for authority, for law, and for the public morals, the truly national spirit, the social and domestic virtues on which Providence has bestowed, as on Rome of old, the reward of the sovereignty of the world." These are Father Ponlevoy's words, but a letter of his own to Count Molé is quoted, contrasting pointedly the stability of the foundations of English society with the condition of "poor France." He goes on to remark on the growing power of the middle class, "among whom true political principles and religious feeling are not predominant," and adds that it is among this class that "the prejudice against Catholicism is most lively," and that "the remarkable religious movement which we have seen in progress in an enlightened portion of English society has not found its way into the middle class," but that he was assured it would in time.

If we turn from Ravignan the man to Ravignan the Jesuit, and inquire how far his career illustrates the position and prospects of the Society and its present influence on Church politics, the Life gives us less information than could be desired. That he showed that unintermittent zeal for the interests of his Order which somehow always appears to hold an equal place in a Jesuit's mind with his zeal for his Church, if not for the honour of God, is indicated in many passages of his letters, and rather grotesquely signalized, whether by himself or his biographer, by always speaking of a Jesuit as "one of Ours," with a capital letter. He seems also to have gone all lengths in that excessive and somewhat maudlin Mariolatry which has long been a speciality of the Order. But the real forces of his character and the secret of his spiritual power belonged to the man, and not to the member of an organization. He was on different occasions engaged in disputes in the interests of his Order with Archbishop Affré, who afterwards died so nobly on the barricades in 1848, and with the Governments both of Louis Philippe and the Emperor. The Archbishop stuck to his point, though sincerely attached to Ravignan, and seems to have been in the right. The following extract from his own notes of the interview with Louis Napoleon shows at once his sincerity and his inability to comprehend the real point and strength of the prejudice, as he regarded it, so universally entertained more or less against his community:—

> THE EMPEROR Well, I will allow myself a question. [What he said amounted to this, I will allow myself.] How is it that since the time of Henry IV. you have always excited dislike?"
>
> F. DE RAVIGNAN. "Sire, this admits of only partial explanation, for there are some things which cannot be explained. We were brought into existence to resist the Reformation. Both under the reign of Henry IV. and before and after it, the spirit of Protestantism has abhorred the Jesuits.
>
> "There has always been, and there is still, in existence, and there always will be, a political, parliamentary, and Gallican spirit, in opposition to the Roman Church. We are regarded as Ultramontane, as very Roman, and it is true. We think that obedience to authority is the principle to be maintained in the Church as well as in the State. There is in the Church a sovereign authority to which we profess thorough devotion and perfect submission. . . .
>
> "Then there have been Jesuits who have occupied positions of influence, and jealousy is sure to spring up.
>
> "And, finally, we do not deny that sometimes there have been, and are, faults on the part of individual Jesuits.
>
> "Really I should be very glad if men would give us the character we deserve of being bunglers."
>
> THE EMPEROR (laughing). "This is not the character you have got."

In just the same way he speaks elsewhere of Gioberti's Gesuita Moderno with mere contemptuous compassion. He is "sorry for the author," hopes God will forgive him, and thinks the Society "happy in being thus pursued with persevering hatred and calumny." And he ridicules "the widely-spread charge of the Society mixing itself up with politics," and says it "neither has nor can have any politics but those of the Church." Now this is all very well, but it certainly does not go to the root of the matter. The Emperor was right enough in thinking there could not be so much smoke without fire; and the Gesuita Moderno, though it cannot be called an impartial work, contains a great deal of truth. The Jesuits may of course say they have no politics but those of the Church, because they can, and in fact always do, represent their policy as designed to further the interests of the Church as well as their own. But to deny that they have, whenever the opportunity very considerable success—to exercise directly political influence in Spain, in Austria, and in France, would be to fly in the face of history. They ruled France, in all matters affecting religion, during Louis XIV.'s reign, through the King's mistresses, and—what is worth mentioning—they took a strongly Gallican line in order the better to crush the Port-Royalists, who were protected by Innocent XI. And they have always aimed, as they are aiming now, at ruling the Church through the Pope. It has been said truly enough that they regard their own Order as "the Catholic Church gone into Commission"; and they cannot wonder if those who object to being governed by a clique, however learned and venerable, pursue them with what they call obloquy and persecution. To their minds the doctrines of Jesuit theology and the faith of the Church are, or ought to be, identical. And bitterly and relentlessly have they persecuted those who, like the Port-Royalists, rebelled against this tyranny of opinion. Ravignan composed, by direction of his superiors, a work in defence of Clement XIV. (Ganganelli), or rather, in defence of his own Order, for its object was to prove that Clement was coerced into suppressing them against his own judgment. It was meant to be an answer to a work by Theiner, the learned Librarian of the Vatican. The General's view in urging Ravignan to undertake the task may be gathered from his observing that Ganganelli's "frequent changes of mind and his long delays all indicate anguish of conscience" at having to suppress the Order. It is abundantly clear, from the Pope's own words, as well as from other evidence, that he only delayed till Maria Theresa withdrew her opposition to the urgent wishes of the sovereigns of France and Spain, and that his "anguish" was caused, not by having to take a step which he was fully convinced was right, but by the fear of being poisoned for doing so. Of his being constantly haunted by this dread there can be absolutely no doubt, though we need not believe that his fears were actually realized, of which there is no adequate proof. On the whole the general result of the history of Jesuitism during its existence of three centuries has been fairly summed up in the epigrammatic comment, ubi bene nihil melius—of which Ravignan's career is a striking example—ubi male nihil pejus.

There are some curious records of interviews of Ravignan's with the Pope in 1848 and 1853. The Holy Father does not seem to have been always very consistent in his statements, for on one occasion he is represented as repeatedly assuring the deputies of the Jesuit Congregation that "the Civiltà (their organ) had his most formal approval"—which has since been confirmed by a special Bull—while we read a few pages later that he said to Ravignan, "I do not make any newspaper my own, and I do not defend the Univers." One other remark of His Holiness at the same interview we may commend to the serious attention of some of the noisiest, if not the wisest, of his partisans:—

> I have received letters pressing me to condemn Traditionalism. Why will not men have patience! They want to have done with human reason; but if there is no more of this poor human reason, very soon there will be no more faith. Each must have its own part.

CORRESPONDENCE OF NAPOLEON I.*

THE first of the letters contained in these two volumes is dated from Wilna on the 1st July, 1812; the last from Mayence on the 31st July, 1813. In the intervening thirteen months the tide of Napoleon's fortunes turned. The enormous wave of his military power had gathered itself up through two previous years in front of the western boundaries of the Russian Empire, to burst and roll in a devastating flood as far onward as the devoted city of Moscow, and then to ebb, and be wasted and lost in the ebbing. The Continent of Europe learned for the first time that Napoleon's genius was not infallible, nor his star absolutely supreme, and the welcome lesson of the possibility of revenge was eagerly taken to heart by one nation after another. If the wonderful vigour with which the French Emperor reorganized his broken legions after the return from Russia had been seconded by a wise moderation of his ambition, and the terms offered by the allies in the armistice of Pleischwitz had been frankly accepted, neither Elba nor St. Helena would have been the domicile of an ex-Emperor. But the immensity of Napoleon's belief in himself and his destiny was even harder to subdue than the immensity of the wintry devastation of Russia; and up to the end of the volumes before us there is no sign that he ever seriously contemplated himself as other than invincible. There is nothing more characteristic of Napoleon than the obstinate determination with which, at all times and under all circumstances, he throws the entire responsibility of war and its horrors on the shoulders of his adversaries. His manifesto to the Czar on the eve of the mighty struggle which his own unbounded appetite for power had planned and provoked is a typical instance in this kind. The future history of a united Europe, as it was to be read in the archives of the paramount French Empire, was always intended to justify to the full the invariable interference of a wise, if stern, Providence on behalf of the impeccable owner of the invincible French battalions.

The same tones of injured innocence, and almost of incapacity to place himself in any moral position except his own, are audible in the letter sent to the Czar on the 20th of September, 1812, from Moscow itself. The successful invader of Russia complains with virtuous indignation of the manner and the result of the opposition which he meets. The desertion and the burning of her ancient capital, from which he had intended to dictate to her a beneficent peace, surprised and outraged his moral sense, as contrary to the rules of the civilized game of war:—

> L'humanité, les intérêts de votre majesté et de cette grande ville voulaient qu'elle me fût confiée en dépôt, puisque l'armée russe la découvrait: on devait y laisser des administrations, des magistrats et des gardes civils. C'est ainsi que l'on a fait à Vienne, deux fois, à Berlin, à Madrid. C'est ainsi que nous-mêmes avons agi à Milan, lors de l'entrée de Souvarof. Les incendies autorisent le pillage, auquel le soldat se livre pour disputer des débris aux flammes.

In other words, Napoleon was disgusted to find that, in virtue of a more implacable hardihood of national resistance than had entered into his calculations, the great prize for which he had marched so many miles and left so many corpses strewed along his track had turned to dust and ashes in his hands, and was nothing more or less than a fatally untenable position. He had not seen why one European capital, and the nation belonging thereto, should not accept their fate as easily as another, nor had it occurred to him that Russia was by nature placed in any such exceptional circumstances as might induce her to interpret differently from himself the rigour of the game. On discovering his mistake, he seems really to have felt that "Monsieur son Frère" the Czar, upon whom he could conscientiously assert that he had made war "sans animosité," had somehow or other got an unhandsome advantage over him. Or, if he did not feel this, he thought that Alexander was such a fool that it might be worth while to pretend to feel it. As a commentary on the depth of his general regard for humanity, or for the interests of a prince or a city when they clashed with his own, we may quote the short and sharp order given by him to the Viceroy Eugène in the spring of the following year, when the national indignation of the Prussians had not yet burst out in open hostility to the Power that had domineered over them since Jena:—"A la moindre insulte d'une ville, d'un village prussien, faites-le brûler, fût-ce même Berlin, s'il se comporte mal."

Readers of the earlier volumes of the Imperial correspondence will be ready to acknowledge one of the traditional characteristics of Napoleon in his extraordinary power of attention to detail; and perhaps this was never more singularly displayed than in his elaborate preparations for the Russian war. But with the monstrous scale of his operations the ordinary difficulties of military detail increased in a geometrical ratio. Whether from incapacity or negligence on the part of his general and commissariat staff, or from his original miscalculation of the extent to which the resources of the invaded country would suffice to maintain his army, the task proved unmanageably huge from the outset. Figures taken from the various French historians mention ten thousand dead horses as lying on the highway from the Niemen to Wilna; thirty thousand disbanded soldiers as marauding round the main army; and twenty-five thousand sick in the hospitals of Lithuania, before a single shot had been fired. The Emperor complained bitterly of the general inefficiency of his staff, the irregular transmission of reports from the various corps to head-quarters, and so forth. The Duke of Fézensac, a gallant young officer who served under Ney in the rear-guard through most of the hardships of the retreat, tells the readers of his memoirs that persons on the staff of the marshals under Napoleon were simply ordered to perform impossible tasks, and that no care was taken to verify the execution or failure of the orders. Napoleon's conception of the campaign was based on the theory of startling the enemy into terror by the rapidity of his forced marches, which were baffled by the tenacious adherence of the Russians to their tactics of continually retiring just beyond his range. The Imperial proclamation on the morning of the battle of Borodino (so eloquent to the ear of the French soldiery) spoke the truth in calling victory a necessity. Its promises of "l'abondance, de bons quartiers d'hiver et un prompt retour dans la patrie," were more fallacious. Even then Napoleon had so far overrun the tether of his strength that the best use of victory would have been to secure the retreat which his marshals pressed upon him after the battle. It has been commonly stated that the news of the battle of Salamanca reached the Emperor on the eve of Borodino. The dates of this correspondence show that he received Marmont's report of that defeat at least five days before. The first criticism on his unfortunate lieutenant is extremely bitter, charging him with equal incapacity to write a despatch, obey orders, or know when to fight a battle:—

> Il est impossible de rien lire de plus insignifiant; il y a plus de fatras et plus de rouages que dans une horloge, et pas un mot qui fasse connaître l'état réel des choses. . . . Il y a là un cas d'insubordination qui est la cause de tous les malheurs de cette affaire. . . . Il a sacrifié à la vanité la gloire de la patrie et l'avantage de mon service.

The last words were not entirely inapplicable to the actual condition of the writer. The Russian expedition was destined to be a profitless sacrifice to vanity; and, equally before and after the victory on the Moskowa, Napoleon was in the dark as to the real state of things. He wrote as follows to his Foreign Minister on the 10th of September:—

> Que l'ennemi a tout fait pour nous empêcher d'arriver à Moscou: qu'il fera tout pour nous en chasser. . . . Désormais l'ennemi, frappé au cœur, ne s'occupe plus que du cœur, et ne songe plus aux extrémités.

Eight days later he writes thus from Moscow:—

> Nous suivons l'ennemi, qui se retire au delà du Volga. (!) Nous avons trouvé une immense quantité de choses à Moscou, qui était une ville extrêmement belle. De deux cents ans la Russie ne se relèvera pas de la perte qu'elle fait. Ce n'est pas exagérer que de l'évaluer à un milliard.

* Correspondance de Napoléon Ier. Tomes 24 et 25. Paris: Plon.

Some notes, dictated by Napoleon in the beginning of October, balance the considerations in favour of different plans of retreat from the deserted city which he has now discovered by experience to be "a position of no importance, unable to entertain his sick and wounded, incapable of replacing its resources when once exhausted, and in no sense an organic centre of the Empire." He lays down that no operation on the southern or Kalouga side of Moscow would be worth attempting except in the view of drawing off from Kalouga on Smolensk, and that any such operation would give the Russian army a needless opportunity of claiming a victory, by picking up stragglers from the French rear-guard. "Un mouvement rétrograde de cent lieues, avec des blessés et des événements que l'ennemi peindrait à son gré, lui donnerait l'avantage dans l'opinion, quoique battu." The direct route to Smolensk would be shorter by five marches; there could be no attack from the rear; the men could carry a fortnight's rations for themselves, the convoys of provisions would meet them half way, and Smolensk would be reached without the need of marauding along the route. "On peut prévoir de l'embarras pour les fourrages: mais on s'en procurerait à deux ou trois lieues: ce ne serait donc pas là une difficulté de premier ordre." Still it would be a visible retreat to second-rate winter quarters only, and as such would place the Czar under no stress to submit to conditions of peace. Napoleon would have preferred to combine a defensive retreat with an offensive demonstration in the direction of St. Petersburg. A combined movement by Marshal Victor from Smolensk to the north, St. Cyr from Polotzk to the north-east, and Napoleon from Moscow west by north, would in less than a fortnight concentrate the main army north of the Dwina in a safe winter position, resting on the bases of Polotzk and Vitepsk, and threatening Novgorod and the northern capital. Under such pressure, "On doit croire que l'ennemi fera la paix."

It is needless to inquire what stubborn facts or later considerations were found incompatible with the realization of this manœuvre, "qui serait parfaite," as it was never attempted. But we may remark that, when Napoleon left Moscow some three weeks later, he first marched southward on Kalouga, fought a desperate battle at Malo-Jaroslawitz to pierce Kutusoff's position, and thence, with the loss of more than five marches, began his retrograde movement of a hundred leagues, to taste a far more bitter military experience than modern history had ever dreamed of. His Russian opponents—although regularly beaten, according to Napoleon's averments, on every occasion—had no need to gain an undue advantage in the eyes of Europe by exaggeration or false colouring when the wreck of the Grand Army had recrossed the frontier. A letter to the Duke of Bassano, written immediately after the passage of the Berezina, is perhaps the frankest admission ever made by Napoleon:—

> L'armée est nombreuse, mais débandée d'une manière affreuse Il faut quinze jours pour les remettre aux drapeaux, et quinze jours, où pourrait-on les avoir? Le froid, les privations ont débandé cette armée. Nous serons sur Vilna. pourrons-nous y tenir? Oui, si l'on peut y tenir huit jours. mais si l'on est attaqué les huit premiers jours, il est douteux que nous puissions rester là. Des vivres, des vivres, des vivres! sans cela il n'y a pas d'horreurs auxquelles cette masse indisciplinée ne se porte contre cette ville."

Even the famous 29th bulletin told the whole story only by implication, and unjustly charged the entire disaster to the severity of the weather after the 7th of November. Before that date, according to more accurate reporters, the French army had already dwindled to sixty thousand from the hundred and three thousand who had left Moscow on the 19th of October, under "le soleil et les belles journées du voyage de Fontainebleau."

ATHENS AND THE MOREA.*

LORD CARNARVON publishes in this little book some fragmentary journals kept by his father during a visit to Greece in the year 1839. The nature of such a book would almost protect it from criticism, if any criticism were necessary, but we may say at once that there is no fault to be found with it, except the negative fault of brevity and incompleteness. If the author were still living, we might perhaps complain that he had not told us a little more about the interesting scenery through which he passed. As it is, we must take what is given, and regret that the late Lord Carnarvon did not think it worth while to comply with the established custom of book-making. It is perfectly true that that custom has been extended beyond all reasonable or even tolerable limits; the slightest provocation is supposed to justify a traveller for plunging into print; and we have abundance of writers who are prepared to give us a complete theory of the political and social condition of any foreign country on the strength of six weeks' experience of its railways and hotels. Greece, however, is to some extent an exception; the intrinsic interest which it possesses, and its comparative freedom from the ravages of the British tourist, may be fairly alleged as excuses for what, in the case of most other countries, would savour of presumption. Lord Carnarvon visited it at a time sufficiently near to the War of Independence to see many of the actors, and to catch many interesting glimpses of an expiring order of things. The scattered notes now published by his son do not amount to anything like a systematic account of the country, or even of the author's travels; but they are pleasantly and freshly written, and may help to remind his successors of some picturesque scenes, and to preserve a few incidents characteristic of a curious phase of society.

The most interesting part of the journals is that which describes his visit to the Maina, whose inhabitants are descended either from the ancient Spartans, or from the Periœci, or from the Helots—or from somebody else. Whatever their ancestry—and they naturally prefer the Spartan theory—they are a wild and untameable race, who at the time of Lord Carnarvon's visit still preserved a strange kind of feudal existence. Murder, as the editor of the journals puts it, was "the organized and formulated expression of the national life"; a rather strained mode of expression, which seems to mean that they considered murder to be, on the whole, a reputable practice. Their system appears to have exceeded in ferocity even the Corsican vendetta, and, when once a feud was established between two families, it generally ceased only with the extirpation of the weaker. The clergy held that they had no business to interfere in matters concerning the point of honour; and an appeal to the courts of law, after the establishment of the new kingdom, was deprecated on the ground that, if they once went there, there would be no end to such matters. As it was, when two families quarrelled, each shut itself up in a strong tower, and the men kept a look-out from the battlements to guard against surprise, and to take an occasional shot at an enemy. Lord Carnarvon speaks of one man who was said to have passed his life of seventy years in a tower. Another young gentleman of very good family regretted to him that he was fit for nothing but fighting, having passed more than twenty out of his twenty-seven years in the same way; never going out except to steal along the ground and shoot an enemy. The women were invariably spared, in consequence of which their husbands used them, as carts are sometimes used for stalking game, to skulk behind them till within shot of an enemy. People who theorize about moral sentiments may inquire into the state of mind of a hospitable, brave, and honourable race who would not eat meat on Friday for the world, and at the same time consider murder a gentlemanlike diversion, and live on rather less friendly terms with their neighbours than a couple of ill-tempered dogs. The superstitions of these people were singularly wild and grotesque. They heard moaning sounds as they crept towards their enemy, and augured success or failure according to the quarter from which the sounds came. They held firmly to the less poetical superstition of platomancy, or divination by the appearance of the fresh bone in a shoulder of mutton. One of Lord Carnarvon's guides seems to have been a proficient in this art, as another attributed every misfortune which happened throughout the journey to the unseasonable appearance of a certain magpie. The wildest and most hideous superstition is that of the vampire; the Mainote variety of that ghastly creature being more than usually grotesque and horrible. Once on a time it seems a shoemaker died, in a certain house which was shown to Lord Carnarvon. He became a vampire, and used to visit his wife, and even work at his trade, every night except Saturday. The wife being driven by the consequences to confess, the villagers opened the tomb one Saturday, which day vampires, like Jews, keep sacred. They found him making shoes in his grave, and reproached him with his enormities. The vampire lost his temper, and threatened to revenge himself on one of the party; whereupon the villagers very properly cut him to bits, and each ate a bit of his heart. This, it seems, is an infallible specific against vampires, and stamped out the disease in that village. Another pleasant habit of these villages was to place a heap of stones over the grave of some one who had violated holy ground or in other ways made himself obnoxious. Every passer-by added a stone to the heap, in the hope that, the heavier it grew, the more quickly the sinner's soul would be pressed down to hell.

The warlike side of the Mainote character is illustrated by their hearty contempt for women At one place Lord Carnarvon happened to be present at a marriage; the bridegroom had already a wife, but explained that he was entitled to a second marriage, on the ground that his first had brought him no children. On further inquiry it turned out that he had indeed three daughters, but for such purposes daughters did not count. How could a man wish, as his friends remarked, to have anything to do with a woman who brought him no sons? This is an original ground for divorce, even in Greece, where the Oriental feeling about women is everywhere so strong.

These wild, semi-civilized Mainotes, with their very peculiar views of Christian morality, but who to an artistic eye are endeared by their fine figures, picturesque dresses, and rugged towers, are the most striking characters in the book; but we have many other slight sketches which are worth turning over. There are Albanian and Arcadian shepherds, performing in the most correct manner upon the ancient classical pipe. There are old leaders in the War of Independence, disgusted with the loss of their local influence under the power of the hated Bavarians, and still wearing Turkish costumes and grumbling that "everything had become Frank"; the peasants, it seems, sympathized more or less in the same regret, on the simpler ground—upon which the peasants in most countries succeed in regretting all changes—that their taxes had been increased. Two or three of the old chiefs are described with considerable force. There was, for example, Hadji Christo, who had been confined for two years by Ibrahim Pasha in a low dungeon, and stuck to the old Palikari dress as a symbol of his contempt for the foreign Court, but admitted that he felt a certain pride in appearing in his uniform as colonel; and the distinguished chief Colocotroni, now living in neglected retirement and poverty, but conversing with much dignity in long-winded metaphors, after the fashion of an ancient sage. Thus, when asked his opinion of certain negotiations with foreign Governments, he replied by an apologue of a man who once built a house with a door on the north; in deference to the advice of various well-meaning friends, he built it up, and transferred his door successively to the south, east, and west. Then he made a moveable house, and turned the door whichever way his friends suggested, till at last it occurred to him to build it in the way which he himself preferred, and keep to the arrangement in spite of any number of advisers. This opinion was pronounced more than a generation ago; but apparently the Greeks have not yet learnt to build their house according to their own fancy. We can only hope that they will learn to do so in time, and that when they have done it, they will find the result satisfactory.

We need not go further into a description of a book which is in truth slight enough, and which makes no pretensions to be anything more. Lord Carnarvon seems to have strung together the fragments of his father's journal with taste and judgment; and we need only recommend his work to those who care for a passing glimpse of a most interesting country at a transitional period of its existence. The old life of the Maina has died out before the gradual advance of civilization, but progress in Greece is not so rapid but that later travellers may recognise the truth of the descriptions, and meditate on the difficulty of restoring genuine vitality to a people with so many discordant and semi-barbarous elements. Perhaps, on a comparison of what the country is now with what it was thirty years ago, they may think that the development is not much slower than might have been fairly anticipated.

HARRY EGERTON.*

MR. TOTTENHAM, as his title-page boldly reminds us, is the author of a novel called Charlie Villars at Cambridge, of which, as he apologizes in the preface to his new book for its "singularly inartistic and youthful nature," we will say no more. When an author repents of his follies, they should be forgiven. Harry Egerton is a continuation of Charlie Villars, and we may admit, for we shall be able to say little more in its praise, that it is not so bad as its predecessor. That it has any positive merits would be a bold assertion, but it occasionally gives us reason to think that Mr. Tottenham could with care and practice do something better, and that, if he will burn his next half-dozen attempts, he may ultimately succeed in producing a readable book. So far as he has gone, it seems to be his impression that he should turn out upon the world the results of his experience as soon as he has acquired it. Charlie Villars tells us what he thought about Cambridge, and Harry Egerton gives us the results of his observation of London society. Mr. Tottenham evidently considers himself to be a satirist, destined to expose the shortcomings of the present day, and especially to supplement the views expressed by Mr. Thackeray. Of that author he speaks in a calmly patronizing tone, pointing out that he erred from over-enthusiasm, and believed too implicitly in the doctrine of "love in a cottage"; Mr. Tottenham, however, admits that he was a "vigorous thinker," but of course unable to regard the world from the serene heights from which Mr. Tottenham himself looks down. In short, he takes the attitude of a man of the world who has passed many years in contemplating society, and thereby he involuntarily reveals to the reader his own extreme youth. There is no age at which we deal out our vast stores of experience with such perfect complacency as at the period between twenty and twenty-five years of age. A little later Mr. Tottenham will perhaps discover that the preaching which he bestows upon us is not very original or very forcible, and by no means the kind of stuff to mix with a few commonplace incidents and publish as a three-volume novel.

The only way in which it is possible to derive any amusement from such a book is to consider it an illustration—not of the characters described—but of the state of mind of the young men who produce and consume this kind of literature. Of Mr. Tottenham himself we know nothing, and we should be very sorry to identify him with any of his own characters; but we can form from his pages some estimate of the mental furniture of his class. The very discursive nature of his writing leads him to touch upon all kinds of topics, and so to give us incidentally a very complete survey of what some young men are pleased to call their minds. Horse-racing in all its branches naturally fills a large space in his pages; we have the inevitable steeple-chase which figures in all sporting novels, and the equally threadbare scene of the wrong horse winning the Derby. There is an attempt at describing a cruise in a yacht, with a digression about Mr. Tennyson's house in the Isle of Wight; there is a bit about hunting, a bit about pheasant-shooting, a bit about salmon-fishing, and another about grouse-shooting. None of these descriptive passages have anything to do with the story; but we submit to them as part of the inevitable padding of all novels of fashionable life. We are more amazed by excursions into other fields of inquiry. Thus we are told in two or three pages what we ought to think about woman's rights; elsewhere we are instructed as to the merits of ritualism; and we are even indulged with a sermon—a good deal of which is quoted at full length, and which, as Mr. Tottenham assures us, is remarkably eloquent, and contains the whole pith of Christian morality. We confess that it is not unlike a sermon, but its other merits are less palpable. Then Mr. Tottenham gives us his views of the British stage and of popular novels. He talks eloquently about "the obscene crowd which nightly flocked last season to gaze with open-mouthed delight at the indecent exhibitions of a worn-out Phryne," and is equally severe upon the novel-readers who "delight to wallow in literary filth." It sickens one, he declares, with human nature, "to see how closely it is allied at one extreme"—the extreme, apparently, of popular novelists—"with that of devils." As if all these topics were not sufficient, Mr. Tottenham is kind enough to cram into a few pages at the end of his first volume the true theory of the Irish difficulty. Mr. Gladstone will be glad to hear that the Established Church should be abolished; but we have been a good deal misled upon some other points. The Irish peasantry, it seems, are generally willing to die for their landlords, with the exception of certain cases in which, owing to the landlords' own perversity, they prefer the inverse process. Meanwhile, if all landlords would do their duty and the Royal Family would visit Ireland, he is convinced that everything would be right. It is hard to come across a bit of undigested blue-book in the midst of a novel, but we must confess that we like this bit better than the rest of the book, for, if not particularly wise, it shows good feeling, and some interest in a rational subject of inquiry.

And now, having cleared away these subsidiary speculations, we come to the main purpose of Mr. Tottenham's book. There is, it seems, one great evil which he has set himself to expose—namely, the unfortunate condition of younger sons. The whole arrangements of the highest class of society are directed to the degradation and misery of those ill-treated beings. We say nothing of the slights endured at the hands of mothers and discerning chaperons, for the chase of eldest sons, and the plans for guarding against the designs of their brothers, have supplied innumerable novels with all the interest they possess. But the real grievance may be inferred from the case of Mr. Harry Egerton. This young gentleman having got into debt, his father refuses to have anything more to do with him, except paying him an allowance of two hundred a year. Under these melancholy circumstances the hero, with whom, by the way, we are expected to sympathize, is naturally reduced to utter misery. He continues, we are told, to wash down every delicacy of the season with champagne, for that is a way he has. He manages to get on for some time by sponging on his friends, and keeping out of the way of his creditors. Still, as he is always giving away half-crowns to crossing-sweepers and living in the best society, his two hundred a year is naturally insufficient. Two expedients help him on for a time; one is borrowing money from some good-natured people, who don't want him to return their loans, and the other is betting on the Turf. In a normal state of things, a young gentleman who pursues such a course is on a fair way to the dogs, and is likely to be provided for as a blackleg or a billiard marker. Accordingly Mr. Egerton, in spite of good luck for a time, finds himself at last owing four thousand pounds, with no available assets. But here Mr. Tottenham shrinks from the logical conclusion to his book. The moral is apparently that a younger son is placed by our social arrangements in so fearful a position that, unless he is possessed of superhuman virtue or ability, he must necessarily descend towards the most disreputable position in life. But as Mr. Egerton is the hero, we are presumed to love him. Consequently, by a brilliant device, his elder brother—who, like most elder brothers, as we are given to understand, is a monster of meanness and malevolence—suddenly turns out to be somebody else. Mr. Egerton becomes an only son, marries a charming young lady, and lives very happily ever afterwards. It must be admitted that this is a trifle improbable; but Mr. Tottenham's art in making plots is not of the most refined kind, as may be seen from one little incident. A knavish attorney is possessed of the secret on which the story turns. The only mode which occurs to him for discovering a gentleman of large property with a house in Eaton Place is to advertise in the Times, saying that if any one of the name of Egerton calls upon him, he will hear of something to his advantage; and a great deal depends on the difficulty of establishing a communication. The knavish attorney is obviously a villain of a very conventional kind, or he would have heard of such a compilation as the Post Office Directory.

If what Mr. Tottenham calls "the younger sons of the day" are really so great scamps as he represents, it is a blessing that in real life it seldom turns out that their elder brothers have been changed at nurse. According to this scathing satirist, the only occupation for which they are at all qualified is that of spending large amounts of money. Their conversation can only be printed by the help of numerous blanks, and even then there is only a minute portion of it which will bear to be more than roughly indicated. Their least immoral amusement is gambling on the Turf, and the Turf is a vast sink of corruption and cheating. The notion of making their own living in some decent profession never occurs to them for a moment, or only to be rejected on the ground of their utter ignorance of all useful knowledge. Nor, if any democrat should take advantage of this to abuse the bloated aristocracy, would he be encouraged by Mr. Tottenham to hope for better things. The morals of society have been ruined, so the model nobleman of the book tells us, by lowering the old exclusive barriers. Young men are rude because the practice of duelling has been given up. All good manners have given way because wealth has been allowed to raise low-minded people out of their natural mud into the sacred circles above. Many even of the highest class are terribly snobbish, but the class below them are even worse. The public suppose, we are told, that all officers in the Guards are models of what a gentleman should be; but Mr. Tottenham assures us that many Guardsmen "are ordinary young men enough, and some few would find a more congenial society at Aldershot." What that society is, he tells us in a description of two wretched captains from a Line regiment. These miserable creatures are hideously uncomfortable in the presence of ladies, and their only thought is to imitate the failings of their betters; their vice, according to Burke's maxim, is a double evil, because it acquires additional grossness. In short, if Mr. Tottenham is right, a large part of the highest society in the country is thoroughly contemptible, and society in its lower strata is not only contemptible, but disgusting.

We fancy, however, that, in spite of this terrible picture of the evils of the present day, we shall be able to get on somehow or other. There are younger sons who are not made in the likeness of Mr. Tottenham's pet Harry Egerton, and who would think him little better than the lower class of scamps whom he despises. Indeed the importance of Guardsmen and their fellows is not quite so great as Mr. Tottenham seems to fancy, and if they were all to be transported to-morrow we should not be hopelessly ruined. We need not now inquire what is the true condition of the society upon which these youthful spendthrifts are the hangers-on, nor whether they are specially abundant at the present day. Meanwhile there are two classes who may glance, not without profit, at Mr. Tottenham's book. Those who like to read about marquises and Guardsmen at any price may possibly enjoy it; and those whose duty it is to take care of the idle and rich young men, and occasionally to administer to them personal chastisement in their boyhood, may be glad to see a picture of their manners and customs drawn apparently from the inside.

THE EUPHRATES VALLEY ROUTE.*

To what cause is it owing, in our system of government, that statesmanship is so frequently found in subordinate departments or officers of the State, without capacity or intelligence or knowledge in the higher departments to utilize the ability at its command? As often as not, great social reforms are elaborated and argued outside of Government circles, although dependent on legislation to effect them; the real work of the political machine is, in fact, performed by other agencies, professional politicians too often only spoiling it, when it is at last forced on them, by their indolent inattention and their deficiency of solid knowledge. The loss is still more conspicuously felt in questions of administration and external policy. An Indian or a Colonial Empire grows up by hazard, without the central Government taking stock of its development or of the drift of events, or considering how the future, so far as it lies in their power, is to be cared for. Imperial questions are trifled with and put off, opportunities are missed, and great disasters happen. Perhaps the history of the Euphrates Valley question, which is suggested by the present publication, is as good an illustration as could be found of the frequent superiority of statesmanship in a subordinate position. Without attempting to answer the inquiry with which we started, or to hint at remedies, it may be useful to point out how a great question has been neglected, in spite of the most intelligent advocacy, and what further danger may arise, in this particular matter, from any prolongation of the apathy by which our policy has been marked.

The foresight of General Chesney and those who followed him in taking up the question of an overland route to India by the Euphrates Valley can hardly be too much commended. They displayed in the highest degree that faculty of combining historical knowledge with discernment of the facts and tendencies of the time which should belong to the ideal statesman, while the practical skill exhibited in working out the problem, and preparing the most exact information for the use of all concerned, showed the possession of gifts which, armed with more authority, would have ensured the completion of the scheme itself. This may seem strong language, but it can hardly be thought so when the narrative is looked at. Although all men are now agreed that the question is a most important one, and that the best route from England to India is by the Euphrates Valley, these things were not so obvious forty years ago. It seemed every way most convenient that a Power which commanded the sea should have its channel of communication by the openest and widest path, the broad ocean itself, and not by those inland seas and narrow channels to which the timid navigators of early times had been limited. Already, in the midst of the great wars at the commencement of the century, a statesmanlike Governor of India, the Marquis Wellesley, had organized an overland service by the Euphrates Valley; but the fact had fallen out of sight in high official quarters. It was quite of a piece with our habits of laissez-faire that, with the closing of one period of emergency, all thought of another time in which the same necessity would be felt—and felt more keenly, owing to the swift changes in other circumstances affecting the question—should be laid aside. What General Chesney and those who thought with him discerned, however, was that forces were at work which would cause trade to return to its ancient channels, and make it permanently expedient for England to have a shorter military road between England and India than that by the Cape. One of these new forces was the extension of civilized influence over Western Asia by Europe on one side and by our own Indian Empire on the other. The ancient routes of commerce between the Mediterranean and the East had been by the Nile and the Red Sea, and through Asia Minor in various directions, but mainly by the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf; and these routes had been abandoned to a great extent in consequence of the anarchy which had crept in with the decay of Mahommedan rule. The natural difficulties of an overland transport had counted for much, but political difficulties had also their share in giving importance to the ocean route. It could not but happen, then, that as the countries between England and India came to be better known, and the anarchic belt was narrowed, the idea of utilizing the ancient routes should once more be revived. But the most important new influence, which could hardly have been discerned by the Marquis Wellesley, was the application of steam to navigation. The natural difficulties of the transport between Europe and the East, through Egypt and Syria, had been aggravated by the tediousness of the navigation in sailing vessels. Not to speak of the necessity of transhipment, and of a journey overland of longer or shorter duration, the ocean voyage was practically as brief, or briefer. This condition was entirely changed by steam. By this agency the shortest route in distance became likewise the shortest in time, and, the difference in distance being enormous, the superiority of the old mediæval routes was at once restored. It required some faith nevertheless, before 1830, in the power of the new agency, to appreciate the revolution which it was producing; and this faith could only belong to the most thoughtful and foreseeing minds.

How the strategical necessities of the Empire were being changed was perhaps still less obvious. Even though the opening up of old routes brought India nearer to our rivals than to ourselves, there seemed nothing for it but that we should trust the sea rather than add to our burdens the command of the points of vantage on one or more of the shorter lines. But the burden was inevitable. Military exigencies are such that the shortest lines must be sought and held. With the introduction of steam the connexion between England and India necessarily involved a readiness to make use of the old roads for the conveyance of troops, and a determination to seize and hold them in any conflict with a Power which could menace our Imperial position. Another fact was also to be dimly discerned growing into importance—the gradual advance of Russia towards our Indian possessions. Before 1830, indeed, the Caucasus was still unconquered, and the Kirghiz desert was yet unentered by the heralds of those columns which have already carried Samarcand, and are now hovering over distant Kashgar and Yarkand, ready to threaten India on the north from a region of unsuspected wealth, and by roads unexpectedly found to be available through the "impassable" Himalayas. But the conquest both of the Caucasus and of Central Asia was evidently intended, and India had been sufficiently warned of the belief in Russia that attack was possible and probable. The plan for a Russo-French invasion of India, described in the secret articles of the Treaty of Tilsit —by Asterabad, Herat, and Candahar—could not but be deemed alarming. Facts like these already made it important that England should command a short route to her Indian Empire; and they were of such a kind as to make the question year by year more urgent.

The conditions of the problem being thus perceived, General Chesney was likewise right in his choice of the Euphrates Valley, and not of the route by Egypt, which was afterwards selected. The latter offered at the time perhaps the greatest immediate advantage at the least expense. The passage across the desert was short, and there was no river passage to cause a third transhipment, as was the case by the Euphrates. The advantage of speed was also in favour of the Egypt route on the home journey, the progress of steamers being delayed in their voyage against the current of the river. But these were very temporary advantages, which some care in removing obstructions to the navigation of the Euphrates might have gone far to remove, while other changes gave the latter the unquestioned superiority. The most important fact of all in its favour was its shortness. In measured distance it was shorter than the Egypt route by about the whole length of the Red Sea. By constructing a railway from the Mediterranean to a point on the Euphrates navigable for ocean steamers, the journey between England and India would be made shorter, by nearly a week, as compared with anything attainable on the rival line. In addition to being shorter in distance, it had the advantage of securing a longer journey by rail, which is quicker, distance for distance, than by steamer; and the sea between the head of the Persian Gulf and Bombay was on the whole more easily navigable than between the latter place and Suez. For military purposes the Euphrates route had also much in its favour. It promised to give us a footing both in Turkey and Persia, enabling us to wield an influence opposed to Russian progress, and furnishing a position from which we could move with ease to the protection of the whole intermediate country between the Mediterranean and India. To have discerned all this in substance before 1840 at least, when his survey was completed, was no small merit in General Chesney.

It is implied, in what we have said, that events have corroborated his view; and that they have done so supplies only the more ground for lamenting that statesmen not only refused to be taught by events, but persistently slighted those who were better informed and more far-seeing than themselves. It is hardly to be supposed that, if our public men had studied the question at all, the events of the last thirty years would have made so little impression on them as they have done. Of these the formation of the Suez Canal, and the conquest of the Caucasus and of Central Asia by the Russians, are far the most important. The former alone should have shown how thorough the change back to the old routes of commerce was going to be. General Chesney, in 1829, had come to the conclusion that the Suez canal was practicable, though he feared, in the circumstances of that time, the greatness of the expense; now, when the canal will soon be finished, whether it pays the shareholder or not, its natural effects on commerce cannot but follow. It is clearly our interest now that, if distance is to be annihilated, it should not be exclusively for the profit of the Mediterranean States. By introducing yet further improvements, by reducing to a comparative trifle the whole distance between England and India, we should diminish the importance of the advantage which those States have over us in their greater proximity to India. This is a politico-commercial reason, in the interests of the British Empire, for a route which has in its favour every purely commercial reason; and it throws on English statesmen all the more plainly the duty of promoting it. The effect of the conquest of the Caucasus and of Central Asia by Russia is yet more material in a military view. Russia is nearer than before to the route itself, and is a greater incubus on Persia and Turkey, so that a countervailing effort is needed; while her advance in Central Asia—especially when taken in connexion with the railways she is making in her own territory—is quickly bringing about a situation in which we shall hardly be able to reinforce from England any threatened point in India as soon as she could attack it. To make a line down the Euphrates Valley is the very least we can do to secure our own safety. It is the necessary complement of those fortifications which are already rising in the Punjaub as the consequence of Russian proximity. It is a symptom of late repentance on the part of our officials that the present publication has taken place by order of the Government. It should now be well understood that further delay may have the most serious consequences. In the meantime our Empire is less knit together than it might be for commercial and social ends, and, should a military pinch come, the want of the line might issue in a great disaster.

The present volume is not the most important which General Chesney has published as the fruit of his survey. The volumes which he issued in 1852, and the Report he submitted to Parliament of his preliminary survey, have long since placed before the world an encyclopædia of facts and opinions regarding the whole intermediate region between the Mediterranean and India, the ancient paths of conquest and of commerce, and its present population and resources. As a study of the Eastern question in Asia Minor and Persia, there is nothing to compete with these volumes. The volume now before us only sums up the record by showing the personal labour with which the results attained were won. As an authentic narrative of one of the most remarkable expeditions which have extended geographical and scientific knowledge, it cannot but command a large circle of readers, apart from the keen political interest which belongs to it. It is agreeably written, full of striking incidents, and has novelty enough to float any book of travels, though written so long after the event. There are few chapters more interesting in the records of English travel than those in which General Chesney describes his first solitary voyage down the great river; the herculean toil gone through in transporting the two steamers for the survey of the river overland from the Orontes, by ancient Antioch and Aleppo, to the Euphrates; the wrecking of one of the steamers in a storm on the Euphrates, throwing a cloud over the progress of the survey; and the labours at home, the disappointments and the sickness of hope deferred, which General Chesney had to bear patiently, first in getting his plans approved of, and then in getting his narrative published. For these reasons we have no doubt the book will be widely read; and there is much additional matter in the appendix, including a journey of Mr. Ainsworth's through Diarbekr and other parts of Asia Minor, to make the volume attractive. We must add one more remark. We have spoken of the frequent presence of statesmanship in the subordinate walks of government, and its absence in the higher. It further appears that the statesmanship, and the zealous patriotic labour to which it leads, are apt to go unrewarded. General Chesney, though he makes no complaint, assures us that he has gone through the enormous labour of study, research, composition, and putting through the press all his bulky volumes, without payment of any kind. In fact, the work has stood still from time to time in consequence of its requiring larger disbursements out of his own pocket than he felt himself justified in making; and if he has been repaid these expenses, or the greater part of them, it has only been after long delay. We trust that the day is far distant when General Chesney's example will not be followed, when patriotic enthusiasm will cease to impel people to spend time and money for a public object in which they have faith; but it is not wise to discourage or neglect the enlightened and zealous service which public spirit volunteers to render. Those who perform such service might at least be allowed the satisfaction of being listened to, and of knowing that their schemes were not taken up or laid aside without forethought and deliberation.

JUVENAL.*

THERE is so much that is unlike anything but itself in Roman satire, and especially in Juvenal's satires, that it is satisfactory to find two very competent scholars furnishing new and handy editions of the most trenchant of satirists within little more than a twelvemonth. What the "character Lucilianus" was in its day can only be gathered from fragments and tradition; and the reluctance of Horace to be provoked to seriousness by even the most crying of vices renders him fitter company for those who affect a laughing philosophy than such as hold that the ideal moralist should be one who is zealously affected in a good or sufficient matter. Juvenal was such a moralist, and his vigorous hexameters exhibit a freer and bolder license in rebuking vice than can be found elsewhere, either in the field of Roman satire, or in what filled its place in polished Athens—the hard hits and smart caricatures of the old comedy. Persius—so often coupled with Juvenal—breathes rather the air of the closet than of the street or forum. His skill at a picture fails to impress one with a sense of reality. And as to Martial, who wielded another weapon not unserviceable in the cause of morality, his epigrams have done their work when they have inflicted a momentary sting, and their personality aims less at abstract vice than at some current professor of it. Juvenal is the standard for a modern, who would handle the pen of satire, to set up for his imitation and study. Mr. Simcox says of him in his introduction, that "in the 16th and 17th centuries Juvenal would have written sermons." We should have no small faith in a Juvenalian discourse, if it could become the fashion again; for no keener-edged or more effective blade can be forged, whether its shape be poem, sermon, or social article, than satire of a cast and temper like that of the Roman master. Mr. Simcox strikes us as having but an imperfect sympathy with the author he has undertaken to edit, and as analysing his character and writings in a somewhat depreciatory tone. The great satirist's most wholesome feature—his vigorous outrightness—is perhaps not much in favour with a class of modern writers, who set much store by enigmatic smartness and subtleties to which none but the initiated possess the key. In honest appreciation of Juvenal Mr. Escott strikes us as presenting the better credentials of editorial fitness. Not but that both editors manifest a creditable amount of scholarship, and such thorough acquaintance with their author as enables them to make his writings as intelligible in a small-octavo volume as their predecessors of old could have done in bulky quartos.

We cannot pretend to much sympathy with those who, in the tone of Savage Landor, in an Imaginary Conversation between Southey and Porson, regards Juvenal's satires as "the most naked and impure of antiquity," and "as owing their preservation to the partiality of the Friars." The same cap would surely fit Attic comedy, which outmatches Juvenal in indecency, yet which we are not aware that Porson forswore. But a single sentence in the conversation referred to strikes us as having a germ of truth, to be noted by editors and translators. Porson is made to say that "a translator of Juvenal would open a public drain to look for a needle, and miss it." We do not hold to the first part of this dictum. Whatever may have been the case with earlier translators, there is reason to think that, were Juvenal to be retranslated now, he would not be found presentable in a guise perfectly "parliamentary"; and as for editing, the scholars whose editions lie before us evince the most sensitive vigilance lest even a suspicion of aught impure should be provoked by any note or comment. One of them ostracizes three satires bodily; the other—Mr. Escott—perhaps more considerately, contents himself with mutilating and "Bowdlerizing" those offenders. But the danger lies rather in the last words of Landor's sentence. The tendency of editors is to miss the needle, which often is not hidden after all, rather than in any way to emulate the public scavenger. A case of this occurs to us in the Fifth Satire:—

> Tu scabie frueris mali, quod in aggere rodit,
> Qui tegitur parmâ et galeâ, metuensque flagelli
> Discit ab hirsutâ jaculum torquere capellâ.

Here the consensus of opinion goes with Grangæus and most earlier commentators, in taking "qui tegitur—capellâ" to be a periphrasis for a "barbarian recruit," trained to hurl the javelin by a rough shaggy drill-master (hirsutâ capellâ). To this interpretation, Lobeck, Mayor, and, most recently, Mr. Simcox assent, the last-named editor deeming it fatal to the other interpretation, which originated with the "vetus Pithœi scholiastes" (namely, of a monkey munching an apple, and seated on a goat, from the back of which certain idle soldiers had taught it to ape military feats), that this would be the more amusing picture, and so, we are left to infer, the less likely to have emanated from Juvenal. Here certainly the needle is missing, but (barring the remark of Mr. Simcox that "ab equo jaculari" is not good Latin, which we should be loth to accept until all contemporary writers had been searched) we cannot see that those who take "capellâ" as a synonym for the "campi-doctor" are at all nearer to finding it than those who refer the word to the goat on which a monkey rides. A translator must elect which sense he will prefer, but an editor's wisdom will be to present both interpretations to his readers, indicating his preference, if he have one, and the grounds he has for it. This is Mr. Escott's course as to this passage, and though, through a couple of misprints, his reasoning does not come out so clearly as it might, the version to which he leans is presented satisfactorily in his first interpretation: "You have to eat a rotten apple, as bad as that gnawed on the boulevard by the monkey, which armed with shield and helmet, and in fear of the lash, has learnt to hurl a dart while perched on a goat's back."

In a passage, too, of the Tenth Satire, a fuss has been made about the missing needle which to eyes fairly sharp might be deemed superfluous. It runs—

> Vis certe pila, cohortes,
> Egregios equites, et castra domestica?

Here Mayor and others suppose the person addressed to covet for himself the primipilatus, the command of the cohorts, the select knights, and the "household troops"—steps of preferment one above the other. To this explanation Mr. Simcox is adverse, though it is not very clear what he would substitute for it; while Mr. Escott does not hesitate to side with those "who interpret Juvenal to mean, in the enumeration of these offices, the opportunity of promoting others to them, not the privilege of filling them directly oneself." In a case like this the true course is to seek light from the context, and it seems to us that we have but to run our eye up to "donare," two lines above, to find the ellipse needful to complete the sense, and justify our understanding the sentence of military patronage. In other cases Mr. Simcox is more helpful in throwing light upon places which have been needlessly darkened—e.g., in Sat. iii. 31–3,

> Quis facile est ædem conducere, flumina, portus,
> Siccandam eluviem, portandum ad busta cadaver,
> Et præbere caput dominâ venale sub hastâ;

where an examination of the structure of the sentence should convince any one that "præbere" is connected with "conducere," and that, if so, verse 33 cannot mean "and to contract for the sale of slaves by public auction," a sense which would require us to take "præbere" as equivalent to "prætbendum." Mr. Simcox rightly accepts the scholiast's interpretation, "and to run the risk of being sold as slaves in case of default," and refers the whole line to "a penalty for non-fulfilment of contract." Mr. Prior holds the same opinion, translating the 33rd verse, "And offer themselves for sale under the despotic spear," but he confuses with this correct view the other, which we have shown to be untenable, in adding that the meaning is "to do any ser ile work you please." In another line (v. 44) of the same satire, no other editor lets us so clearly, and in so few words, into the twofold force of the expression "Ranarum viscera nunquam Inspexi." Mr. Simcox's brief note, "Ostensibly as an aruspex, really as a poisoner," hits the point implied in "ranarum," as well as that of inspection of entrails. Further on, at verse 105, we prefer the reading followed by Mr. Escott in his note (his text, by the way, does not tally with it), "A facie jactare manus," and his interpretation of it, involving "alienum," in the preceding line, to Simcox's reading "alienâ a facie," &c.

The specialty of Mr. Simcox's edition is his maintenance, where possible, of the most difficult and obscure manuscript readings. This leads him into passing sarcasms, in notes so brief as to recall the adage of "fluctus in simpulo," at texts made easy by lazy emendators. One case of his retention of the harder reading is the line a line referring to chefs-d'œuvre of Euphranos and Polycletus, stolen probably from temples to present to rich men's new mansions. Mr. Simcox owns that he knows of no recommendation for "Phæcasianorum" (from "phæcasium," the white woollen shoe of a priest), instead of "Hæc Asianorum," the alternative of Pithou and the scholiast, except that "potior lectio est difficillima." "Hæc Asianorum," having reference to "horrida mater" in v. 212, is so awkward that Jahn ventured upon changing "hæc" into "hic." If "Hæc" is retained, we can but look on it as the old plural nominative feminine for "Hæ," by no means uncommon in Terence and Plautus. But a spice of Mr. Simcox's tenacity of old readings prompts us to do battle for "Phæcasianorum" in the sense of "Gods slow to claim their own," gods who for a time acquiesce in the sacrilegious spoliation of their shrines. The proverb "Dii lanatos pedes habent" comes from Petronius; and Petronius is the authority too for "phæcasium," meaning "a white woollen shoe." It is a sheer guess, but looking at the date of Petronius, and the possibility that a satirist might allude to a current proverb without endorsing its sense of sure silent vengeance, so much as that of slowness and lagging not less involved in "shoes of wool," we may venture to broach it in the absence of other conjectures, probable or improbable. That Mr. Simcox sometimes pushes this preference for the harder reading to a fault may be gathered from his printing at iii. 54, "Si pudor est de se, pulvino surgat equestri," because such is the reading of the scholiast and probably Pithou's MS. instead of the usual manuscript reading "Si pudor est, et de," &c. This, he says with a sneer, is neater and less vigorous. In explaining a passage by a few telling English words he is often very successful, as where, at iv. 80, "Omnia . . . tractanda putabat inermi Justitiâ," he renders this portion of the character of Pegasus, "He thought he did his duty in practising justice himself, without doing battle to withstand Domitian and chastise his favourites." This paraphrase of "inermi justitiâ" seems exactly to meet the sense, which is that Pegasus was not of the Judge Gascoine stamp, and which is borne out by v. 89, "Nunquam direxit brachia contra Torrentem," and 93, "His armis atque illâ tutus in aulâ." Often, however, we have to find fault in Mr. Simcox's notes with the extreme condensation of his explanatory sentences —a condensation which induces ambiguity, and not unfrequently seems to savour of affectation. For this reason we should prefer in some respects Mr. Escott's Juvenal, which, though a less showy, more matter-of-fact piece of editing, is in the main very sound, workmanlike, and trustworthy. We have already noticed his praiseworthy habit of passing in review all the current interpretations of a hard line or passage, and indicating, where he can help the student, to which of them he inclines. We have noticed that this process is adopted in other classics of Virtue's series, many volumes of which deserve high credit for their sound work and extremely moderate price. We wish we could overlook the one fault of the Juvenal of the series, on which we condole with its very capable editor—its vexatious typographical errors; but this is a drawback which we hope to see remedied. We have lit upon very few mistakes, however trivial, which can be attributed to the editor himself, though he can hardly expect us to endorse his rendering of "suberant" (iv. 60), "approached," or to agree with him in making "Polyxena" (x. 271, note), and not "Hecuba," the widow of Priam who underwent metamorphosis. On the other hand, he has many high virtues as an editor; his "construes" are often very neat—e.g., iii. 114, "Transi gymnasia," "Quit the playgrounds of vice"; iv. 38, "Calvo Neroni," "a bald edition of Nero"; v. 98, "Quod captator emat Lænas, Aurelia vendat," "Something for Lænas, the fortune-hunter, to buy, and for Aurelia, the rich old woman to whom he sends it, to sell." In other passages he shows considerable ingenuity, as where, on x. 8–9, "Nocitura togâ, nocitura petuntur Militiâ," he suggests that "togâ" and "militiâ" are the abstract for the concrete. "Statesman and warrior alike pray for what is injurious"; an interpretation which squares admirably with the illustrations that follow in the text of the satire. At x. 230, where a sketch is given of a helpless old man only able to open his mouth for food to be put into it, "ceu pullus hirundinis," he is surely right in taking "ipse" to refer to the subject—the impotent old man, rather than, as Simcox does, to mean "of his own accord."

Very often both the editors whom we have been criticizing agree in their interpretations, and that too where there is plenty of margin to differ. Mr. Escott's introductory matter strikes us as the more useful for the general purposes of the student, and as going over more ground in a style less speculative than that of Mr. Simcox. Both, however, have their value; and though, single-handed, we had rather study the satirist with the ready-to-hand help of the former, it would be unjust to deny that considerable light may be derived, for his dark places, from the more dashing brilliancy of the latter, which does not lack either solid scholarship or critical acumen.

DEAN BOYD ON THE PRAYER-BOOK.*

WE have before now had occasion to refer to that modest and interesting body which, with a delicate appreciation of the attitude of the pious Pharisee in the parable, styles itself the "Christian Young Men's Association." It does not, we believe, very often happen that men of any real mark select this community of model Christians as the depositary of their confidences; nor have they perhaps much encouragement to do so. Some years ago Dr. Vaughan, who was then Head-Master of Harrow, came up to London to deliver a lecture on Cicero before them; but the Christian youths, who were expecting a far racier entertainment from no less illustrious a personage than Dr. Binney "to follow"—as the phraseology of the pothouse would have it—expressed their gratitude for his kindness by such a continuous chorus of groans, hootings, and hisses that it was with great difficulty the lecture could be got through at all. We can quite believe that the Dean of Exeter found a more congenial audience in that city for his lecture on the Prayer-book. Dr. Boyd was well known as a popular Evangelical preacher, first at Cheltenham and afterwards at Paddington, till he was transferred to his present post in the exercise of that admirable discrimination which invariably suggested to Mr. Disraeli those divines who were believed to have least sympathy with the cathedral services as the proper occupants of deaneries. It is highly to the credit of the new Dean that he should have employed his leisure hours at Exeter in the endeavour to acquire some acquaintance with the history of those services in which he is now so frequently obliged to take part. But one may be permitted to regret, for his own sake, that he should not have deferred his laudable attempt to revive the flagging devotion of "the members of the Exeter Young Men's Christian Association" to the Church by a discourse on "the History of our National Prayer-book," till he had got up his lesson a little more perfectly. It is right, no doubt, "to be thankful for sma' mercies," and it is something that an Evangelical dean should have so many civil things to say about the Prayer-book at all. Still there are occasions when the er "Save me from my friends" is almost forced from one's and it is possible to praise even "our incomparable Liturgy" with more fervour than appreciation. The Dean is undoubtedly correct in his opening remark, that "the history of our National Prayer-book is anything but generally understood or known." The question is, whether his lecture is likely to dispel the prevalent ignorance or to deepen it. Of that our readers shall have an opportunity of judging for themselves.

* The Book of Common Prayer. A Lecture. By Archibald Boyd, D.D., Dean of Exeter. Exeter: Eland. London: Seeley, Jackson, & Halliday. 1869.

The lecture commences with a studied, not to say stilted, defence of what the writer calls "precomposed," as distinguished from "un-precomposed prayers," chiefly because they are "avowals and assertions of great doctrinal truths"—an admission which High-Church readers may be disposed to make more use of than the Dean would quite relish, considering what sort of doctrinal truths are contained, for instance, in the Baptismal Service. The Dean subjoins an historical argument based on our using the same "prayers which Jerusalem, Antioch, and Cappadocia used," which is apparently a graceful allusion to the "three great Liturgies existing," we are elsewhere informed, in the early Church, "that of Basil, that of Chrysostom, and that of Antioch." We had always supposed there were four great families of Liturgies traditionally ascribed to St. James, St. John, St. Mark, and St. Peter. The Liturgy of St. Peter, though prevailing over the whole Western Church, was too Popish perhaps to deserve even a passing mention, but why are St. John and St. Mark so summarily ignored? The Dean's notion of the early Liturgies is altogether a very singular one. He tells us that "Chrysostom in one of his homilies thus noticed that Prayer in the Communion Service which is called the Bidding Prayer." This rather puzzled us, as "the Bidding Prayer"—which moreover is not a prayer in the Communion Service at all, but a prayer used in Cathedrals and University Churches before the sermon—was introduced by the English Reformers. What could St. Chrysostom, therefore, know about it? On reading the extract from his homily our perplexity was removed, though our amazement at the Dean's language was rather increased than otherwise. It is simply a reference to the Consecration Prayer, or Canon, as it is usually called, in the Eucharistic Liturgy, where, says St. Chrysostom, "we are bid to approach a gracious God, for bishops, for presbyters, for emperors, for kings, for sea and land, and for all the world." The word "bid" has evidently misled Dr. Boyd, but none who had the slightest acquaintance with the mere alphabet of liturgical knowledge could have fallen into so ludicrous a blunder. He is more intelligible, if not more fortunate, in an argumentum ad hominem addressed to Dissenters who object to forms of prayer, but do not object "to read or sing the well-known hymn"—we are ashamed to confess we never heard of it before—

> Come, Thou Fount of every blessing,
> Tune my heart to sing Thy grace.

May we be pardoned for observing that, if this was a fair specimen of liturgical forms, we should prefer on the whole—Antioch and Cappadocia notwithstanding—to do without them? One feels so hopelessly bewildered under a dispensation where fountains undertake the task of tuning, and "hearts" (can it be a misprint for harps?), having first been "tuned," forthwith begin "to sing," that the ritual, if adapted to the worship of the New Jerusalem, seems hardly suited for this fallen world.

But it is time to follow the Dean into his account of the Anglican Prayer-book. He thinks it of course "scarcely necessary to dwell" on the Liturgies which existed in England before the Reformation, from which almost every word of it is taken: for did not "the Liturgy or Mass Service fully represent the superstitions or doctrinal errors into which the Romish Church had fallen"? So, like St. Peter's, St. Mark's, and St. John's before, the less said or known about it the better. "The abomination stood in the Holy Place; and the cleansing of the Sanctuary which the sixteenth century witnessed necessitated the construction of a Liturgy for the Reformed Church." This is not a very hopeful beginning. But let us come to details:—

> The first attempt at a Liturgy in the days of Henry was meagre and unsatisfactory enough. It was the mass book of Rome, with the addition of a few Collects and Hymns, the Creed, Commandments, and Lord's Prayer. It was Rome with English additions, and it remained for the son of the first Protestant King of England to improve upon, and to advance beyond the halting steps of his father.

We need not dwell on the very odd description of Henry VIII., who would probably have made short work of any one who dared to call him a Protestant king. But what evil genius prompted Dean Boyd to crowd such a portentous string of elementary blunders into a single line? There was no alteration of the Missal during Henry's reign, except the striking out of one or two festivals. Collects, Hymns, Creed, and Lord's Prayer, it had as it always had, and as the Roman Missal has still, though the Hymns—which mean, we suppose, certain Graduals and Sequences—were omitted from Edward's Reformed Liturgy. The Commandments, as every one knows except Dr. Boyd, were first inserted in the Second Book of Edward VI. We are next informed that "the system of Rome encouraged all to come to the celebration of the High Mass and the participation of the Low." What distinction is intended here? Does the Dean mean that they were encouraged to come to Communion at the Low Mass? Probably he does, for he talks immediately afterwards of the priest "administering Mass to himself." Yet he can hardly object to that. Still more mysterious is his statement that the command not to come to Communion "unless prepared" was "a Protestant usage" introduced by the Reformers. There was a previous rule that persons should not come to Communion without previous confession, which rule the Reformers abrogated. This was the only new "command" of any sort which they introduced on the matter; and it is at least a very odd way of describing it to call it an order that none should come unprepared. Confession may be a very bad thing, but coming to the Sacrament without confession and coming with preparation are hardly synonymous. It is equally incorrect to say that "the compulsory withdrawal of the people" from the celebration, and "the non-oblation of the elements," were "features" of Edward's First Book, which contained a form for oblation of the elements translated almost verbatim from the Latin Missal. And it may be worth noticing as a proof of Dean Boyd's tolerant and charitable temper, that he considers Elizabeth to have "compromised the independence of the nation" by striking out of the Litany the edifying petition inserted under Edward—which by the way he misquotes—"From the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities, Good Lord deliver us."

It was not of course to be expected that an Evangelical lecturer would miss the opportunity of delivering his testimony on "the Eucharistic vestments," in discoursing on the Prayer-book. But we were hardly prepared for Dean Boyd's very remarkable method of disposing of the difficulty. After quoting the too famous Ornaments Rubric, he first proceeds, by a piece of legerdemain which utterly baffles our comprehension, to prove that "the second year of Edward VI."—when the vestments were worn—clearly means the last year of Edward, when they had been forbidden. And then he adds that "if any doubt on that point remained"—as we humbly submit is certainly the case—it would be dispelled by an injunction of Bishop Ridley's to his clergy against "showing the Sacrament openly or making any elevation thereof," which is very like arguing that an order not to put up your umbrella involves a prohibition to put on your coat. After this specimen of reasoning, we are not surprised that the Hampton Court Conference, which tells very little for the Dean's view of things, is dismissed in a few unmeaning sentences. The Caroline revision cannot of course be quite so easily passed over with a wet sponge, and here accordingly the real point of the question is simply merged in a maze of grandiloquent verbiage. Students of English history will be interested to learn that "the rebellion which laid in the dust the throne, the sceptre, and the mitre," was originally due, not to ship-money, not to the excess of royal prerogative, or the growing power of the Commons, or any of the other causes to which historians have usually traced it, but to the "suspicion that the mass was coming back on England" under Laud's auspices. The Savoy Conference is dealt with at some length, and many ingenious reasons are given to show why no concessions were made to the Puritans, and that the changes actually made were nevertheless in a Protestant direction instead of the reverse. On this latter point the lecturer's argument is not easy to follow. We fail, for instance, to see any important difference, or indeed any difference at all, between the sick man being ordered "to make confession," and "to be moved to make confession"; if anything, the latter direction seems the stronger. Nor is it easy to see how the doctrine of absolution is affected by the priest being directed to absolve him "if he humbly desire it." Does Dean Boyd suppose the absolution of unwilling subjects to be part of the Romish doctrine? He is still less happy in urging that "the general confession of the Communion Service was to be made, according to the former Rubric, by the priest himself, but, under the altered one, by one of the ministers," as an example of Protestant tendencies, for in this point the altered Rubric is a return to the direction of the Roman Missal. These are mere quibbles. But we have a much more serious complaint to make of the remark which follows, telling us that "to dispel the idea that any adoration of the elements was implied in the act of kneeling," the Black Rubric was re-introduced by the Caroline revisionists. Dean Boyd had referred to this Rubric, at its first introduction under Elizabeth, and for once correctly, as a protest against "an essential presence of Christ's actual flesh and blood." He can hardly be unaware that when the Rubric was restored in 1662 the word "essential" was struck out, and "corporal" substituted for it; yet of this he drops not the slightest hint, though he must know that High Churchmen, rightly or wrongly, attribute a crucial importance to the change. They may be mistaken in their view, and it was open to the Dean, if he so pleased, to insist that they are. What was not open to him was to pass over in silence a fact which, primâ facie at least, seems to destroy the force of his argument. It is a minor indication of the same spirit that he makes no reference to several additions and alterations introduced at the same time into the Communion Service, none of them perhaps very important in themselves, but all pointing in a retrograde direction as contrasted with the Second Prayer-book of Edward VI.

We have been obliged to find much fault with Dean Boyd's lecture, which is indeed little else than a catena of blunders and bad logic from beginning to end. On one point, however, he seems to us to have spoken very sensibly, and as the Act of Uniformity has been so liberally abused of late from very opposite quarters—Dean Stanley, if we remember right, styled it "atrocious"—it may be well to recall people's minds to the simple facts of the case, which are stated in the following passage impartially enough:—

> As it was, the Act went forth requiring "the assent and consent of Ministers to all contained in the Book;" men being granted to the 24th August to make up their minds as to giving or refusing their adherence to it. It was the severity of this measure which ejected 2,000 from their preferments. A harsh and severe measure surely, for it barely allowed the parties most concerned time to study and compare with their own consciences, the Book appended to the Act. Yet, it ought not to be forgotten, that several years before, the intolerance of the Commonwealth cast the Episcopalian Ministers out of their houses and offices. If the Nonconformists were ejected by the stringency of the Act of Uniformity from homes and parishes, it should be remembered that an answer is due to the question "How did they come there?" And, never must we lose sight of the fact, that the Act of Uniformity was not an ecclesiastical, but a political measure, for it was not passed by Conference or Convocation, but by the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled.

THE GIRLS OF FEVERSHAM.*

MRS. ROSS CHURCH amply redeems the pledge she gives in her dedication, and we freely confess that, from her first page to her last, there is not a line that can be fairly called sensational in any sense of the word. We doubt, indeed, if situations the most thrilling could have awakened in us anything more than a languid desire that their victims might have a speedy and happy release. As it is, the tale is eminently uneventful, and its characters, so far as we can trace their features at all, are extravagantly commonplace. We know that rural felicity has its shady side, and that what poets sing may be terribly dull when translated into prose. Feversham, within a ride of Cromer, and consequently beyond the reach of railways, was likely to be especially so; but why reproduce it in its realistic monotony? Many a sweet flower, we are aware, is born to blush unseen, and the author might have found in many a parochial belle the materials for an enchanting study. But really we think she would have exercised a wise discretion in leaving the Girls of Feversham to waste their fragrance on their desert air. With a joint-stock company of half a dozen heroines, we may look for lovemaking in plenty, and love of a sort we have in abundance. But although the author speaks or hints of unsuspected depths of tenderness, wherever we turn we seem to see to the unromantic bottom of some very shallow soul, with nothing more exciting than a ripple stirring on the surface. The author evidently does not care, or does not dare, to grapple with and analyse a subtle emotion or an earnest passion. She leaves us to infer that they are there, or have been there, by sketching a soured mind or a wasted body, like the child who has to write a name under the animal he aspires to depict. As the ideal of an inflammable neighbourhood, the conception of Feversham is good and bold. Every one under five-and-fifty falls in love with one or more persons, as the case may be, generally at first sight and necessarily often at cross purposes.

The Girls of Feversham, strictly so called, are, we presume, the daughters of Mr. Ripley, a wealthy gentleman-farmer. Although pretty, they are very unattractive, but this is perhaps rather their misfortune than their fault. They have grown up motherless, and their father lets them do very much as they like; he gives them the run of his stables and orchards, and their chief pleasures seem to be early dinners and heavy teas, with razzias on the fruit-trees between times, and an occasional ride or game at croquet, to correct, as we presume, the effects of these indiscretions. He vetoes strictly anything like intellectual pleasure, and denies them even an occasional box from Mudie. He is queerly inconsistent in his parsimony, for he grudges a tallow candle, while he places a groom at their disposal when they choose to ride. Their bodies thrive while their minds run to seed, and the system makes a trio of vapid hoydens. Their neighbour, Miss Pelham, is the paragon of the book, and has had many more advantages. She is only daughter to Admiral Pelham, a landed proprietor, and extremely highly connected. Were she not presented as a model of ladylike refinement, we should have said her style of talk verged on the vulgar, or at least that it would have been more in place in the mouth of one of her father's midshipmen. When she does not address him as "Old boy" or "Dear old boy," she always speaks of the pater, a word singularly disenchanting in the mouth of a girl. When, in the middle of the story, the Admiral commands her somewhat arbitrarily to break off her relations with the Ripleys, on the ground of their not being fit companions for her, we only think it might have saved some deterioration of manner had he done so earlier. When his daughter objects that her friends are "perfect ladies," we cannot help questioning whether she is much of a judge. Mary Pelham, we should say, is one of those girls one not unfrequently meets, who queen it in the family circle where they are quite at their ease, and accustomed to have their pertness accepted as wit and their noisy laughter as humour, and who are in a chronic state of blushes and stuttering when taken out into society. The fifth and funniest of the charmers of Feversham is her relation and guest, Rosalind Marsh, who comes down to the country from the town with manners as artificial as her person. She brings with her dark and terrible experiences of life, which find vent in strange inuendoes and fragments of cynical philosophy that suspiciously resemble plagiarisms from novels like the Girls of Feversham. She bursts on the congregation at the village church in a gigantic chignon and an invisible bonnet; powders, paints, and traces veins on her forehead; has bold manners and bolder eyes, which she uses with a freedom that might snare boys, but which would, we should have supposed, send a man of sense or of the world shuddering away. She is a chartered heart-breaker, laying herself out to win hearts only that she may throw them aside. No fish are too paltry for her nets. Her first and youngest victim at Feversham is Corney Ripley, a shy lout of a boy whom she makes fierce love to at first sight, and who ere long snatches nearly unreproved a kiss from her lacquered lips. Numbers two and three are Messrs. Shawe, senior and junior, the parish clergyman and his son. Mr. Shawe the elder is presented as a thoughtful and earnest Christian, who rescues Mary Pelham later from the toils of Ritualism, probing the wounds love has left in her bleeding heart, with the conscious courage of a priest who knows that his tenderness and elevated sympathies are purely professional, and not to be mistaken for anything else. He nurses a life-long sorrow of his own too, and, having killed his wife by a melancholy accident, expiates this involuntary crime by undying regret; nevertheless, the chignoned and powdered apparition has power to cast a flood of sunshine on the chastened gloom of his soul, and at his first interview with Miss Marsh he indulges such badinage as this:—

> "I am afraid Mr. Shawe will vote me a lost sheep," said Rosalind Marsh, bringing her wonderful eyes to bear upon the rector's face.
> "One that would well repay the trouble of seeking, at any rate," he replied, as he thought that he had never seen such eyes in the world before.

The enchantress who lures the melancholy rector into pretty speeches at their first meeting casts her spell simultaneously over his son. Not having heard the tone in which his venerated parent addresses their common idol, he congratulates himself on the paternal partiality which the rector displays for her, and counts on his approval and co-operation in forwarding his own wishes. Tossing on a sleepless pillow, he overhears his father at his midnight orisons, and in them he catches the name of Rosalind. In a fervour of gratitude he has sat up in bed, preparatory to springing out of it into his father's arms, when the context that comes to his ears changes him to a statue, for he learns that his father is wrestling in his own behalf. A very pretty kettle of fish Miss Marsh has made in that household. The only advances she discourages are those that seem best worth encouraging. Her reasons we are left to guess at, for principles are not likely to stand in the way of the vengeance she has vowed on all males, and she could best have served her friend by exposing the want of principle of her friend's lover. Lord Augmering has come down to the Admiral's as the betrothed of his daughter. It puzzles us at first whether this terrible Don Giovanni is intended for a wolf in a donkey's hide or a donkey pure and simple. His cool audacity augurs the one, his simplicity and want of manner the other. The Admiral's house must have been Liberty Hall, and its motto honi soit qui mal y pense. The very evening that the family return home, bringing his lordship with them, that gentleman leaves his host, who is also a smoker, and goes out to enjoy a cigar in the grounds. There he meets the youngest Miss Ripley on the prowl, and they proceed immediately to hot flirtation. That over, instead of hurrying back in the guiltiness of his conscience to pay redoubled attentions to Miss Pelham, he "stands for a quarter of an hour chaffing a rosy-cheeked milkmaid who was loitering by the poultry yard." Although both scenes pass close to the house, and it may be imagined many a pair of eyes must have been inquisitive enough about their young lady's lover, he neither fears nor suffers detection. He does not sparkle in his talk; but when lovers of any sort are rare, and titles unheard of, smiles are lightly provoked. The following is one of the gems of the dialogue:—

> "Suppose what?" said Lord Augmering; "that I should eat you?"
> "Oh no," smiling at the idea, "but suppose some one should see."

Finally his weak flirtation with Alice Ripley, carried on with much embracing and kissing, in which he means neither good nor evil but is the mere creature of circumstances, ends in the elopement that yokes him with a wife who in brains and virtue is every way worthy of her husband. The elopement, with the incidents that prelude it in the Ripleys' house, is the most artistically dramatic scene in the book. Alice Ripley, who has as little heart as head—and that is saying a good deal—plays her simple and successful plot to abstract the door-key, which is kept in a basket in her sister's room. From Scott's Abbot downwards the abstraction of keys has been a favourite incident with novelists, but we must give Mrs. Church all credit for ingenuity. Had it been by a man, we should have said the sketch bordered on the sensuous. Enter Alice with "her robe de chambre thrown over her nightdress," and "without stockings too," as her sister maternally remarks. "Kicking off both her slippers into the air, and throwing her dressing-gown upon the bed . . . . she flew to the other end of the apartment, and holding out her flowing nightdress in her hands, commenced to dance before her sister." She enacts the pet of the ballet, Salome dancing before Herod, &c.; and it is while Alice is yet pirouetting as Salome, "with flushed face and white shoulders, off which the nightdress had partly fallen," that the maid who is her accomplice steals the keys. We thought at first that these bacchanalian tableaux had been symptoms of hysterical excitement on the eve of the child's leaving her family. They turn out, however, to have been cold-blooded guile, and so she must have been what Mrs. Church gives us no reason to suppose elsewhere, not merely a fool but a monster. Alice Ripley having carried off Miss Pelham's lover, the latter young lady takes to wearing the willow with a smiling face and an aching heart. For change of scene she leaves home with a cousin, who is sad-faced and resigned, and of course also the victim of misplaced attachment and designing men. Mary, taking refuge in Ritualism, goes as far as confession. She erects a private altar, which she drapes in "red petticoats," and is asked scandalous questions, and answers them in humble faith. If Mrs. Church's novel has an object, it is the laughing down of Ritualism; but we question whether this exceedingly lightly-armed auxiliary will scatter much dismay in the ranks of the ceremonialists. While Miss Pelham is soothing her pains with the distractions and consolations of Anglo-Romanism, her friend and fellow-sufferer, Miss Ripley, having nothing of the kind to fall back on, has let her mind prey upon itself. She and young Mr. Pelham are desperately in love with each other. We see or hear so little of the growth of their attachment, that really we cannot be fairly called on for more than a very general sympathy. The stern parents on either side have quarrelled and forbidden communication; Ursula wasting to a shadow, and the Admiral, when he happens one day to visit at the farm, is intensely shocked at the change he sees. We fear that either he or Ursula must have sadly neglected their religious duties, or, worshipping as they did in the same little church, he could hardly have escaped perceiving it before. However, it is evident that a shock of the sort was necessary to shake his sternness and intense family pride. It has the desired effect. He softens, and straightway writes for his son, who comes, cures, and marries, and the curtain drops on at least one happy couple. Unluckily they are the pair whose concerns we are supposed to take the least interest in, and their good fortune does not recompense us for the wretched fiasco which all the others make of it. We surmise that about now Mrs. Church had got thoroughly tired of her personages, and decided on cutting a three-volume novel down into two. At least that is the most charitable way of accounting for her impotent conclusion. They are all disposed of summarily and abruptly in a couple of pages, and by an imaginary dream. Mary Pelham is the heroine, if any one is, and the author dismisses her and closes the book thus:—

> But will she love again?
>
> For my own part, I see no reason why she should not.
>
> Hearts are seldom the worse and often the better for knowing what it is to have been sorely wounded, and to have healed again from the force of their own healthy organization.
> And as for a husband, they certainly are not plentiful at Feversham, but Mary Pelham might go farther and fare worse than Lucien Barrington Shawe

Or than Mr. Noakes, or Mr. Styles, or any one else. But considering that Miss Pelham and Mr. Shawe have never shown the slightest approach to mutually tender feelings—that, on the contrary, each has been represented as passionately in love with some one else—we must say that we feel we are treated cavalierly. We have a right to protest against Mrs. Church's palming off upon us this torso, beautiful as it may be, as a finished work of art.

KONEWKA'S SILHOUETTES OF THE *MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

THE Germans, it has been said, are better acquainted with Shakspeare than we are. Long ago they possessed three capital versions of the poet's plays, while as for "their criticisms," writes Mr. Carlyle, "no such clear judgment or hearty appreciation of Shakspeare's merits has ever been exhibited by any critic of our own." In like manner it may be said of the work before us, that few if any of our artists have so nicely discriminated the poet's meaning, or given to his characters such artistic embodiment. It has been prettily put that poetry possesses a "garment," a "body," and a "soul." And Germans, whether critics, commentators, or artists, are usually presumed to have much of the transcendental quality which Mr. Emerson designates as the "over-soul." Certainly Herr Konewka's four-and-twenty designs are instinct with poetry, both in thought and form. As to the "garment" of pictorial art they are somewhat scanty, as to the "body" they are ideal in type, and as to "soul" they are, to use a term somewhat repulsive to plain English speech, eminently "æsthetic." The Germans prove themselves good translators, whether the language they use be verbal or pictorial; they are endowed with a certain metaphysical intuition of mental conditions; they are able to throw themselves as it were into national attitudes, to realize historic situations. Speaking generally, they appreciate the conditions of genius, and place themselves readily in the position of great minds when in the act of creating. Thus men like Goethe, Schiller, and the brothers Schlegel were able to bring vividly before the imaginations of their fellow-countrymen scenes in the national drama of England, and to reproduce in the German tongue poems which have long lived in the literature of our own people. We do not pretend to assert that Herr Konewka, of whom we have hitherto known little or nothing—and whom we may possibly be mistaken in assuming to be a German by birth, though his art is distinctly German—will by the work before us win a position side by side with the illustrious men just named. But the above recital may at least indicate how the artist can best be appreciated. Thus these illustrations of the Midsummer Night's Dream come as the vital issue of preceding and existing conditions; they are the natural product of that love of Shakspeare, that æsthetic culture, and that compound of abstract form with concrete character, which have long marked the German intellect.

These twenty-four "silhouettes," printed in jet black upon grey toned paper, are simple in composition and pure in outline as the black figures on yellow grounds in Etruscan vases. Seldom do the compositions comprise so many as even three characters, and nearly half of the entire series is set apart to a single figure, such as Puck, Pyramus, Hermia, Helena, Titania, &c. We need not point out that an art thus circumscribed in its range needs to be little short of perfect after its kind. Accordingly, it has been the aim of the artist to make the forms pure as the Greek, the lines harmonious as the melodies of Pan, the execution delicate as on antique gems. Yet the spirit of this modern art is far from the antique, and distant too from Shakspeare; it has little of the unconscious simplicity of the one, or of the rude unsophisticated nature of the other; it is infused with the prettiness of romantic schools, with the coquetry of fashion; it seeks the fascination, and at the same time falls into the affectation, of Canova's manner. Thus much, at any rate, may be urged against any pretence to absolute perfection. Likewise objection may be fairly taken to the costume adopted. Herr Konewka's costume can be best excused on the score of a pleasant compromise between European petticoats and primæval nudity; the artist seems in fact to have secured the joint advantages of these distant, and heretofore irreconcileable, conditions. And indeed a deliberate outrage upon strict classic costume may perhaps be forgiven when dresses had to be provided by our eminently æsthetic costumier for "Bottom the Weaver" and "Snug the Joiner." Still it were well to remember that the Theseus of Shakspeare is usually identified with the Theseus of Phidias. The criticism, however, were merciless that would judge any living artist by a Phidian standard. Yet, even as to drapery, any modern painter might feel himself fortunate were he permitted to take for his pattern the famed Elgin frieze, which displays the most perfect reconciliation between dress and the human form, the one enhancing the beauty and majesty of the other. Herr Konewka, for reasons best known to himself, has not seen fit to adopt the Phidian treatment, though obviously the bas-relief manner might serve as a fine and close precedent for silhouette drawing. Yet, on the other hand, we need scarcely say that these designs do not sink to the bathos of what in London is known under the name of Shakspearian revivals. We repeat that Herr Konewka is content with a compromise; and Shakspeare himself sought, through bold and unhesitating compromise, freedom for genius to do whatever seemed best. The utmost that the strictest of critics have a right to demand may be that the illustrator of a poet who ignores "the unities" shall do his best to reconcile discrepancies and to bring together into fair pictorial keeping scattered materials, and chronologies and styles somewhat regardless of historic congruity. Herr Konewka is right to be cosmopolitan; he is wise to render his art at once concrete in character, and abstract in ideal form; he manages to make things pleasant all round, so that his anatomies will not provoke protest from science nor his draperies from art. A happy concord is certainly brought about somehow between the human form, the dramatic action, and the poetic conception. The compositions hold well together, not as forced contrivances, but as free creations. Thus the praise which Mengs bestowed on Raffaelle may be transferred to Konewka:—"There is a cause for all his folds, either in their own weight, or in the motion of the limbs. We can often tell from the former what has been the previous attitude of the latter. We can see from these folds whether a leg or arm, previously to its movement, was in a backward or forward posture; whether a limb had been, or was in the act of being, straightened, or whether it had been straight, and was being contracted." The artist has certainly striven, and that successfully, to suggest through his draperies strong action in muscle and swift motion in limb. His figures float in air, and the point of a toe tells where they may alight on earth.

The Midsummer Night's Dream is a drama difficult to illustrate. Mrs. Jameson says that "the attempt to condense into marble these light, evanescent, quaint creations is better avoided; we feel that a marble fairy must be a heavy absurdity. Oberon and Titania might perhaps float along in bas-relief; but we cannot put away the thought that they have reality without substantiality, and we do not like to see them, or Ariel, or Caliban fixed in the definite forms of sculpture." Yet in the studios of Rome we recall few more popular works than Miss Hosmer's figure of mischief-making little Puck seated on a mushroom. And, at all events, Mrs. Jameson's objections scarcely extend to painting. Yet the difficulties, as we have said, are great; for, to quote from Lessing's Laocoon, "the poet is as far above the painter as life is above the painting." "The musical picture which the words of the poet present in one instant of time cannot be translated into another language." Painting is silent poetry; it is life struck dumb and motionless; the deed is arrested in the doing, the action knows of neither before nor after. The Midsummer Night's Dream is as a fantasy flowing in one continuous stream, translucent, sparkling, ever changing; or as a gossamer web which a breath might blow away. There is no scaffolding in this aërial structure upon which the artist can build. This fairy world is nothing more substantial than an arabesque coloured by imagination; the butterfly that flits from flower to flower cannot be more light of wing or fugitive in life. The whole poem is transient as twilight, evanescent as morning dew. The pencil of the artist cannot arrest the vision ere it dissolve into thin air; such musical notes when put upon paper are frozen; the Æolian harp cannot be touched by the finger, but only by the breezes. All this would seem to indicate that Shakspeare's drama, described as "the most extraordinary combination of the most dissimilar ingredients," is simply unpaintable. Yet may we remember that to its inspiration we owe at least one poem-picture, Sir Edwin Landseer's Midsummer Night's Dream.

That it needs a poet to translate a poet, is a common aphorism; to which may be added, as a corollary, that it needs a poet to illustrate a poet. Herr Konewka, as an illustrator, is in possession of the poetic sense. By simple outlines he kindles imagination, and transports the spectator into the world of the poet's fancy. Thus silhouettes of Titania, Ariel, Bottom, no sooner meet the eye than memory awakens consonant associations, and the ear, as it were, becomes conscious of the rhythm of verse. Such happy relationship between poetry and painting has been compared to amicable arrangements subsisting between two neighbouring kingdoms; slight aggressions or reprisals may occur on frontier lines, but mutual forbearance brings in the end peace through compromise. Herr Konewka's territory is indeed so narrow that small compensation might satisfy. Still, if the worst came to the worst, the artist might stand on his own merits; his art is good as art, his compositions satisfy eye and mind, even though driven to divorce from the poet's text. The painter's reading is free rather than literal; his work is not so much a prose transcript as a rhythmical paraphrase. Thus the rendering gains, as did Coleridge's translation of Wallenstein, the merit of an independent work. Certainly Konewka has got rhythm into his forms, and thus do these figures respond to the music of the verse. Yet has the many-sided Shakspeare here paid for the privilege of illustration the penalty of art mannerism; the universality of the poet's creations has been narrowed almost to a nutshell.

The romantic classicism of the artist's style may be best understood by comparison. Thus his figures hold relation with designs on Greek vases, with this difference—that classic severity is left out, and soft romance thrown in. Again, it will easily be understood that between Konewka and Flaxman there is somewhat in common; in the compositions of each alike we recognise grace in line, beauty in form, and special delicacy in treatment of the nude. Stothard, who found for his pencil congenial work in the illustration of Shakspeare, belongs of course to the same company, though lack of training compelled him to shop short in weak elegance and pleasing grace. John Gibson, yet another of our artists, allied himself by bas-reliefs, and especially by his design of "the Marriage of Psyche and Cupid," now before us, to this school of studied form, proportion, symmetry. And from the extremes of ancient and modern art the transition becomes of course easy to Raffaelle, the happy mean, as seen in frescoes in the Farnese Palace — the brightest and best of all translations of poetic thought into pictorial form. Then, passing to Northern nations, analogies might be drawn with bas-reliefs of Thorwaldsen or with Frölich's supremely lovely illustrations of Cupid and Psyche. In the German mind, indeed, the classic story of Cupid and Psyche, the Teutonic Niebelungen Lied, and the Saxon Midsummer Night's Dream, seem, through consanguinity of genius, to hold fellowship. Certainly there is much in the character and complexion of the German intellect akin with the fancy-woven drama of Shakspeare. And Mendelssohn, years ago, in the delicate filigree and gossamer tissue of his music, as now Konewka in these beautiful designs, confessed to the spell of the Midsummer Night's Dream on the German imagination.

MR. DISRAELI'S AMENDMENTS.

IF Mr. DISRAELI's Amendments are to be judged fairly, they must be looked at from the point of view which was occupied by those who framed them. The object of these amendments is to put the Conservative party in the best possible position for fighting Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill in detail. The Opposition, on being beaten by a decisive majority on the second reading, had to consider what course it should pursue. It might wholly refuse to discuss the provisions of the Bill, on the ground that it was not its business to make a monstrous act of sacrilege or robbery a little less monstrous. Allowing the Bill to pass through Committee without opposition, it might have taken a final division by way of protest, and then have left the rejection of the measure to the Lords. The Lords would be sure to reject the Bill if the leaders of the Conservative party urged them to do so; but the inevitable consequence of this rejection would be that Mr. DISRAELI would be called on to form a Ministry. If the country would support him, if a new election would give a Conservative majority, then all would be well. The House of Lords would have successfully exercised its constitutional power, and the Irish Church Bill would be at an end. But if the country would not support him, then not only must the Irish Church Bill pass exactly as Mr. GLADSTONE might like to frame it, but the political independence of the Lords would be finally crushed. It has, therefore, seemed prudent to the Conservative leaders not to risk so much. They prefer to have two strings to their bow. They can still protest by a final division on the third reading; and if any marvellous turn in public opinion takes place, they can still get the Bill thrown out in the Lords. But if the Bill must pass, they can try to alter it so as to make it as pleasant and profitable to the Irish Church as possible. Of course, in proposing amendments, some concession must be made. The Bill is a Bill for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church. Any amendment which is not a mere negation of the principle of the Bill must be nominally consistent with disestablishment and disendowment. The Conservatives are necessarily forced in Committee to accept disestablishment, and to try to mitigate its evils, to accept disendowment, but to limit to the utmost its operation. We cannot suppose that even Orangemen and Irish Bishops, or that even still more vague and reckless and unreflecting partisans, if there are any, can fail to understand the ground taken by the leaders of the party. Mr. DISRAELI, on behalf of his party, has protested altogether against disestablishment as wrong and impolitic, and pregnant with the last extremity of national evil; but if he opposes in Committee a Bill for disestablishment, he must accept the principle of disestablishment as for the moment conceded and recognised on both sides. He has pronounced all tampering with the property of the Irish Church to be fatal to the security of property generally, and eminently prejudicial to the interests of Protestantism and of good government. But if he goes into Committee on a Bill for disendowing the Irish Church, he must take disendowment for granted, and can do no more than restrain its operation. All this is so obvious that we do not believe he has a single Parliamentary supporter who will fail to see it. And nothing can be more unlikely than that the Conservative party will be divided or broken up because any considerable portion of it will be unable to see that it is open, both in good faith and in logic, for the party to say that they have protested and will protest again against the measure altogether, but still that, if they are to discuss a Bill for disestablishment and disendowment, they will try to make these sources of mischief as little mischievous as possible.

If the right policy of the Conservative party was to go into Committee with a series of amendments accepting the principles of the Bill but taking from them almost all operative force, the amendments which Mr. DISRAELI has proposed are very well calculated to carry out this policy. They admit disestablishment, but they erect in Ireland a powerful ecclesiastical body, based on existing diocesan arrangements, and which in 1872 may resume very intimate relations with the Crown. They admit disendowment, but they give back to the Church every sixpence that is taken from it. It was impossible to provide against disestablishment as effectually as against disendowment. If the connexion between Church and State is to cease, it cannot be made by any amendments, consistent with the principle of disestablishment, to go on existing. The Irish Bishops must cease to sit in the Lords, the Ecclesiastical Courts must lose their jurisdiction, the State must cease to determine what doctrines may or may not be held by Churchmen. All this is unavoidable, and Mr. DISRAELI has not been able to do more towards the repairing of the evils of disestablishment than to propose that the present dignitaries of the Church shall continue to enjoy the titles and precedence now accorded to them (which may seem a trifle, but which would keep up some of the social marks of Protestant ascendency for a generation), that the new ecclesiastical body shall grow out of existing diocesan arrangements, and that after 1871 the Crown may again appoint to bishoprics, if it and the ecclesiastical body agree in wishing that appointments should be so made. These alterations are slight in themselves, and to admit or reject them is a question of discretion rather than principle. There is no reason why the new ecclesiastical body should not be formed as Mr. DISRAELI proposes; and the only answer is, that it will be wiser to let the Church act entirely for itself, and on its own responsibility, and that it is for it to adopt, not for the Government to prescribe, Mr. DISRAELI's proposal. We cannot see any reason why a Protestant Church should not agree that the layman who, from time to time, should hold a certain office like that of First Lord of the Treasury should, if himself a Churchman, appoint to bishoprics as the best means of avoiding clerical animosities and scandals, and securing the appointment of learned, moderate, and liberal men. The objection is not a theoretical, but a practical, one. Any connexion, of however innocent a kind, between the Government and the Protestant Episcopalian Church in Ireland is so likely to be misinterpreted, that it may be wiser for English politicians to say once for all that they will have nothing to do with appointing Irish Bishops. Still what Mr. DISRAELI proposes with regard to disestablishment is small and unimportant, and worth fair discussion. But when he gets to disendowment, he can frame his amendments in a much more effectual way. The Bill proposes to take away the property of the Irish Church, but to give back a portion of it. The amendments proceed in the same line as the Bill, but push the process a little further. They go on giving back under this head, and giving back under that head, until all is virtually given back. The Church body is at once to receive fourteen times the annual value of what is now received by bishops and incumbents; for commutation is not to be in the discretion of the annuitant, but is to be made on application of the Church body, directly it is shown that this body will satisfactorily protect the interests of the incumbent. Then four times this same annual value is to be at once handed over to the Church body, by way of compensation to laymen for having the funds of their Church taken from it. The Church, therefore, starts with eighteen times its annual revenue as a fund in hand. It is then to get a sum equal to fourteen times the annual amount expended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on the average of the last ten years for repairs and maintenance of fabrics, and for the performance of divine service, and fourteen times the annual amount of what will be necessary to keep up in proper style cathedrals and other churches worthy to be called national monuments. It is to have all existing glebes and parsonages made over to it; it is to keep all lands given to it by statute or Royal grant since the second year of the reign of ELIZABETH, and it is to have all private endowments, not from 1660, but from the remotest period. And here the amendments get wonderfully bold. In the first place, Mr. DISRAELI provides that, in addition to the paid Commissioners named by Government, there shall be three Commissioners named by Mr. DISRAELI himself, and that any one who does not get on well with the paid Commissioners may appeal to two of Mr. DISRAELI's nominees. It would be for these gentlemen to decide what possessions of the Church shall be continued to it as private endowments, and to facilitate their decisions Mr. DISRAELI expressly provides that they need not go by legal evidence, but may be satisfied with any sort of historical or other proof they happen to fancy. Lastly, the new Church body is to be provided with 200,000*l.* to pay its official staff. Disendowment would certainly be stripped of its terrors on these terms, and so far from the owners of property being frightened by it, they could only wish that they might be disendowed in the same way. For the Church would get back a good deal more than it gave, more especially as the tithe rent-charges are to be redeemed by the landowners, not at the fixed rate of twenty-two and a-half years' purchase, but at the average market price during the ten years before 1872. Even if the Church kept all its lands, whether derived from public or private sources, the rest of its property would not be sufficient to yield eighteen times the annual value of the incomes of bishops and incumbents, and to provide for all the other purposes indicated by Mr. DISRAELI; and therefore more money would be wanted than the Church has now got. The Church would, in fact, have to come to the State to help it to disendow itself, and we should have to find money to make it richer than it is now.

This general result saves Mr. DISRAELI from much embarrassment. He does not alter the proposed destination of the surplus, for there will not, according to his plan, be any surplus to distribute. He cuts out the clauses for compensation to the Presbyterians and Maynooth, because he has taken care that the Church shall not find the money for the purpose, and if the State likes to find it, that is the affair of the State, and has nothing to do with a Bill regarding the Irish Church. He does not even interfere with the landowners, whom he a short time ago entreated to beware of being bribed into robbing the Church at the cost of making all Irish landed property insecure. They can scarcely be accused of robbing her if she is to receive, under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, more than she has now. Conservatives must be very hard to please who, so far as disendowment goes, are not satisfied with Mr. DISRAELI's amendments; but we may still ask whether the policy that has prompted these amendments is a wise one. They go so far, they extend so thoroughly to every part of the Bill dealing with the property of the Church, they are so linked together, that they constitute a rival scheme to that of Mr. GLADSTONE. None of the purposes for which the Liberal party has striven would be gained if these amendments were carried. They may thus be said to go too far. The choice is not between this and that solution of a question of detail, but between Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill and Mr. DISRAELI's Bill. This gives the Ministry an unquestionable advantage. Mr. GLADSTONE will be able to treat each of Mr. DISRAELI's amendments as part of a general scheme, and nothing could be better calculated to keep the Liberal majority from falling away. Some of the long list of amendments are merely verbal, and are intended to improve the language of the Bill; but all the main amendments are so conceived that, if the Government should be beaten on any of them, it must withdraw the Bill. These amendments do not in fact lead the way to a compromise. They are so drafted that the Government must oppose them totally and directly. Now, if the real object of Mr. DISRAELI was to get slightly better terms for the Irish Church from the Commons, he would have taken a course little likely to be successful. But evidently this is not his object. He wants, in the first place, to stand well with his party, to give them confidence in him, to make even furious Irishmen feel that they are not being betrayed, and that even when he goes into Committee and accepts under protest disestablishment and disendowment, he knows how to work these odious proposals so as to benefit the Church. His amendments appear to be very well adapted to this end, and will rather tend to cheer and encourage and confirm the Conservatives in their opposition than to divide and dishearten them. In the next place, Mr. DISRAELI may reasonably calculate that the real battle will be fought in the Lords. In all probability, the Lords will pass the Second Reading, and then the Conservatives will propose and carry their amendments. The use of proposing ineffectual amendments in the Commons is to ascertain what amendments may be effectually proposed in the Lords. For this purpose, it may not have been imprudent to put forward in the Commons amendments of an extreme character, sure to provoke discussion and to catch the attention of the country. If Mr. DISRAELI had only proposed such amendments as he had some hope of carrying in the Commons, he would have been precluded from asking for more from the Lords. But by starting with outrageous and audacious demands in the Commons, which he knows cannot be conceded, he may enable the Conservative peers to seem comparatively moderate when they come to m[illegible] their amendments. As the leader of his party, he has ma[illegible] party move in devising the amendments he now submits to the House of Commons, and it is unreasonable to judge of a party move by any other test than whether it is likely to benefit his party, and him as leader of that party; and if they are judged by this test, it is as yet much too soon to say that these amendments are impolitic or ill-devised.

REJECTION OF THE ALABAMA TREATY.

THE almost unanimous rejection, by the American Senate, of the Alabama Treaty closes one of the strangest negotiations which have ever been instituted. The repercussion of political noise has produced in the United States entire mental and moral confusion. Seven or eight months ago all parties seemed ready to concur in an arbitration of the long-standing dispute. The appointment of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON was confirmed by the Senate, notwithstanding the hostility of its members to the PRESIDENT, with full knowledge that he was commissioned to arrange the very settlement which he afterwards effected. Scarcely a protest was uttered against the policy of Mr. SEWARD, who had certainly never erred on the side of excessive courtesy or deference to England. The new Minister encountered the most pacific of Foreign Secretaries, and when the change of Government took place Lord CLARENDON was, if possible, more inclined to concession than Lord STANLEY. When the terms of the treaty were made public, a general impression prevailed that anxiety for reconciliation had exercised an almost excessive influence on the minds of the English negotiators; but no serious opposition would have been offered to the payment of even a heavy price for the renewal of friendly relations with the United States. The extraordinary and unreasonable irritation which has lately arisen in America could by no possibility be anticipated. The outburst of hostility is not confined to any class or any party, and yet none of its numerous exponents have attempted to suggest any reason for the universal change of opinion. The few hesitating dissidents who had first objected to the popular cry of vengeance have long since, after the docile fashion of their country, acquiesced in the clamour and swelled it in their turn. England ought, they say, to have foreseen that the supposed offence against American feeling would be followed by many years of hatred; and nearly every journalist devotes himself to the fulfilment of the retrospective prophecy. It was at least impossible to foresee that the temperate mood of 1868 would effervesce in 1869 into universal animosity. It is not pretended that any new cause of complaint has arisen since the appointment of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON.

Prudent Englishmen from the first doubted whether frequent and effusive professions of friendship constituted an improvement in diplomacy; but it was not their business to inquire into the fitness for his post of a foreign Minister who had been recently selected by the proper department of his Government. It was known that Mr. JOHNSON had received an unusual compliment in the approval of his nomination by his political opponents. A conspicuous Democrat, he appeared to enjoy the confidence of the Republicans; and if his proceedings in England were somewhat unusual, it was proper to assume that he consulted the tastes and wishes of his fellow-citizens. His overtures were consequently received in [illegible] most cordial spirit, although the belief accorded to his elo[illegible] professions of goodwill may perhaps have been principally conventional. His indiscreet speeches at various public dinners, when they were reported in the United States, caused general indignation. All writers and speakers hastened to declare that they were outraged by a statement that their feelings were anything more amiable than a compound of envy, hatred, and malice. For once the anger which was expressed was intelligible, although it might be unjust. It is almost an insult to a man with a grievance to assert that, except in a Christian sense, he has forgiven or forgotten an alleged wrong. It was perfectly natural that Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON should be censured for his undoubted misrepresentation of public opinion; but it was hard on the involuntary recipients of his courtesies to be included in the same condemnation. A simple-minded correspondent of a New York paper actually denounced as an insult to the United States every civility which might be offered to the American Minister. The formal credentials of his Government conveyed, according to the new version of the rules of international comity, no title to respect, or even to recognition. Any misunderstanding which might have arisen has since been effectually corrected. The more credulous and amiable portion of the community, which had trusted Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S opinions, has soon been thoroughly undeceived. It would be difficult to convince any sceptic who still doubts that the Americans detest England. On this side of the water it is difficult to believe that a feeling so utterly groundless, and so entirely unreciprocated, can be generally entertained; but overwhelming evidence supersedes all considerations of probability.

The special objections which may have been urged against the treaty are comparatively immaterial, because it is certain that the Senate would have rejected any arrangement to which the English Government could possibly have assented. The organs of opinion unreservedly avow that the American people wish to keep the quarrel open until some opportunity arises for inflicting humiliation on England. In the meantime it is hoped that the disappointment and uneasiness which may attend the rejection of the treaty will, to a certain extent, gratify the popular resentment. The abject and absurd professions of contrition which have proceeded from some eminent English statesmen are constantly quoted with a contemptuous pleasure, as proofs of the anxiety of Englishmen for an early settlement. One London Correspondent of a New York paper declares, with characteristic elegance and good-breeding, that England only desires to have her punishment over. If Mr. GLADSTONE has time to read American journals, he may have convinced himself that he has done no good by his extravagant apologies for the presumption of having formed a judgment on American affairs. As usual in similar cases, the feelings and opinions of Englishmen are in a great measure misapprehended by unfriendly foreigners. Having done their utmost, by diplomatic concession and by private expressions of goodwill, to deprecate hostility, they are comparatively indifferent to the failure of their efforts. The draft of the Alabama Treaty was not so flattering to national vanity as to cause deep regret at the decision of the Senate. The American Government will, after all, be guided by the same motives of interest which would have survived the conclusion of any possible treaty. If a war with England seemed at any time desirable, there would never have been any difficulty in finding a cause of quarrel; and, on the other hand, the national debt will not be doubled for the superfluous object of proving that hatred to England is profound and sincere. It may be conjectured that Mr. MOTLEY will not receive instructions to renew negotiations; and they will not at present be recommenced by any English Minister. Mr. MOTLEY will be in his personal capacity highly welcome; and he is not of a disposition to fall into the error which has been incurred by his unlucky predecessor. Henceforth it will be known to all the world, as well as to politicians acquainted with the American Constitution, that no Minister can ever morally bind the Government of the United States by any engagement.

If the controversy as to the recognition of belligerent rights is at any future time revived, the relations of public bodies in the United States to the insurgents of Cuba will furnish matter for amusing and instructive comment. The House of Representatives has, with the unanimity which it always displays when any affront can be offered to a foreign Power, requested the PRESIDENT by anticipation to recognise any rebel Government which may be established. The Confederacy administered with the aid of the State Governments, unquestioned authority over one half of the Union, and, with one exception, all the members of the Federal Cabinet expressed the opinion that coercion was illegal and unjustifiable. The insurgents of Cuba have uncertain possession of scattered portions of the island, and it is not pretended that any doubt exists in Spain as to the right of maintaining the dominion of the Mother-country; yet the offence of recognising an obvious fact is represented as unpardonable by the same politicians who are already contemplating the annexation of Cuba. Munitions of war are constantly forwarded from American ports for the use of the insurgents; and the legal authorities take no steps to interfere with the equipment in the port of New York of an armed cruiser intended for the service of the rebels. It is never surprising that men should apply one standard to their own conduct and another to the proceedings of their fellow-creatures; but the House of Representatives is somewhat too cynical in its contempt for ostensible consistency. The acquisition of Cuba will probably be accomplished with little difficulty, whether the intermediate form of independence is observed according to the Texas precedent, or passed over as useless.

MR. NEWDEGATE'S MOTION.

IT is not a matter for any regret that the whole of Thursday night should have been occupied with a discussion on the general principle of the Irish Church Bill. An attempt to delay a Bill after it has passed the second reading, by proposing that the House shall not go into Committee on it, would, as a general rule, be contrary to the established rules of Parliamentary warfare. There must be such rules, or Parliamentary Government could not go on at all. The Opposition, by having recourse to all the engines of delay which the forms of the House permit, can stop any Bill from becoming law; and at the close of the last two Sessions Government Bills have been defeated by an unsparing use of this method of crushing them. But if great Parliamentary battles were fought in this way no legislation would be possible, and a complete change would have to be made in the character and proceedings of the House of Commons if the Government of the country was to be carried on. The Opposition must be content to accept its defeat after a fair amount of discussion has taken place, and no man has recognised this more thoroughly and more consistently than Mr. DISRAELI. It is greatly to his credit that he has shown himself one of the least factious leaders of Opposition ever known in the House of Commons. It would have been a departure from all those rules of conducting the opposition to the Government which he has sedulously maintained, if he had himself brought forward Mr. NEWDEGATE'S motion. But Mr. NEWDEGATE'S motion was not, strictly speaking, a move on the part of the Opposition. The Irish Church Bill, is a very exceptional measure, and deep feelings are awakened by it which animate bodies of men who on this occasion act with the Conservative party, but who have an existence and sentiments and persuasions of their own. There are the Irish Protestants, there are the general supporters of Protestantism in Great Britain, there are the enemies of Maynooth. All these sets of persons have most decided views about the Bill, which they wish to bring forward and advocate on their own responsibility, and they cannot bear easily to be bound by a mere defeat of the Conservative party. On Thursday night they had their opportunity. They uttered the thoughts that were burning within their breasts, and it was very desirable that such an amount of relief should be given them. Mr. GLADSTONE fully recognised this, and he had the satisfaction of being able to point out that the views of the speakers were mutually destructive, and that the expression of them had not only been grateful to the speakers, but useful to the Ministry. One member occupied a position without parallel, we believe, in the whole United Kingdom, and thought that a satisfactory method of dealing with the Irish Church might be found in the adoption of the suggestions of the Royal Commissioners. Another was for levelling up; one member for Dublin University took occasion to protest against the views of the other; the fierce Orangemen shrieked "No surrender"; the irrepressible WHALLEY informed the House that he was getting ready no fewer than a dozen MURPHYS to annoy peaceable people in different parts of the country. There was nothing in all this to hurt the Government or to help the Opposition. It was merely an explosion of passionate feeling that needed and found vent, and the House is likely to go on better and faster in Committee now that the explosion has taken place.

Great indulgence should be shown to the Irish Protestants. No one can doubt that they feel from the bottom of their hearts that the Irish Church Bill is a most odious, dangerous, and wicked measure. They think that, having borne the burden and heat of the day in upholding English supremacy in Ireland, they are now thrown over by those for whom they worked. They consider that an institution most valuable to them socially, politically, and religiously, is to be destroyed out of mere caprice, and because a few hotheaded English statesmen have chosen to despair of governing Ireland peacefully unless they truckle to the Ultramontane Catholics. They will not hear of any compromise. Their great Conference has assembled, and its members are almost unanimous in pronouncing that for the State to touch the Irish Church at all will kill it, will stamp out Protestantism, will make the priests masters of Ireland, and will retard and cripple, if it does not utterly destroy, all progress and civilization in the country. Those who have formed such strong opinions, and who must be affected so largely by the Bill, have a right to be heard, not only as members of the Conservative party, but as constituting that section of the community which is most immediately and directly interested in the rejection or passing of Mr. GLADSTONE's measure. When, however, they have had their say, we do not know what more is to be done. The only answer to be given is, that we hope they will not be so much injured by the Bill as they think; but that, whether they are injured or not, the Bill must pass if the Liberal party is to govern Ireland on its own principles. These principles may be right or wrong, but we cannot conceive how any one can think it consistent with them that a Church should be maintained the object of which is to symbolize the hatred of the conquerors for the religion of the conquered. We wish that the Irish Protestants would weigh well and carefully this description of their Church given by an English Archbishop. They may adopt it, and say that they think such a symbolized institution a good thing; but then they must feel that they raise an issue between themselves and the Liberal party which must be settled once for all. Or they may reject it, and say that the Archbishop of YORK was wrong; but then they should ask themselves how it has happened that an English prelate, who last year was one of their warmest and most domineering supporters, came to form such an opinion of their Church. We are exceedingly sorry for the Irish Protestants; we much regret the sectarian character which, we fear, is likely to be imparted to the Irish clergy, as it would be to any clergy, by disestablishment; we do not believe that the measure will conciliate the priests, and we are sure that it will not mitigate the animosity of the Fenians; but the English nation is, as the last elections showed, a nation desirous of being governed on Liberal principles, and it is clearly inconsistent with these principles that the State should associate itself with an institution symbolical of the religious hatred of conquerors. The difference between the principles of the Irish Protestants and those of the Liberal party is fundamental, and we can only put forward our principles and carry them out, even at the cost of aggrieving and annoying persons whom in many points we respect and admire. We do not see the good of giving the Irish Protestants bad arguments in reply, because we do not think their arguments good. Tired of repeating the old arguments over which he has so often travelled, Mr. GLADSTONE on Thursday night devised a new argument against the Irish Protestants, and a very bad argument it was. He said that the great Protestant hero himself, WILLIAM III., was at one time willing to give the Irish Catholics half the Irish Churches, and even half their ancient properties. But Mr. GLADSTONE answered his argument himself when he informed the House that the reason of this strange liberality was that WILLIAM found that the disaffection of Ireland detained forty thousand excellent troops that might have been available for his great war with France. WILLIAM III. was a very good Protestant, but his love of Protestantism shone with a feeble ray as compared with his hatred of LOUIS XIV. He offered a bribe in order to obtain a military advantage, but his offer was not accepted, even if it was ever seriously made, which seems very improbable. The Irish Catholics chose to stake their fortunes on the chance of beating him with the help of France. He beat them, and then to keep them down, set up the system of Protestant ascendency. This is the very case of the Irish Protestants. They were employed for a certain purpose, which they punctually and faithfully fulfilled, and now they ask why they should be deprived of their reward. These excursions into history are profitless and irrelevant. It is perfectly easy and perfectly useless to show that a quarter of a century ago Mr. DISRAELI, who could never have dreamt then that he would live to be a Conservative Premier, gave utterance to the ordinary opinions of educated men about the Irish Church, or that Lord PALMERSTON and Lord RUSSELL honestly believed that the Irish Church would last their time, and spoke on various occasions in accordance with their belief. We may forget the past and look only to the present, and the question of the present is whether, if England is to be governed on Liberal principles, an institution so much out of harmony with these principles as the Irish Church can be maintained.

We do not see how the ordinary arguments based on the necessity of upholding Protestantism could have been better put than they were put by Lord SANDON. As he very truly says, Catholicism is, in theory at least, quite opposed to all the principles of the Liberal party here and everywhere. Personal freedom, the freedom of the press, the freedom of opinion, the exclusion of ecclesiastics from the practical machinery of Government, are all things which we in England think very good, and they are all expressly denounced as dangerous and wicked by the highest authorities of the Romish Church. It is also true that Protestantism has learnt to accommodate itself to them, and it is very much easier for a Protestant nation than for a Catholic nation to be really liberal. But there was a time when, out of the political necessities of very dangerous and difficult times, and before the progress of science and wealth had moulded Protestantism into its present form, Protestantism was only liberal in a very small degree, and persecuted and conquered and domineered almost as much as the rival creed. Some relics of this state of things still remain; nor would any wise man wish that all these relics should be at once swept away. But every now and then the conscience of the English people is awakened to the perception of an inconsistency, too gross to be endured, between one of their traditions and the general principles of modern Government. Then the relic of the past is cut away, and Protestantism and Liberal principles seem once more reconciled. Such a crisis has, we believe, come now, and the Irish Church must give way, although at the same time we have much sympathy with those who, like Lord SANDON, stand up boldly for Protestantism, and who, having the sense and courage to look below the smooth surface of things, see and point out that between Catholicism and the modern world there is a great gulf fixed. It was also opportune, we think, that Mr. AYTOUN should have had his say on behalf of those who think that Mr. GLADSTONE has been too favourable to Maynooth. This part of the Bill will need much and long discussion in order to convince objectors that the Government is right. Appearances of a kind likely to bewilder people not much accustomed to argument are against Mr. GLADSTONE. In the first place, he seems to be taking the money of the Protestants and giving it to the Catholics; in the next place, he seems to be providing a Catholic institution with a large lump sum forming an endowment fund for the perpetual instruction of Catholic priests, and not forming a mere guarantee fund for the protection of existing interests. We know how Mr. GLADSTONE answers both these accusations; but, in the first place, he has not yet had an opportunity of proving in detail that he is right, and even if he is right, he must expect to have to din his reasons into the public mind by constant repetition. Every opportunity that is given him of doing so is desirable, unless it is given at the cost of a serious delay in passing the Bill. But there seems to be no great fear of such a delay, for Mr. GLADSTONE appears to have got hold of a majority that will not only vote like a machine as he wishes, but will hold its tongue when he bids it be silent. And what could a Minister wish for more?

THE DEBATE ON THE BUDGET.

THE discursive and dull debate of Monday last disclosed some inconveniences which will result from the adoption of Mr. LOWE's Budget. It was, indeed, obvious from the first that the contributors to a forced loan or benevolence would be exposed to a certain amount of hardship; but such methods of raising money have not usually been employed for the direct and immediate benefit of the taxpayers. The anticipation in January next of the payment of direct taxes is the price of the reduction of the Income-tax, and of the abolition of some troublesome duties. Mr. HUNT, borrowing or rediscovering a fancy which has occurred on several occasions to Mr. GLADSTONE, amused himself with the ingenious quibble that the retention of half the Abyssinian twopence was an increase, and not a diminution, of the normal rate of duty. In 1856 Mr. GLADSTONE used the same sophism as the foundation for a violent attack on Sir GEORGE LEWIS; and in 1860, for the purpose of rendering his Budget more impressive, he affected to assume that all the taxes which required renewal had entirely disappeared from the fiscal system. It is as undeniable that fivepence is more than fourpence as that it is less than sixpence. Mr. LOWE's proposed percentage may exceed the amount approved by Mr. HUNT, but last year's rate furnishes the most natural standard of comparison. It is certain that if the late Government had remained in office the Income-tax would not have been more largely reduced, even if Mr. HUNT had not for the third time resorted to the simplest and rudest mode of providing for the public wants. It might perhaps have been convenient to defer for another year the abolition of the Corn duty; but Mr. GLADSTONE had repeatedly dilated on the iniquitous nature of a tax which, as Mr. LOWE truly says, offends against all theories of political economy, although from its comparatively small amount it inflicts but a doubtful burden on the consumer. One agricultural member expressed a fear that the repeal of the duty would encourage the importation of barley for malting, although almost all the opponents of the Government asserted that the price of grain would be in no degree reduced. It is satisfactory to know that, if foreign barley is converted into malt in England, it will bear its share of the Malt duty, and that, as far as it is used, it will tend to cheapen the raw material of beer. The abolition of the last protective duty renders the commercial legislation of England thoroughly consistent; but a few hundreds of thousands added to the revenue might have compensated during one year more for the postponement of scientific completeness. The removal of the most oppressive taxes on locomotion, and perhaps of the duty on fire insurance, was far more urgent. It is generally necessary to judge a Budget as a whole, and to trust in some degree to the discretion of the Government. A moderately capable Chancellor of the Exchequer is likely to devise a better scheme than any amateur substitute which is likely to be devised in or out of Parliament.

More serious objections were offered to the plan of collecting the chief direct taxes in one sum at the beginning of the year. Mr. Lowe had no difficulty in showing that the acceleration of payment would be annually repeated, so that, until the end of all things, there will be no deficiency corresponding to the proposed advance. In other words, a half-year's extra taxes will be levied at the beginning of 1870, and the loss to the tax-payer will never be recouped. The payer of Income-tax will buy for twopence-halfpenny exemption from the payment of a penny; and the same proportion may be applied to some of the assessed taxes. It is highly desirable that the collection should be entrusted to public officers, and it may possibly appear that the system of licences is preferable to the old method of retrospective returns. On the other hand, payment in a lump at the time when all the world is at its poorest will not be willingly made or easily enforced. If the suggestion of one member could be adopted, by the substitution of February as the time of payment for January, the unhappy householder would have the benefit of a short breathing-time between his Christmas bills and his taxes. It is not easy to understand why a system of half-yearly licences should involve any extraordinary increase of expense. In general, both payers and receivers of money prefer half-yearly settlements, although in some benighted districts rent is customarily paid once only in twelvemonths. Even if the full payment is indispensable for the immediate purposes of the Budget, hopes might be held out of a more lenient arrangement in future years. Unless some unexpected demand should arise, there will be a substantial surplus in 1870, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be rich enough to spare both the remaining Abyssinian penny of the Income-tax and half the amount to be realized by the prepayment of direct taxes. It was clearly shown in the debate that the convenience of tax-payers coincides with the interests of the Government, and that a distribution of payments would confer incidental advantages on commerce.

When it was urged that the proposed scheme would cause fluctuations in the rate of interest, Mr. Lowe replied, with characteristic indifference to popularity, that the money-market must take care of itself. A more cautious Minister would not unnecessarily express indifference to the grievances which he may unavoidably cause in the discharge of his duty. Chancellors of the Exchequer have generally found it convenient to be on good terms with the City, not forgetting that they have themselves often occasion to deal in money. If a clear advantage to the Treasury could be obtained at the cost of imposing some inconvenience on bankers and on borrowers of money, it would be proper to regard the public interest as paramount, but it could do no harm to express regret for any collateral annoyance which might arise. In the particular instance the Government will probably suffer more largely and more directly than any private capitalist from extreme and rapid alternations of scarcity and of abundance. During the interval it will be necessary to obtain advances, either in the form of Exchequer Bills or by overdrawing the balance at the Bank of England; and in either case there will be a charge for interest. From the beginning of the new year the Treasury will be suddenly and largely enriched, without the power of turning its funds to useful account, unless, as Mr. Lowe suggested, a war should opportunely break out at the moment when the till was overflowing. There would be at least an equivalent inconvenience if it were necessary to equip an army or a fleet in October; and when the war occurs, the produce of a year's direct taxes will meet but a small part of the inevitable demand. The unfortunate expedition to Abyssinia illustrates the expensiveness of modern warfare, and the consequent necessity of paying for guns and soldiers by drawing upon capital. The destruction of Theodore, though it was effected in three or four months, cost as much as a year of a great Continental war in the time of Pitt. The argument was probably only an afterthought or a makeweight, and it is highly improbable that it influenced the decision of the Government, even if it had occurred, before the beginning of his speech, to Mr. Lowe's ingenious mind.

Criticisms of a Budget which provides for the repeal of taxation are uttered under visible penalties. Mr. Lowe constantly reminded his censors in the House that, if they could establish their objections, they must pay for their success by submitting for another year to the taxes which he offers to repeal. If the anticipated payments in January next are abandoned or postponed, the whole or part of the existing revenue must be retained, and there is always reason to fear that the interests of payers of Income-tax will be the first to be sacrificed. It will perhaps be judicious to accept Mr. Lowe's proposals, in the hope that he or his successor will, after the present year, mitigate the extreme pressure on the tax-payer. The autumnal impoverishment of the Treasury will not occur to its full extent on the present occasion, because the assessed taxes will be imposed and collected from April to the end of the year. It is only when the system of prepayment has once begun that the stream of income will cease to flow for the remainder of the year. It is fortunately impossible to anticipate the proceeds of the Customs and Excise, as duties cannot be recovered till the articles on which they accrue are required for consumption. The greater part of the revenue will still be received at different times of the year, and the Government may possibly succeed in adjusting with the Bank some plan for anticipating its receipts in the latter part of the year without serious loss. When Mr. Lowe's proposals are carefully studied, they will resolve themselves into a repeal of certain duties on commodities, effected at the expense of the payers of direct taxes by an addition for one year of fifty per cent. to their burdens. Sir Robert Peel commenced a similar experiment on a large scale in 1842, and Mr. Gladstone in 1860 raised by an Income-tax the funds necessary to meet the cost of the French Treaty. Mr. Lowe's operations are more complicated and more obscure, especially as he includes in his scheme a reduction of the Income-tax; but prepayment of a tax, annually repeated, is an addition to the total amount, nor can Mr. Lowe himself explain how the account is to be rectified at the end of the world.

PEACE AND WAR AT THE TUILERIES.

It would be an interesting employment for a person of a statistical turn of mind to reckon up the pacific assurances which have been put forward by or on behalf of the Emperor of the French during the last two years and a half. It has fallen to the lot of M. de Lavalette to begin and close the series. The convenient absence of M. de Moustier gave him an opportunity of asserting, in his Circular of the 16th of September, 1866, that the aggrandizement of Prussia did but secure the independence of Germany, and that France was not concerned "to oppose or reject the work of assimilation "which" had then "just been accomplished." If Frenchmen felt any uneasiness in contemplating the changes wrought by the Seven Days' War, they might console themselves by the reflection that the satisfaction of the national sentiment of Germany would only make her a better neighbour than she had been under the old Confederation. The speech of Saturday last began in something the same strain. M. de Lavalette warned the Corps Législatif not to expect that the political disturbance which Central Europe has lately undergone can possibly subside in a moment. Between the order of things which has disappeared, and the order of things which is eventually to replace it, a period of transition must be interposed. Such a period will naturally be marked by contradictory aspirations, conflicting interests, delicate situations, and acknowledged or unconscious regrets. These are the characteristics of German politics at this moment, and it is alike the duty and the wisdom of France not to aggravate matters by interference, unless that interference is necessitated by legitimate motives. About this time M. de Lavalette may have become conscious that he had been fighting a creation of his own brain. Even the Pays has never gone the length of arguing that France ought to attack Germany without legitimate motives. Accordingly the Minister now assumed a more precise and categorical tone. There is no prospect, he thinks, that these legitimate motives will be supplied by any action on the part of Germany. The Confederation of the North has created an organization for itself. The States of the South have associated themselves to that movement as regards their national aspirations and general interests; as regards their sentiments of independence and their particular wants, they are separated from it. This double movement is going on freely and spontaneously. France claims no right to interfere with it, and, by consequence, she neither has done so nor intends to do so. Taken by itself, this declaration is highly significant. There is a meaning both in what it says and in what it does not say. M. DE LAVALETTE is careful to treat the possible accession of the Southern States to the Confederation of the North simply as a new development of the principle of nationality. He will not regard it as a matter in which Prussia either has or wishes to have any part. Whether this view of the case is the true one may fairly be doubted, but it is obviously the view which makes it easiest for the French Government to acquiesce in any further changes. If the EMPEROR can once resolve to leave the South free to work out its own future, and to shut his eyes to the extent to which this future may be determined by Count BISMARK's agency, the probability of a war between France and Prussia is at once reduced to a minimum.

Those who wish to deduce this comfortable conclusion from M. DE LAVALETTE's speech had better not read it to the end. By one seemingly innocent addition he contrived, before he sat down, to unsay all that he had said. The attitude of France towards Germany will not change, unless this movement should depart from its legitimate ends and attack French rights. Nothing more was wanted to revive all the old uncertainties. What are the legitimate ends of the movement in Germany? What are the rights of France in relation to it? According to one story, the South German States are now animated by a desire for incorporation with the Northern Confederation; according to another, they are secretly bent upon maintaining their independence against Prussian aggression; according to a more probable theory than either, some sections of their people incline one way, and some another. Are both these objects legitimate from the French point of view, or would the definite adoption of the first-mentioned policy be regarded as an attack upon French rights? These are the questions which Europe has been asking for the last three years, and it is disappointing to find that M. DE LAVALETTE, after seeming to give a pacific answer, has in reality left public curiosity altogether unsatisfied. Taken as a whole, his speech amounts to nothing; and lest this fact should not be sufficiently patent, the MINISTER of WAR was ready two days later to supply a further qualification of his colleague's assurances. Marshal NIEL's chief anxiety was to make it evident that if France is disposed to keep the peace for the present, it is from no inability to break it the moment she feels so disposed. M. ERNEST PICARD had been unpatriotic enough to suggest that, if things were as peaceful as M. DE LAVALETTE says, the suppression of the six great military commands into which France is divided would be an appropriate piece of economy. The MINISTER of WAR was prepared with a conclusive argument in favour of their utility. Is it worth while, he asked, for the sake of saving 600,000 francs to destroy an organization which assigns to every corps d'armée a commander ready to take the field without a note of warning being given to the enemy? In eight days the whole French army can pass from a peace to a war footing. If the generals had to be specially selected whenever hostilities were determined on, the advantage of this completeness of organization would be lost, since the fact of their appointment would sufficiently betray what was in the wind. But by means of these permanent commands, six armies can take the field at a week's notice, without any additional preparation—a fact of some moment to the EMPEROR's neighbours.

The conclusion suggested by these two speeches seems to be that NAPOLEON III. has no present thought of abandoning that see-saw policy which he has pursued with consistent inconsistency ever since the battle of Sadowa. He will go on talking of peace to-day, and hinting at war to-morrow; he will employ one Minister to extinguish the dying sparks, and another to fan them into a flame. If a more precise inference than this is wanted, none seems to be attainable beyond the probability—we may now perhaps say the certainty—that the Government cry during the elections will all be in favour of peace. If anything is certain about the Emperor of the FRENCH, it is that he will not go to war except to escape what he regards as a still more serious evil. The result of the elections will show whether the need of choosing between these alternatives is more urgent than it has yet been. To all appearance the EMPEROR is really convinced, either that he has a good case with which to go to the country, or that his hold upon the electors is firm enough to make it a matter of indifference whether he has a case or not. If this conviction turns out to be well founded, it is not unlikely that the return of a new Corps Législatif may usher in a pronouncedly pacific policy. The disappearance of domestic fears will take away the principal incentive to war on the part of the EMPEROR, while the completion of his new military arrangements will remove the temptation to those constant boasts which, though they may be only indulged in to conceal conscious weakness, do sometimes defeat their own purpose by the uncontrollable irritation they excite on the part of others. If, on the contrary, the elections should give increased strength to the Opposition, we may look for a continuance, in an even aggravated form, of all the uncertainty and self-contradiction which have been the leading characteristics of the French Foreign Office since the close of the Austro-Prussian war.

The Imperial letter on the approaching centenary of the birth of NAPOLEON I. is nothing more than an electioneering placard of a very superior sort. In the EMPEROR's opinion the name is still a power in the rural districts of France, and there are several minor advantages connected with the particular mode in which he proposes to invoke it. The new army law is not popular in the country, and the distribution of additional pensions among the survivors of the wars of the Empire may do some service, by bringing the prospect of a provision in old age to temper the dislike called forth by an increased conscription. Each of the 40,000 veterans who survive to profit by the EMPEROR's judicious bounty will be a sort of local apostle, in whose mouth the recollections of the first and the praises of the second NAPOLEON will be appropriately mingled. The opportunity of giving his own version of the history of the last century was perhaps not without its influence on the mind of the writer of the letter. That during all that time Europe has been a chaos, to which nothing but the grand figure of NAPOLEON I. has given shape and firmness, and that, but for him whom that figure "still guides and protects," Europe would be a chaos to-day, has always been a favourite doctrine with the present Sovereign of France. It now has the further merit of falling in with the lesson which he has been trying of late to instill into the French working-class, that the Empire is the only Government under which Democracy is possible, because it is the only Government which can unite order and liberty, and emancipate the artisan from the shopkeeper without provoking the reaction—hitherto so invariable—of the shopkeeper against the artisan. It is amusing to see the simple Bonapartism of BÉRANGER travestied in this fashion to meet the requirements of modern Socialism.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT AND THE ABERGELE ACCIDENT.

LET us sing smaller things; let us go back to the old and hackneyed subjects. In the middle crash and turmoil of the Irish Church debate let us just waste a thought on the safety of our own poor life and limbs; and, in the teeth of the present interest aroused by Madame RACHEL and Mr. BENJAMIN HIGGS, let us recall certain events of last August. The Abergele calamity, which under the most frightful circumstances caused the death of thirty-one passengers and two railway servants, happened to one of the best appointed and popular trains of the day—the Irish Day Mail; and on one of the best lines, if not the very best, in the kingdom—the London and North-Western. The official Report of Colonel RICH, the Government Inspector, on this great accident, which has just been published, and which we propose to make the text of a slight homily, says that this particular "line is one of the best "in this country, and that its general management and arrange-"ments are as good, on the whole, as those of any of the "other lines." The first and obvious reflection of course is, if these things are done in the green tree of the London and North-Western, what may we not expect in the dry tree of the London, Chatham, and Dover? What the Abergele catastrophe was it is superfluous to repeat; it is written in the sorrows and mourning of so many families that it would be cruel to recall these fatal memories. Who was responsible? Colonel RICH informs us that "the three men"—namely, two breaksmen and a station-master—"are seriously to blame, "and their neglect has been the immediate cause of the accident"—a fact which was on the face of the matter, and which is of no great consequence; but it is necessary to say something more when we find Colonel RICH adding to this statement the pregnant observation, that "men of that class "cannot be expected to do their duties well if the Railway "Companies do not give them the most convenient and best "appliances, and do not look after them strictly and enforce

"their own regulations." And Colonel RICH goes on to prove in detail the truth of these implied charges against the railway management; that is to say, he transfers the real culpability from these wretched servants to the great Company itself, one of the best, if not the best, in the country.

In the first place, Colonel RICH shows that to construct and work a time-bill by which one goods train is despatched from a given station at 12.5, and another on the same line of rails at 12.15, while the mail train is to pass on the same line of rails at 12.34—even when, ex hypothesi, the two goods trains are supposed to be shunted on to a siding out of danger—is a very dangerous experiment indeed, even if all the appliances for this dodging are most perfect. What then must it be when it happens that the stations and sidings on which all this delicate manœuvring is to be performed, and on the perfect working of which the safety of hundreds of people hangs by a thread, are, as a matter of fact, "quite unfit in extent and "means of safety for the work that appears usually to be done "there"? What are we to think when we are also informed that these precious stations and sidings have never been inspected by a Government officer, or passed by the Board of Trade? Colonel RICH next condemns the London and North-Western Directors for a "very lax system of supervision, "because they appear to have no travelling or stationary in-"spector to look after the guards, instruct them in their "duties, and to see that they perform them." Further, Colonel RICH, with a sententious brevity which only adds to the cumulative force of his indictment, says that such dangerous combustibles as explosive paraffin-oil should be sent by special trains at special hours and under special guards, with special instructions, not, as in this Abergele case, by an ordinary goods train. Next, Colonel RICH objects to locking the doors of the carriages, and goes so far as to "submit that no doors should "be locked." And, lastly, Colonel RICH delivers himself of a judgment which we venture to describe as by far the most important observation which has ever been brought out by these Government inquiries; and the full extent and terrible character of which leads to the very unpleasant suspicion that the whole so-called system of railway safeguards is a mere hollow sham and mockery and delusion. Colonel RICH fears—and he certainly will make a good many of us tremble by the expression of his fears—that our security rests on paper, and paper only; that the Companies know that all their instructions and rules and regulations are merely illusory, and that they have actually been constructed for the purpose of deception, and were never intended to work. But we must quote this formidable and terror-striking charge:—"I fear that it is really too true that the rules "printed and issued by Railway Companies to their servants, "and which are generally very good, are made principally "with the object of being produced when accidents happen "from the breach of them, and that the Companies sys-"tematically allow many of them to be broken daily, without "taking the slightest notice of the disobedience." And he specifies instances in proof of this ugly charge—namely, that the regulation which led to this horrible Abergele catastrophe, about shunting within ten minutes of the arrival of a passenger-train, is, as Colonel RICH says, constantly broken. Again; the excellent regulation that when a train breaks down the guard shall go back with a danger-signal is seldom observed. Again; the rule as to pulling up outside the danger-signals when they are up, "is, I may say, never observed." And lastly, the rule against feeing the guards and servants is publicly disregarded, and the Companies know it to be disregarded. Nor is this any trifling matter, for much of the public safety depends on it. When guards are, as they are, regularly fee'd and regularly treated at the refreshment rooms, instead of attending to the organization and fittings of the train, they only look after their own interests—their shilling and their beer and brandy and water. "The consequence is, "that the train starts behind time," and an accident, as by a grim irony it is called, is the result.

We venture to say that this is the most serious charge, preferred as it is by the gravest authority, which has yet been made against railway management, not against this or that line, but against the whole system; for it charges the whole thing with being one vast tissue of fraud and delusion. Parenthetically we may ask—and this is as good a point of the discussion as any other to hazard the question—What comes of all these Official Inquiries? The recognised form is this:—An accident occurs; a Government Inspector is sent down; he inquires and reports; Mr. Secretary of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, who seems to be the politest of men, in the most affable way "transmits, for the early and careful con-"sideration of the London and North-Western Company, "the enclosed copy of Colonel RICH's Report," and in the most elegant language requests that the Secretary of the Railway Company "will as soon as possible forward to the "Board of Trade any observations which the Directors "may offer on the subject." And there, as far as we and the public know, the whole matter rests, and is absorbed into the great Nothing. Either the Directors treat Colonel RICH and the Board of Trade, and the whole of the Government inquiry, with superb and silent contempt, and never condescend to offer the observations so courteously invited; or —which possibly may be the case—their answer is suppressed. At any rate, in justice to the inculpated Companies, if they ever do condescend to answer such charges as these, their defence should be not only made public, but should be printed with the same official document which contains the charge. As the thing stands, it seems that the London and North-Western Company suffers judgment to go by default. The Directors prudently hold their official tongues, let Colonel RICH have his say, and trust to the whole thing blowing over. Or it may be, now that Mr. BRIGHT is at the Board of Trade, the Directors, bearing in mind his emphatic observation that the complaints against railways are mostly moonshine, may not unreasonably reckon on a friend at Court, and may rely on the sympathies of the President as against the judicial impartiality of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade. But to recur to the main argument. Is it true—can it be true—that the rules printed and issued by the Companies to their servants "are made principally with the object of being produced "when accidents happen," and are never meant to be, and never thought to be, carried out? Is it true that the Companies connive at, and therefore justify, this systematic, habitual, and constant violation of their instructions? If it is not so, where is the Company's reply and defence? The charge is about the most serious that could be preferred. It amounts to one of flagrant and conscious dishonesty against the Railway Companies. Colonel RICH distinctly says that the rules and instructions are a mere imposture, concocted for a most unworthy purpose, and drawn up only to be disregarded and treated by all concerned as the hypocrisy which they are. Let us have more light. If the extant rules, instructions, and regulations are not the make-believe and illusion which Colonel RICH charges them with being, and if they really are meant to be carried out, but only accidentally are not carried out by the Companies, let the Companies show this. If what Colonel RICH says is true, let us have one of two things; either let us force the Companies to carry out and work their rules, or let them be withdrawn and abrogated as the shams and affronts to common sense which they are. We shall then know what we are about. We shall recognise the very solemn fact that, whenever we enter a railway carriage, we carry our lives in our hands, and that the Company has discharged itself of the liability of providing any security or safeguards for us—apart, that is, from what good luck may happen in defiance of the blundering and stupidity of under-paid and over-worked servants, whose chief interest is, by cajolement or otherwise, to extract "tips" from the passengers instead of attending to the general safety of the train.

LIFE-PEERAGES.

LORD GRANVILLE was perhaps scarcely justified in stating, during the short debate on Life-Peerages, that his party generally regretted the failure of the WENSLEYDALE experiment. The expediency of creating a new class of peers would, even if it had been universally admitted, have afforded no sufficient reason for allowing a Minister to effect a great constitutional change by the sole authority of the Crown. If the legal objections to the admission of Lord WENSLEYDALE had not been sustained by the House of Lords, the revival of a supposed prerogative, which had, if it ever existed, become obsolete, would have been as unconstitutional as the issue, by the same authority, of a writ to an unrepresented borough. Lord CRANWORTH, who pressed the measure on with singular obstinacy, seemed never to understand that his doubtful precedents could not have satisfied a statesman, even if Lord LYNDHURST had not demolished the arguments which he advanced as a lawyer. Many votes were probably given with exclusive reference to the question whether life-peerages would be useful, but the preliminary inquiry into the exercise of prerogative involved still graver consequences. It was admitted on all sides that Lord WENSLEYDALE had, by his patent, become a baron with all the precedence and dignity attached to his rank. The opponents of his claim to sit in the House of Lords maintained only that a new or disused side-door into Parliament should not be opened at the discretion of the Minister of the day. It is as proper now as it was in former times, to maintain with jealous vigilance the right of Parliament to control legislation. The checks which were originally imposed on Royal ambition or caprice have not ceased to be applicable, although the Crown means the Cabinet, and the Cabinet means the party which may for the time be dominant. If additional objections to Lord GRANVILLE's favourite measure had been needed, it might have been urged that the innovation necessarily implied the absence of any limitations. Lord WENSLEYDALE was a learned lawyer of unblemished character and competent fortune, but the power which made him a nondescript peer might have bestowed the same promotion on dozens of political adventurers. The tradition which tacitly restricts the choice of the Crown in the creation of hereditary peerages would have been less uniformly respected in the disposal of a new-fangled dignity. On every ground the House of Lords was bound to resist the intrusion, if possible; and Lord LYNDHURST deserved gratitude, as well as admiration, for the great intellectual effort by which he defeated the Government.

Lord RUSSELL, who had himself made Lord WENSLEYDALE a peer for life, judiciously abstained, on moving the first reading of his Bill, from any expression of censure or regret in consequence of the refusal of the House of Lords to admit his nominee to a seat. His proposal was consequently considered with reference to its merits, and it seemed to be favourably received. It is not improbable that many peers may feel repugnance to a change which undoubtedly tends to impair the sanctity of their caste, but the more enlightened members of the body will be unwilling to prefer selfish objections; and dissentients may console themselves by the hope of treating their non-hereditary colleagues with the same affable condescension which they have long exercised to bishops. It will, unfortunately, not be possible to dress up Lord RUSSELL's peers in an absurd costume, to make them sit on a separate bench, or to teach them that they must neither speak nor vote on ordinary political questions; but the stupidest aristocracy is always astute in devising methods of rebuking unwelcome aspirants to equality. Of the two principal advocates of the introduction of life-peers, Lord RUSSELL perhaps took the more practical view, while Lord SALISBURY's reasons were characteristic and original. Lord RUSSELL, while he desired to increase in some departments the efficiency of the House of Lords, directed his chief attention to the claims and interests of the class from which the new peers would be selected. It is perfectly true that many able and experienced men regret their inability to find a dignified and useful occupation at the close of a busy career. Some valuable experience is lost to the public service through the difficulty of obtaining a seat in the House of Commons, or perhaps through unwillingness to engage in political contests. Diplomatists, soldiers, judges, and old Indians are frequently discontented with the dulness which ensues on the termination of an active life; and, unless they possess large fortunes as well as considerable eminence, they can scarcely hope at present for elevation to the House of Lords. For such persons, and more especially for politicians out of work, Lord RUSSELL feels a generous sympathy; and he readily persuaded himself that, while he gratified a laudable ambition, he would at the same time introduce a new and serviceable element into the House of Lords. He is perfectly right in limiting the proposed number of life-peers, not only because the Minister of the day ought to be prevented from swamping the House, but also because the new rank would, like the Order of the Bath, be vulgarized by indiscriminate promotions. Since it has become customary to raise every general who lives past eighty to the rank of a field-marshal, it seems impossible to trust any honour below a dukedom to the protection of the Crown. Four life-peerages in a year will not admit of lavish extravagance in distribution; and when the whole number of twenty-eight is filled up, the annual vacancies will be less numerous, especially as some of the new peers will be old lawyers. If the Bill is passed, and the full number of creations made, it will be difficult to avoid an admixture of mediocrity. The qualifications which Lord RUSSELL suggests are not unreasonable in themselves, and, if necessary, they may easily be modified; but the most accurate memory will not have retained the names of twenty-eight commoners who have during the last seven years been conspicuously eminent in the army, the navy, the law, the colonies, and the Indian service. A considerable proportion of the appointments would be given, like some modern peerages, on the formation of every new Cabinet, to partisans for whom it was impracticable or undesirable to find room in office. Several unoccupied supporters of the present Government possess the qualification of having sat ten years in the House of Commons.

Lord SALISBURY, consistently with the wish which he has often expressed or implied, hopes to increase, by the creation of life-peers, the political efficiency of the House of Lords. As he justly holds, the House has at present a representative character which might, in his opinion, be made more comprehensive if it were composed less exclusively of landed proprietors. Accordingly, Lord SALISBURY would add to Lord RUSSELL's categories a more general qualification; or rather, he would abandon all restrictions on the discretion of the Crown. It might perhaps be advantageous, if it were practicable, to bring the House of Lords into closer relations than at present with trade and industry; but life-peerages are not the most obvious method of attaining the desired object. Professional or political eminence often leaves a man poor, but wealth is the unfailing index of commercial success. There is nothing to prevent the Crown from raising a great merchant or manufacturer to the peerage, as he has abundant means of providing for his successors; but, unluckily for Lord SALISBURY's purpose, a retired capitalist almost always buys land, and subsides into the same class with the great body of the peers. The House of Lords is representative of property, of station, and, above all, of social position. Lord RUSSELL's plan might perhaps introduce or strengthen the element of personal distinction, if experience showed that the life-peers would blend naturally and harmoniously with their hereditary colleagues. As a separate section, not associating on equal terms with the other members of the House, the new peers would occupy, perhaps with mischievous results, an uncomfortable and anomalous position. Eminence in science, in literature, and in art, though it deserves all respect, is seldom attended by the possession of a large fortune. If, however, Lord RUSSELL's Bill is passed, either in the present Session or at a future time Lord SALISBURY's objection to purely intellectual qualifications will scarcely prevail.

When the principle of the change has been adopted, there will be room for ingenuity in the adjustment of the details. It may be assumed that, in ordinary cases, the dignity will be confined to the lowest rank of the peerage, and that there will at least be no such shock to popular associations as a life-duke. The wife of a life-peer will naturally share his elevation, but no conventional titles of honour will be projected on the children. The daughter of a life-earl, if such a rank were to exist, must be content with the absence of a courtesy title, unless she were favoured at the expense of her eldest brother, who must necessarily be a commoner during his father's lifetime, as he would have no claim to rank after his death. It will be extremely easy to settle such trivial questions, with no more inconvenient result than the open recognition of an unavoidable distinction. The new addition to the social fabric may perhaps be useful, and even ornamental, but every part of its construction will indicate that it was not included in the original design. The peerage grew up on principles which had little connexion with virtue or genius, although the highest reward of merit and success in England has consisted in admission into the ranks of the titled aristocracy. The Bill will probably either be withdrawn during the present Session, or be transferred to the conduct of the Government. It was perhaps more convenient that the feeling of the House of Lords should be tested by a peer no longer holding an official position; but, if Lord SALISBURY has expressed the opinion of the majority, a considerable change in the Constitution ought to be adopted on the proposal of a responsible Minister.

MR. DICKENS AT LIVERPOOL.

MR. DICKENS has been entertained at a "Farewell Banquet" at Liverpool. What it is to which Mr. DICKENS has bidden farewell—whether to Liverpool, or to writing stories, or to reciting his compositions in public—is not so clear, and the obscurity is increased by the experience which we have had of the irresolute character of valedictions, as in the case of him who

> Now fitted the halter, now traversed the cart,
> And often took leave, but was loth to depart.

The affair was a very splendid one. "In the centre of the guests' "table was a silver-gilt fountain, sent by Mr. ROGERSON, which "dispensed refreshing streams of rose-water during the even-"ing;" and the fountain accounts for much of the character of the stream of eloquence poured out. The whole thing, speakers alike and speeches, may be said to have been drenched with rose-water. We are not so cynical as to object to this. When Mr. DICKENS and Mr. TROLLOPE, Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON and

Mr. G. A. SALA, Mr. ANDREW HALLIDAY and Mr. PALGRAVE SIMPSON, all literary gentlemen, and Lord DUFFERIN and Lord HOUGHTON, literary peers, meet to exchange mutual admiration and mutual compliments, we all know what we have to expect, and what sort of literature it is which they represent, and therefore dignify and glorify. Mr. DICKENS amply deserves such incense as the Liverpool banqueters burned in his honour last Saturday evening at St. George's Hall. The creator of PICKWICK, SAM WELLER, and Mrs. GAMP is a humourist of the very first class, and the author of CHUZZLEWIT shows the possession of powers which we think might have placed him high among the writers of serious fiction. Let these merits be acknowledged, and while we are not prepared to say that Mr. DICKENS's style of composition, with its laboured and finical word-painting, is to be ranked high among artistic work, and while we have the strongest objection in point of taste to much of his details, and even though we think his pathos often false, we cheerfully accord him his place among English writers. Mr. DICKENS's farewell reminds us how much we should have lost had he retired years ago; and had his career been cut short we might well have applied to him JOHNSON's expression of regret in GARRICK's case, that the stroke of death had eclipsed the gaiety of nations and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure. If there is a ridiculous element in the Liverpool festivities Mr. DICKENS is hardly responsible for it. He, as an actor, knows that he must play up or play down to his audience; and it is not in human, certainly not in what in these days is called literary, nature, to be bedaubed with melted butter and to retain, or even to affect, dignity. The ridiculous element of which we have hinted the existence is the implied assumption that what is called literature is comprised in, begins and ends with, such compositions as those which were represented at Liverpool. Lord HOUGHTON is an elegant poet, and Lord DUFFERIN has, we believe, written some respectable trifles; but we lay the two peers out of the question. They supplied the ornaments of the occasion; but the literature present, of which Mr. DICKENS is the acknowledged head, is after all but a very small component in the great stock of human knowledge. Two successful novelists, and as many writers of coruscant miscellanies and magazine articles, a farce-writer occasionally successful, and a foreign sketcher of our social habits, belong to literature in that sense in which Mr. HALLIDAY is a man of letters; but they neither exhaust literature nor represent literature. At public dinners one generally finds the absurd toast of Literature "responded to" by gentlemen of the true DICKENS type; and it is therefore no wonder that these gentlemen have got to think that the current English literature of the age means nothing higher nor better than Mr. TROLLOPE's parsons and Mr. DICKENS's drolls. Small blame to him, but great blame to us, when we so think of the true dignity of literature; and when, as seems to have been the case at Liverpool, it was generally felt by the literary banqueters that Mr. DICKENS ought to be a peer, or at least an American ambassador, the estimate, say, of such men as Lord MACAULAY and Mr. MOTLEY, which must be formed by those who thus judge Mr. DICKENS's writings, is almost a serious matter, if anything serious can be connected with these self-adulatory amenities. When BAVIUS and MÆVIUS met to present each other with testimonials and encomiastic speeches, LUCRETIUS and VIRGIL and CICERO and TACITUS, had they happened to be the contemporaries of the DICKENS and TROLLOPE of the period, could scarcely have vindicated their sovereign place in the hierarchy of Roman letters. With the Liverpool estimate of letters accepted, there is a chance of our forgetting that we have, or recently had, a HALLAM and a MILMAN and a GROTE, a THIRLWALL and a MERIVALE, a TENNYSON and a BROWNING, a DARWIN and an OWEN, and a NEWMAN and a MILL among us.

Earl RUSSELL's Bill for creating Life-Peerages was clearly present to the minds of the Liverpool people, and Lord HOUGHTON distinctly committed himself to the position that Mr. DICKENS would have been benefited by being a political man. Certainly, had Mr. DICKENS been thrown into the bracing element of active life, he would probably have never written the unreadable and utterly forgotten stories with a purpose with which he closed his series of novels; and if Lord HOUGHTON meant delicately to imply that, when Mr. DICKENS wrote about the Court of Chancery and Imprisonment for Debt in the shape of little green monthly pamphlets, he showed that he had not mastered the first elements of political knowledge, we should be disposed to agree with him. It may be quite true that Mr. DICKENS might have been all the better for being in Parliament, but the question is whether Parliament would have been all the better for Mr. DICKENS. We once knew a young gentleman who volunteered to write in one of the quarterly reviews because his friends told him that his style was bad, and that perhaps practice would enable him some day to write. For this sort of reason we can see the advantage of a Lord NICKLEBY or a Baron BARCHESTER; but we get alarmed when we hear of life-peerages to be conferred on distinguished men of letters, and find Mr. DICKENS selected, at least by his own set of worshippers, for the first coronet, in which we presume the gray goose-quill and inkpot interchanged will supersede the six silver balls of an illiterate baronage. Not that we are quite prepared for the difficulty started, that Mr. DICKENS would suffer by being ennobled—a joke suggested doubtless by that fine irony which now and then distinguishes the Times, and which is so very fine that we are not quite sure which is which, in our contemporary's estimate of sense and nonsense, when it was with apparent seriousness said that CHARLES DICKENS would be to Lord DICKENS as WILLIAM PITT to Earl CHATHAM. But the jest of naming DICKENS and PITT in the same sentence is so good that we are ready to pardon the obscurity of the parallel. One thing certainly Mr. DICKENS might probably learn were he to be made a peer—which is what a peer is, a matter on which his views are somewhat hazy at present. He actually thinks that his own Lord FREDERICK VERISOPHT was a peer—in Nicholas Nickleby the character is spoken of sometimes as Lord VERISOPHT, and sometimes as Lord FREDERICK VERISOPHT, a plain proof that the author recognised no distinction between a peerage and a courtesy title; and in enumerating his ennobled friends he clearly takes the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of England, and possibly the LORD MAYOR and the Lords of the Treasury, for genuine Lords. No doubt to Mr. DICKENS the Barons of the Exchequer are much the same thing as the Barons of England, and the Lords of Session are undistinguishable from those on the Roll of the Lyon King-at-Arms. But all this only leads up to what is the question; whether literature—that is, the literature which is represented by Mr. PALGRAVE SIMPSON, Mr. ANDREW HALLIDAY, and M. ESQUIROS—and statesmanship are convertible terms?

Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON said at least one thing at this dinner worth remembering, which was, that were it announced that the English WASHINGTON IRVING—by which we suppose Mr. DICKENS may be meant—was appointed Minister to the United States, people would say "It is a joke." At present then we are not generally prepared for exchanging Lord LYONS at Paris for the Telegraph's Paris Correspondent; and there is somehow, according to Mr. DIXON, a latent but general suspicion that Mr. DISRAELI would have been none the worse Minister if he had never written Ixion in Heaven or the Wondrous Tale of Alroy. The real fact is this, that among all our literary statesmen their literature has been rather a mistake than otherwise. Neither the Nun of Arrouca nor Don Carlos showed Earl RUSSELL's administrative capacities. Mr. GLADSTONE has only lived to find that his greatest literary work must be retracted and disavowed. Lord LYTTON is a littérateur to the core, and therefore has entirely failed as a statesman. Lord BROUGHAM used to sign himself, with a pompous affectation, homme de lettres, but the speculator on porisms was thoroughly merged in the member for Yorkshire and the Chancellor. Lord DERBY, we suspect, would hardly attend the Literary Fund dinner as the translator of HOMER; and in Mr. MILL's Parliamentary career we have the strongest proof that a great writer may be a very indifferent and even mischievous senator. We do not propose to argue that the men of action and the men of thought must always be kept distinct; but the popular prejudice which attaches to the term doctrinaire expresses a truth which is not altogether onesided. The worst features of the great French Revolution are decidedly attributable to the school popularly known as that of the Encyclopædists. The lamentable revolution by which constitutional government in France was surprised out of existence was owing to a knot of small journalists. LAMARTINE and THIERS and GUIZOT certainly did not do much in the way of administrative ability. BUNSEN's diplomacy was a tissue of ambitious and conceited blunders. Most of the present French EMPEROR's mistakes may be reduced to the fact that he began life as an obscure writer of obscure reveries in politics, and that he has gone on dreaming and refining, and mystifying and puzzling himself, ever since; while on the other side we have such facts as WALPOLE and the PITTS, PEEL and PALMERSTON, whose names will occur in no future WALPOLE's Noble and Distinguished Authors, in addition to the terrible example of BACON, which goes at least some way in proving that a man whose real vocation is to instruct the world by his pen is out of his place in attempting to rule in Cabinets and Courts. We fear that we are slipping into the error which we have pointed out, and that to talk about the career of BACON while we are speculating on Mr. DICKENS in either House of Parliament is rather absurd. However, on the main point our apprehensions are most likely premature. The real safeguard against titled littérateurs is to be found in the character of the craft. The irritable side of letters and the literary man came out in force at Liverpool, and in this is our safety. To make one literary lord would be to make a hundred literary enemies with the full command of the newspapers, magazines, and leading articles, which has to come to mean the beginning and end of literature. Lord HOUGHTON grumbled at Liverpool because Mr. DICKENS did not seem to do sufficient honour to the excellences of the British peerage; Mr. DICKENS, in reply, seems to have grumbled because Lord HOUGHTON was not aware that Mr. DICKENS really often had dined with a live lord. Mr. ANDREW HALLIDAY, playwright and littérateur, grumbled because the Drama—especially, we suppose, that edifying sort of drama which is now popular in London—was not distinctly toasted. From which we gather that one Lord DICKENS would settle the question for ever. To think of the state of the literary world with Baron DICKENS at St. Stephen's, and the editor of Punch and the contributors to the Daily Telegraph left out in the cold! A single literary lord would, happily for the country, begin and end the experiment of one of Earl RUSSELL'S proposed classes of Life-Peers.

SECOND-BESTS.

THERE is a great difference among people in the degrees of perfection with which they expect to realize their ideals, quite apart from the comparative degrees of worth which belong to the ideals themselves. Some persons seem born with limp nerve and faint heart and a certain slipshodness of intelligence. Hopelessness taints them from the beginning of their lives. Their vision is so peculiar that distances invariably strike them with vastly exaggerated proportions, and their judgment of dimensions, wherever the power of the will and of human effort is involved, is incurably faulty. All tasks loom upon them as much bigger than they really are; they have a far keener eye for drawbacks than for helping circumstances, and they are usually rather glad of a decent plea for waxing faint and drawing back the hand from the plough. One of the central conditions of the universe to such dispositions is that only the second-best is within the reach of even the most strenuous of mortals. To strive for things in the degree superior to this is to play the Titan and to incur Titans' pains and penalties. If you are a curate, for example, it is wholesome not to hope or labour towards a bishopric, or anything loftier than a smallish living; if a barrister, then it is equally desirable that the sphere of ambition should be limited to the small prizes; if you write books, it is wholesome in this view to remember that the race of giants is dead, that the modern tide is too shallow to bear the great ships of learning as in old times, and that a work of moderate aim and lowly pretension is more likely to hit the mark, and tell upon the public mind, than a comprehensive and elaborate monument of research and thought of the highest quality. In a word, to this timorous humour no star within mortal ken is of the first magnitude, and the best attainable is the second-best. One extreme, here as in other things, implies or begets its contrary, and just as there are people who never seek to go higher than the second-best, so there are others at the reverse end of the scale who can never be brought to see that second-bests have a conspicuous and most serviceable function to perform in the great order of things. They insist that nothing is worth either possessing or pursuing, either keeping for yourself or seeking for others, which is not on the highest ideal level in its own particular order. This exaltation they carry into all subjects to which they bend their attention. In social matters, in politics, in novels, in intellectual production, over the whole field, they contend, with or without a formula, not only that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well, but that if you cannot have the very best of a habit, an institution, an opinion, or a branch of knowledge, then you may just as well resign yourself to the worst, and plunge frankly into a void. As a rule they do not express this slightly destructive doctrine in its fullest and most intelligible form, but only leave it to be inferred from the general scope of their criticism of men and things. Considering that we are on every side surrounded by second-bests, that second-best is the normal law of society all round, there is more opportunity than enough of observing and studying such a temper in active operation.

There are two ways of pointing out that an institution, a type of character, a manner of handling a subject, is not so good as one could imagine it possible that it should be. You may dwell upon its defects and shortcomings in such a fashion as to show only a conviction that it is capable practically and actually of being made better, and a wish by criticism to further the bettering process. This is to treat a second-best as a sort of friend, warning, rebuking, half-menacing, but all for the good of the second-best, whether usage, institution, opinion, achievement, or whatever else it may be. Everything in the world is capable of improvement, and therefore everything in the world is either kept at perfection, if it has already reached that difficult point, or, if not, is brought nearer to it, by vigilant supervision and, if necessary, by frank objurgation. There are so many unfavourable influences steadily at work, of which the strong tendency of the natural man to relax effort is the most constant and the most patent, that the general downward inclination, of institutions towards inefficiency, of opinion towards error, of moral usages towards mere hollowness and hypocrisy, is ever in need of violent pressure the other way from everybody who has vision to detect flaws and falling away. The most useful form which this pressure can take probably consists in holding up the very best by the side of the second-best; but from this point of view it is well to let the lovers of the second-best see with some clearness that on the whole you are with them, if only they will move on, and do something to lessen the space between the thing they are defending in its present state and the same thing in its complete perfected state. Otherwise they may pardonably confound the correcting with the destroying critic, and the destroying critic they very naturally take to be their foe, not the less relentless for the insidiousness with which he veils his assault. Such a critic is he who insists on the best in his attacks on the second-best, not because he seeks the improvement of the latter, but because he craves its abolition and extirpation, and sees no better way of getting what he wants than by painting perfection in such over-bright colours that every sensible person will instantly perceive the hopelessness of ever reaching it, and so will be likely to conclude that he may just as well as not go in for some other system which does not even make any pretensions in the way of perfection, and will not be exposed to these unpleasantly detracting comparisons. It is quite possible in exhortation to exalt virtue to such tremendous and inaccessible heights as to drive men down into antinomianism by force of sheer reaction. And the malicious disparager of second-bests not seldom means to force people within influence of his talk into courses which, whether he knows it or not, are in truth even lower than third-best. For example, popular government in the present stage of public virtue and social training is avowedly a second-best; it is not the most perfectly working system that the imagination of man can by any means conceive. Those who would most unflinchingly defend it at all cost against any rival system would still admit that it very often creaks rustily on its hinges, makes hideous screechings and confusion, and produces its work full of blemishes and imperfections. All this is clear; and, if we compare with this spectacle, which we know, the ideal and charmingly coloured spectacle of the government by good despot which we do not know, an egregious discontent with our second-best is the result, and foolish folk long for the blessed destiny, in the shape of Guy Fawkes or otherwise, which might extinguish the British Parliament, and make room for Mr. Carlyle's heroic king, so that we might all live happy ever after, like people at the end of the third volume. Yet, in cool moments, every well-considering man is persuaded that, in the long run, the system of popular government works better than the inelastic and depressing system of personal government in a thousand ways which, in this country and in America, the national conceit makes it quite superfluous for any writer to insist upon. Free-trade, again, is a second-best. As Mr. Mill has said in a recent writing, "Free-trade is not upheld, by any one who knows human life, from any very lofty estimate of its worth, but because the evils of exclusive privilege are still greater, and, what is worse, more incorrigible." If there were an era of perfect virtue, then free competition would be incomparably and indisputably the best arrangement. Its evils arise from the fact that we do not live in such an era, nor one at all like it, and these evils constitute it a second-best; only, as Mr. Mill says, even in such a stage free competition works better than protection, and such defects as belong to it are more curable than the defects which belong to the opposing system. In literature and art there is room for the same mischievous contempt for second-bests. In this department, too, there is a right place for what falls short of the highest imaginable, although many a person achieves very cheaply a reputation for profound vision and critical power by simply proving, of this and that, that they are not the highest. Of course there are circumstances which justify such strongly negative exposition. The world is choke-full of charlatans whom people have absurdly taken at their own valuation, or at the valuation which the personal friends and followers of the pretender have chosen to set upon him. That these should be held up in their true relations to that which they feign to have reached, is plainly a work of the highest public duty. And it is wholesome that poets, historians, and novelists, who are really good second-bests, and whom all wise men would be sorry to be ungrateful to, should still be warned at moments when the fumes of the popular incense seem to have mounted to their heads that, after all, they are not quite as the gods. Yet let us not forget that, as the majority of men are not capable of appreciating or relishing the finest work of any kind, and as it is exceedingly desirable, notwithstanding this, that they should admire something or other of decent merit, and as the opportunity of this admiration gives them great pleasure, then the second-best author is certainly a benefactor in his way, and deserves, so long as he does not give himself unreasonable airs, to be allowed to flourish and make his money in peace.

It is a great lesson, which judicious people seldom fail to learn, not to expect too much from a world constituted like ours. Of course we live in very civilized times, and the march of progress is only a little short of being miraculous, but for all that the fastidious must expect to have rather a hard time of it. Methods are still uncommonly rough and ready. The loud tongue, the false issue, the coarse substitution of rhetoric and passion for logic and reason, the reliance on prejudice and selfishness, all these sti prevail with scarcely abated force, and to bring them to nough the defender of better things is sometimes compelled almost to con descend to like arts. To insist on standing aside until this gross tyranny of pretenders and bad logicians is overpast is to leave them to make a headway which it will be difficult or impossible to recover, until at any rate they have brought things so near to ruin as to be hardly capable of reparation at any cost. The man for whom the methods of his age are so much too bad that he disdains to meddle is oftener than not the creature of mixed vanity and idleness. The apostolic injunction not to be conformed to the world has a full meaning of its own, but this meaning can hardly be that we are to leave the world to go its own way, because, if all good men were to take it in this sense, we should find that the salt had lost its savour with a vengeance, and that the ways of the world would be, more than even in apostolic days, ways of perdition. Throughout history we find that in the region of active life, of political and social movement, the advance of society has been due mainly to men who knew exactly how to hold their own firmly and how much allowance to make to pretenders, knaves, and blockheads, and to the general folly of mankind. The stupid will often go with you a very long way, if you will only consent to go a very short way with them. It is undoubtedly a great pity that the stupid should even have thus much of their own will, but a prudent workman is content to do the best he can with his materials, and it is well not to trample too vehemently on other people, however superior a being you happen to be. To a sensible politician or socially minded person in any line, it must seem the most mischievous and retarding of all follies to quarrel with a course that is only second-best, when there is no better practically open, simply because you can conceive of such a better course as possibly existing if circumstances were only not what they actually happen to be.

WOMEN'S ORACLES.

IN days when men were much less cosmopolitan, and women much more shy and retiring, than they now are; when there were not nearly so many divisions and subdivisions in Church and State as at present, but the lieges and the faithful were all contained in two or three great parties separated from one another outwardly by plain characteristics and a tradition of hostile action, and inwardly by antagonistic principles and cherished hatred; before the whole body of the Tories had been "educated," and any stray Whigs had been enticed into "caves"; before divines had invented the method of non-naturally explaining their formularies, or statesmen had discovered the art of autobiographically interpreting their own inconvenient utterances; before in short, there were any third horns, middle-ways, eclecticisms, indifferentisms, or other confusing complications in politics and polemics, it must have been much easier to form a rapid estimate of a person's character and opinions than it is at present. In those days the old Latin maxim "You may know him by his friends" must have been much more valuable than it is now. It was once considered by the profane world as good a master-key to the secrets of character as the dogma "You may know him by his fruits" is still considered by a portion of the religious world. But with our present fashion of kaleidoscopic public careers, and our general condition of permutations and combinations, no one would dream of judging a man's character and opinions, or prophesying his course of action, from the characters, opinions, and actions of his friends. Yet we are not even now without means of judging roughly, by certain external indications, of a person's character. One of the best rough and ready tests of anybody's opinions is, for example, the newspaper which he affects. Stay-at-home foreigners, as we have so often lately been told, form their opinion of Englishmen largely from reading the Times; and though, of course, it is not difficult to see that an estimate of the character and capacity of a whole nation which has been derived from the study of only one of its principal journals must necessarily be very imperfect and misleading, yet it may be questioned whether this method is not at least as good as that of the stay-at-home Englishman who derives his impressions at secondhand from some obsequious or prejudiced Foreign Correspondent. And, after all, is it safe to suppose that any journal of large circulation can really be a very inadequate representative of its readers? that the sentiments it expresses can really be alien to their character, or its information and arguments below the level of their intelligence? How many graduates of Oxford and Cambridge who regularly read the Times suspect the logic of a pompous leader? How many of the gentlemen with nicely discriminated and subtle titles, of the Second-Go Bachelors, the Masters of the First or Third Branch of the Arts, the Doubly-examined Doctors of Literature, whom the London University is supposed to be scattering profusely over the land, and wherewith our whole Philistine lump is to be leavened, are dissatisfied with the Times' treatment of any scientific, historical, or literary question? and how many more can give the reasons of their dissatisfaction? There might be worse tests of the opinions and intelligence of a large community than that implied in the maxim "You may know them by their newspapers." And if the test is of any value when applied to journals written for no particular class, but professing to represent a whole people, it is still more valuable in its application to those journals which profess to represent only one fraction of a community. From the columns of the Record or the Rock we may gather no inadequate notion of the faiths or the fears that support or agitate the souls of religious spinsters, half-pay colonels, and their pet parsons in the coteries of Blackheath, Clifton, or Tunbridge Wells. From the leaders of the Standard we can form some conception of what the bucolical gentry and clergy consider to be convincing argument or crushing invective; just as from the style of the Daily Telegraph we may derive some notion of what the artisan and the shopkeeper believe to be fine rhetoric. There is no doubt that a very fair notion can be formed of the tastes, feelings, and culture of any Englishman by noticing what journal he affects. There are few peculiarities of the Englishman to which the maxim "Show me what he admires, and I will show you what he is" more aptly applies than to his newspaper.

If this same doctrine is true—and it is difficult to see why it should not be true—of those journals which are written especially for Englishwomen, the result is certainly surprising enough. To any person studying the leading Ladies' journals of the period it seems almost inconceivable that they should really represent any considerable number of Englishwomen in the middle and upper classes. Yet, if this is not the case, why and for whom do they exist? And, if it is the case, where could we find a richer store of materials for estimating the character of modern Englishwomen than in these sympathetic and oracular periodicals? The materials afforded by the Daily Telegraph or the Record for judging of the character of Englishmen sink into utter insignificance when compared with those which any leading "Ladies' newspaper" affords for judging of the character of its subscribers. Whether it is that, there being fewer ladies' than men's newspapers in existence, the ladies' newspapers are obliged to supply a greater quantity of information, and to study more differences of taste and varieties of requirement, or whether it is that women are more confiding and sympathetic towards their journals than men are, and require from them more sympathy and help in return, the fact is certain that there is no subject so important or so trivial that the fair subscriber shrinks from asking the counsel of the oracle upon it, or that the oracle fails to deliver a sympathetic and satisfying response. The mode in which these women's oracles are consulted, and give their replies, is peculiar. The Ladies' newspaper devotes a portion of each of its numbers to what is sometimes called "Our Drawing-room," and sometimes assumes the loftier title of "The Englishwoman's Conversazione"; which is, in fact, a kind of epistolary conversation or discussion carried on in the journal among its contributors. Notes and queries, questions and answers, sometimes of the briefest and sometimes of the most elaborate description, on topics grave and gay, trivial and important, are crowded together in the most confused but natural manner in these "Englishwomen's Conversaziones." Here, alongside of the anxious inquiry of a mother how she may best control a rebellious child, we find a daughter putting the momentous question whether at thirteen she is too young to begin wearing the chignon? On the same page we see ladies asking what is the editor's opinion of their handwriting; what is the best method of removing superfluous hair; where they can buy birches with good buds; what is the price of the Antephelic milk, and whether it will really clear a spotty complexion; how to treat broken or unbroken chilblains; how many days after a visit should a call be returned; where to find a sympathizing or even an obedient staymaker, mistress of her art; who was the prisoner of Gisors, and why he was imprisoned; what is the best way to clean grebe; whether it is best to wash one's dirty linen at home, and, if so, what amount of soap, soda, and starch should be used fortnightly for a family of two grown-up persons and three domestics; whether short walking costumes may be used for Church dress; how to make Brunswick loaves; how to prepare for an overland journey to India; and how to cure warts. To all these and many similar questions the oracle is expected to provide a reply; and how thoroughly well it does its business may be gathered from such a case as the following:—An unfortunate creature who is afflicted with unbecoming leanness, and who writes under the touching title of "Skeleton," asks the advice and help of the oracle in this heart-rending condition. Her general health is excellent. She sleeps and eats well. But she is quite unable to enjoy society, because she is so unfashionably thin. Wherever she goes she finds that fatter friends are preferred before her. And, in short, unless she can become stouter, life will not be worth having. What shall she do to get fat? The oracle replies:—"In answer to 'Skeleton's' inquiry how to become fat, I wish to inform her that milk taken before rising in the morning is the best thing. Half a pint, either warm or cold; if the former, a lump or two of sugar makes it better. If he lives in London, there is a kind of rich milk called 'babies' milk' sold on purpose for ladies and children to drink. She should eat plenty of butter and fat, and underdone meat. Cream very good; also corn flour, semolina, arrowroot, &c. Good stout is very fattening; she should have two or three tumblers a day—one always the last thing at night. If not stout, a wine-glass or two of rum and water with sugar." Every reader's respect for these women's oracles must be raised after reading this reply. Whether their wisdom is or is not equal to that of the ancient oracles of Delphi and Dodona, their straightforwardness and honesty must at any rate be greater. An oracle which can unflinchingly give such a response as that, which can without any sign of emotion, and without leaving any loophole of ambiguity, tell its miserable client to drink a tumblerful of stout the last thing at night, and one of babies' milk the first thing in the morning, must at least be far above the vulgar suspicion of corruption or of humbug. Whether the unhappy "Skeleton" has had the courage requisite for carrying out the orders of the oracle, we have no means of knowing. This reply was given last December; and if meantime "Skeleton" has been conscientiously and continuously cramming herself with babies' milk, underdone meat, corn flour, stout, and rum, every one must admit that by this time she deserves to be as sleek as Belteshazzar.

The conversazione portion of these Ladies' journals always resounds with the cries of contributors who appear to be suffering from a plethora of books concurrently with a famine of clothes. Scores of women write anxiously desiring to part with the great standard handbooks of Mangnall, Gleig, and Lindley Murray, in exchange for brooches or earrings, or offering "Select Passages from the Poems of Sir Walter Scott, handsomely bound," in return for fashionable articles of dress; and indeed the number of such offers would be very puzzling, did we not remember that there is always a stream of young ladies who have just "finished their education" and are about to be "introduced." These happy creatures will of course have no further use for books except such as the circulating library supplies, and the temptation to part with their manuals and their prizes in exchange for earrings and real sealskins is naturally irresistible. Who the people are that take the books and give the jewellery it is not so easy to understand. There does not appear to be any demand for such books, or indeed for any books whatever, among the contributors to the Ladies' journals, while there are always scores of contributors who want to get rid of books. It would be interesting to discover the ultimate destination of these school prizes and manuals; to trace the steps and the length of time that a French Dictionary or an Atlas takes in passing from the "finishing school" to the pork-shop; and to ascertain with precision who are the middle-men that go bearing jewels of gold and raiment to the "finished" young lady, and carrying back her books to the butterman.

Perhaps, however, the most extraordinary feature in these conversaziones is the disquisitions on ethical and social subjects which are carried on among their contributors. It is not long since the Saturday Review called attention to a wonderful discussion on the subject of "Flogging Girls" which appeared in a well-known Ladies' magazine, and which has been succeeded in the same journal by an equally amazing discussion on the subject of Ladies' riding. The riding discussion proceeds in very much the same fashion as the flogging discussion did. There is the same freedom of treatment, the same liberal use of strong expressions, the same tendency to advocate extremes; and it would seem, too, that the theory of horsemanship which finds most favour with the contributors to this journal is not very widely different from their favourite theory of domestic discipline. To give zest to the discussion, a knowing male assessor is called in, who plays a part similar to that assigned to "Paterfamilias," or the "Old King's Scholar, and Ex-Officio Birchmaker," in the girl-flogging conversazione, and who contributes some of the more bloodthirsty opinions to the disquisition. This amiable gentleman, who signs himself "Eperon," and who says that he has had much experience as rough-rider to a cavalry regiment, and as "ladies' instructor in riding," after describing the savage course of treatment through which he puts his colts in order to make them "perfect ladies' horses," with "a fine shape and carriage of the neck," and after dilating on the advantages of tight-lacing to a lady-rider, lays down the following choice rules for what he calls "female horsemanship:"—

> I always use the most severe bits for ladies, and very tightly curbed, as otherwise a lady's strength would be quite unequal to stop a frightened or skittish horse. Many of my best pupils now delight in riding vicious or badly trained horses, and always get more out of them than men do. After a lady feels confidence in her horse I never have occasion to tell her to use her spur. She is only too glad to do so, and as she becomes a perfect horsewoman, she detests a perfect horse. Give a good horsewoman a badly broken horse if you would please her. Every mistake is punished with the utmost severity, and the spur, being so easily used and so effective, is always first called upon. To make a horse show to advantage the bit must be long in the bars, and the curb chain fastened as tightly as possible. The lady must then ride entirely upon the bit reins, which must be held tightly, care being taken to keep the spur to him to prevent his rearing, &c. &c.

If this correspondence is genuine, it appears that, as there is a party among the fair subscribers to this journal which is in favour of flogging grown-up girls, so there is also a party which is in favour of savage and brutal treatment of the horse. How numerous this party may be it is impossible to say. How many English lady-riders have the hard hearts, or covet the vulgar horsebreaking accomplishments, of "Eperon's" "best pupils," only the editor can tell who presides over the conversazione in which such sentiments are allowed to pass unchallenged. Admirers of women may hope that there are few ladies in England who would, and lovers of the horse may trust that there are few who can, conduct themselves in the manner described and advocated by "Eperon." And indeed, after perusing such effusions as these, the charitable reader will perhaps find it best to conclude that Ladies' journals form an exception to the maxim "You may know them by their newspapers," and that they exist rather to warn or to disgust, than to represent the real feelings, tastes, and interests of Englishwomen.

FRANCE AND THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

THE Parisian Correspondent of the Times has lately been discoursing on the relations of French society to the approaching Council in a tone which contrasts conspicuously with the contempt for common sense and common fact that usually characterizes the religious utterances of the leading journal. At the same time we suspect that his view, though it contains elements of truth, is a superficial one. The general upshot of what he says comes to this—that French Catholics are prepared to receive, if not with enthusiasm, at least with unquestioning acquiescence, any number or kind of spiritual dogmas that may be imposed upon them, not excepting the crowning paradox of Ultramontanism, Papal infallibility; but that they will meet with open opposition or silent contempt, as the case may be, any attempt to dictate to them on the mixed questions where religion touches on the modern principles of civil or social life. Now it seems obvious to reply to this that, whatever else they may be, the French are a logical people, and it requires no very severe intellectual effort to perceive that acceptance of Papal infallibility involves, among other things, acceptance, ex animo, of all the propositions of the last Encyclical, which includes, to go no further, a most emphatic consecration of the principles of political absolutism, of religious persecution, and of the divine right of the Pope's temporal sovereignty. However, we are not concerned here with the accuracy of the Times' Correspondent, but with the very interesting subject to which he has adverted—the probable bearings of the promised Œcumenical Council on the state of religious thought in France. There are obvious reasons why this cannot be considered a matter of merely national importance. France has long arrogated to herself the title of Eldest Daughter of the Church, and if it does not now belong to her in quite the same sense as under the ancien régime, there never was a period when the French nation stood more completely at the head of Latin civilization, and therefore of the Latin Church. The Catholic Church of France is a microcosm of the Catholic Church throughout the world, and what has been said of the former by a keen observer, who is a Frenchman though not a Roman Catholic, is equally true of the latter; "it contains within itself, not merely two parties, but two spirits, two souls." In attempting to gauge the effects of the present policy of the Papal Court on France we are gauging its effects on the whole Roman Catholic Church. And "the Church of France," to continue our quotation, "is the principal support of Ultramontanism, and at the same time its most formidable foe." These are the words of M. Pressensé, in a very remarkable article on "France and the Œcumenical Council" in the current number of the British Quarterly, to which we propose to draw the attention of our readers. We shall not of course hold ourselves bound, in what we have to say, to the writer's opinions, or even to his estimate of facts, though in this latter he appears to us—with one exception, to be noted later on—to be quite exceptionally accurate in his information. But we shall make full use of the very valuable summary of the antecedents and present position of French Catholicism which he has put before us.

To appreciate the present state of parties in the French Church, and its attitude towards the Papacy, it is necessary to go back some eighty years and take a rapid review of her history since the first Revolution. The Gallican Church under the old monarchy possessed, to use the words of the reviewer, "all the characteristics and all the disadvantages of a State religion. It was servile to the throne and persecuting to religious minorities." This is true, but a writer who was no less of a Liberal than M. Pressensé, though he was also a sincere Roman Catholic, has dwelt in glowing language, of which we had occasion very recently to remind our readers, on the brighter side of the picture to which his extreme and somewhat narrow antipathy to all established and endowed Churches hardly allows him to do justice. De Tocqueville thinks the Gallican Church had never been, on the whole, in a more satisfactory condition than when the Revolution crushed it. There was, no doubt, too much of subserviency to the Royal power; but, on the other hand, there was a breadth and enlightenment of view, a healthy spirit of national loyalty and independence, and the endowments of the clergy, immense as they were, acted as a serviceable counterpoise to the caste-like and anti-national tendencies of an unrecognised, and especially a celibate, priesthood. M. Pressensé considers that, if the Port Royalists had been fostered instead of being persecuted, they would probably have modified their extreme doctrines of grace, and that the infusion of a new and holier spirit would have materially affected the subsequent history of the French Church. This may well be; but the Port Royalists were ejected more rudely than the Wesleyans from the Church of England, and Jesuit influence triumphed for the time, though it could only hold its own by wearing the mask of Gallicanism. The old Church fell—whether suffering most for its virtues or its vices we need not here discuss—and the Church of the Concordat was, to all intents and purposes, a new creation of the Emperor and the Pope. Napoleon aspired to restore the old Empire of Charlemagne, and nothing could be more to his purpose than an infallible and irresponsible Pontiff, who should also be his own head chaplain. This, as we know now from his words as well as from his acts, was the secret of his whole ecclesiastical policy. An unscrupulous despot who, if his own statements in the intimacy of familiar conversation may be trusted, was no believer in Christ, was the cynical but deliberate founder of modern Ultramontanism.

He forced upon the terrified but not unwilling Pontiff whom he had alternately outraged with the chicanery of a vulgar attorney and the brutal violence of a Corsican bandit, a spiritual autocracy at which the proudest of his predecessors had never even dared to aim. But Napoleon contributed as much indirectly as directly to the advance of French Ultramontanism. His insolent contempt for the religion he had so haughtily reinstated alienated the sympathies both of the clergy and their flocks, and, finding no national centre for their loyalty, they turned inevitably towards Rome. The whole influence of the restored Jesuits, who had no longer any motive for concealing their colours, tended in the same direction. From 1815 to 1830 there was a brief interval of suspense, as the Bourbons did what little they could to revive the old traditions of the Gallican Church. With the Revolution of July Ultramontanism finally triumphed. The suicidal policy of Louis Philippe and Guizot arrayed all that was most earnest and religious in French Catholicism on the side of the extreme Romanizers. From that time three parties have been gradually forming themselves—that of absolute Ultramontanism, of liberal Ultramontanism, and of reorganized Gallicanism aiming at moderate reformation in the Church, but rejecting the old monarchical traditions of the earlier Gallicanism, and embracing heartily the principles of civil freedom. Each of these parties had, and still has, its representative men. Joseph de Maistre may be considered the founder of the first, of which the chief surviving prophet is Louis Veuillot, who has probably never had an equal in the virulence, the coarseness, and the recklessness of his theological vituperation. The reviewer justly remarks that, when the history of contemporary Atheism shall be written, Veuillot must come in for much of the blame, "for if anything could inspire a horror of religion or extenuate the blasphemies of the time, it may be found in the career of this furious zealot." The hideous imprecations on Passaglia which he published in a work entitled Le Parfum de Rome may be in the recollection of some of our readers. The most depraved imagination of an inquisitor or a fiend could hardly have rivalled the horribly minute ingenuity of the tortures invoked on the head of the man who dared to disbelieve the Pope's temporal power. Yet this man is the darling of his party, and his organ the Univers, when denounced by some of the bishops—the Record would be milk and water to it—received the solemn approval of the Vatican. Lamennais, who for a time had followed De Maistre, became the leader of the second or Liberal Ultramontane party, till the emphatic condemnation pronounced by his infallible oracle on his most cherished convictions as to the sacred rights of conscience gradually alienated him from all belief in Christianity. He went to Rome in unhesitating faith—for to him the voice of the Pope was as the voice of God—but he came away bitterly complaining that "at Rome they would, if they could, sell everything; they would sell the Father, and they would sell the Son, and they would sell the Holy Ghost." Dupanloup, the eloquent Bishop of Orleans—so far as we can classify such a very uncertain, not to say inconsistent, writer—may perhaps be best reckoned among the present leaders of this party. The brightest ornament of the third party, of reorganized Gallicanism, was Lacordaire; and his friend Montalembert, in his later and better moods—for he, like Dupanloup, is not always consistent with himself—also belongs to it. The Archbishops of Paris for many years past must be reckoned among its most eminent representatives. One of them, Mgr. Affre, it will be remembered, was shot down on the barricades in 1848, while ministering to the wounded soldiers, and his successor, Mgr. Sibour, was stabbed by a suspended priest in church just as he was about to commence a suit against the Univers for its libellous attacks. Two distinguished writers, the Prince Albert de Broglie and the late Frederick Ozanam, must also be named among the ornaments of the Liberal Catholic party, which moreover numbers in its ranks Bishop Maret and Father Gratry, the two most learned theologians of the modern French Church. M. Huet, who formerly belonged to it, was driven from Christianity by the Encyclical of Pius IX., as Lamennais had been by the Encyclical of Gregory XVI., and as some of the ablest of the English converts have been whose names will readily occur to our readers. For a further account of the distinguished personages referred to, and of others who have exercised a critical influence on the religious thought of France, we must refer to the paper in the British Quarterly already mentioned.

The Imperial régime has perhaps done something to foster the growth of a moderate and national temper among the French clergy. Its Church policy has been more friendly than that of Guizot, and the Emperor has usually shown himself anxious to recognise the claims of men of learning and intellect, like the present Archbishop of Paris, who are opposed to extreme views. Three events have occurred, however, since 1851, which have in different ways seriously complicated the approaching crisis of Catholicism. These are the promulgation of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in 1854, the Italian Revolution, and the Encyclical. The importance of the first lies not so much in the particular doctrine proclaimed, which had no doubt been very generally believed before in the Roman Catholic Church, as in the Pope's claim to define it as matter of faith on his own ipse dixit. And there can be no doubt that this was the real ground of the urgency of the Jesuit Camarilla to get the doctrine promulgated, and of the Pontiff's compliance with their desire. For Pius IX. is well known, strange as it may seem, to be a firm believer in his own infallibility. The Italian Revolution has brought into prominence the rights of the temporal power of the Pope, and with it the whole subject of political liberalism. For it is clear on the face of it that no one can maintain absolutism as a sacred principle at Rome who is an honest advocate of liberal principles elsewhere. It is not wonderful, therefore, to find M. de l'Ariége, a liberal Catholic, insisting that every conquest of liberty will be precarious, every solution incomplete, so long as the question is not radically settled at Rome by the abolition of the temporal Papacy. Hardly less startling to the devotees of Rome was Montalembert's bold proclamation of unreserved liberty of conscience at the Catholic Congress of Malines in 1863. The Mortara case was still fresh in people's minds when he stood forward before a large assemblage of prelates and clergy, including Cardinal Wiseman, as well as laymen, to assert broadly and unequivocally his "inexpressible horror" at every kind of religious persecution. "The faggots lighted by the hands of Catholics," he exclaimed, "do not excite less horror than the scaffolds on which Protestants have immolated so many martyrs, and I quiver with pain as I feel on my own lips the gag that has been forced into the mouth of those who preached their faith with pure consciences. The Spanish Inquisition saying to the heretic, 'The truth or death,' is as odious to me as the French Terrorist saying to my grandfather, 'Liberty, fraternity, or death.' The human conscience has a right to demand that these hideous alternatives shall no longer be imposed upon it." These words were spoken in August, 1863. In December, 1864, appeared the Encyclical and Syllabus of condemned errors. Among these errors are the following:—"That the Church has no right to use compulsion and temporal power; that it is useless in our time to regard the Catholic religion as the only State religion, to the exclusion of every other worship; that the law is right which in some Catholic countries allows foreign residents the enjoyment of their own worship; that the Pope might and ought to put himself in accord with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." All these principles are solemnly condemned, and their opposites are to be accepted—as Dr. Manning is never tired of reminding those who choose to listen to him—as intellectual laws to rule the thoughts of all good Catholics. The Bishop of Orleans, as is well known, went down on his knees to the Pope to entreat him not to publish the Encyclical, but, when it appeared, he explained and defended it in an elaborate Pastoral compared to which Tract 90 is simplicity itself. It remains to inquire, in view of these facts, what will be the attitude of the French Church towards the intended Council of the Vatican. The writer we have so often referred to speaks of it as "a Jesuit plot." We believe he is mistaken, and that the original suggestion emanated from the opposite party; but there can be no doubt that the Jesuits will leave no stone unturned to use it, now it is decided upon, for their own purposes. They are said to have abandoned the idea of extorting from the assembled Fathers an assertion of Papal infallibility, in consequence of the determined attitude of the French Bishops. But they are pretty sure to use all their influence to extort from them a solemn approval of the Syllabus of condemned errors. There can be no doubt that, if they succeed, they will bring about a "fearful crisis, which will alienate the minds of men from the Gospel, and indeed from the very idea of God." For the present we content ourselves with quoting M. Pressensé's concluding prediction that if, instead of Catholicism being itself reformed, "liberal Catholicism is crushed and extirpated, there will ere long remain nothing of the great Roman Church but a lifeless corpse ready to vanish away." It is well to remember that the religious future of some 150,000,000 of Christians is seriously involved in the result.

COMPETITION IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

THE motion which Mr. Fawcett proposed last week upon competitive examinations represented the extreme view of a principle which, within certain limitations, may probably be sound enough. The thirty gentlemen who voted in the affirmative represent the extreme wing who are prepared to apply it unflinchingly in season or out of season. There were of course many in the majority who would be ready to give it a fair trial, but who do not look upon unlimited competition for offices as the Alpha and Omega of political science in its bearing upon appointments. As there is a tendency in a certain small class to make an idol of competitive examination, and to represent all unbelievers as preferring promotion by corrupt practices to promotion by merit, it is worth while to notice briefly what are the necessary failings of the competitive principle.

We may begin by noticing the obvious reductio ad absurdum which follows from its indiscriminate application. If success in a competitive examination is really the best test of merit, it should be applicable in many cases where we all admit it to be ludicrous. We say nothing of appointing judges or bishops by examination, for even the hardest heart of the bitterest doctrinaire will admit that the torture is one which should be reserved for youth. But, in cases more nearly parallel to that of clerks in a public office, the principle is equally preposterous. No man outside a lunatic asylum would appoint his own servants by their success in examinations, or select a tutor for his children, or clerks to be his assistants in a lawyer's office or a commercial house, by such a test. The reason is obvious—namely, that a very little personal observation of a young man will tell us facts about his qualifications for the proposed duties which we cannot possibly discover from his answers to a written paper. The examination is at best a rough test of his possession of certain qualities, which are after all not those of most importance for our purpose; it can tell us nothing about his honesty, about his tact, his good temper, or a thousand other merits which are of infinitely more weight than his power of writing out certain bits of information, and solving a few selected problems. Precisely the same principles apply to a public office. If we could assume—and we admit that it is a large assumption—that the authorities would take as much pains in selecting the best men for their work as a merchant or a lawyer would in selecting useful subordinates, personal discrimination would supply a test incomparably more delicate and searching than the rigid machinery of a competitive examination. In short, it is generally true that the best mode of appointment, in all cases where it can be obtained, is appointment by a qualified and impartial authority, who can of course apply from time to time such tests as he pleases. The apology for competitive examination is that, in many cases, we cannot depend upon such appointments; that the inferior offices are given away simply by private interest, and that the test of merit supplied by examination is better than no test at all, or than a system which leaves full swing to jobbery.

The supporters of the proposed change put forward, it is true, much higher claims than this. Admitting that examination can only test one kind of merit, it is asserted that, on the average, it will indicate the possession of other kinds also. The cleverest men are also the best, morally and physically; and, by securing one excellence, we shall, at the worst, have an equal chance of getting all others. If this were true, it would be safe to take men according to the height they could leap, or their measure round the chest; these would be simple and easy tests; and if the pleasant maxim be true, that all the virtues go together, we should secure all by securing any one. Without going quite so far as this, Mr. Fawcett tells us that the Cambridge triposes, although they test a man's ability only in one intellectual study, put the ablest men in the highest places with great accuracy. As a rule, the Senior Wrangler is a cleverer lad than the second, the second than the third, and so on to the bottom. But this, when we look into it, is a singularly modest claim, for probably the wit of man could hardly invent so perverse a scheme of examination as not to give some advantage to intellect. If, in place of mathematics, the chief subject of a University training were whist or the game of all-fours, we have not the least doubt that the cleverest men would, as a rule, be nearest the top. No ingenuity can lay out a race-course in which the cripples will generally beat the active men; and the whole merit claimed for the University of Cambridge is that they have not been so incomprehensibly absurd as to put the fools on a level with the men of genius. Even here, if it were necessary to go into the question, we should have to qualify the assertion materially. The examination test, we might urge, is very imperfect in many ways; it gives, for example, decided advantage to docility and powers of receiving knowledge ready-made as compared with vigour and originality of intellect. And, to come a little nearer to the point, even at Cambridge it is felt to have many shortcomings. A fellowship may be given without any injustice by examination, because fellows have few duties to discharge; but as soon as it is attempted to distribute offices by the same principle—to give tutorships, for example, simply in accordance with tripos lists—it is notorious that the plan breaks down, and would almost as often as not put men in places for which they are entirely unfit. The Senior Wrangler may be the cleverest man of his year; but it is the exception, rather than the rule, that he should also be the best teacher; and the colleges have, in fact, enough common sense to leave such duties to be distributed by appointment.

Although this precedent is not precisely applicable to the case of clerks in a public office, it will serve to suggest the main shortcomings of the competitive principle. In the first place, that principle is generally recommended in the name of promotion by merit; but it must be remembered that it is directly opposed to promotion by merits of all kinds, and frequently to promotion by merit of the appropriate kind. It absolutely forbids that we should take into account at all any merit except that which can be tested by writing out questions on paper. A man may be qualified in a dozen different ways for a given post, and yet we may be compelled to give it to a rival who is his inferior in all but one. As a necessary result, excellence which does not pay is deprived of a legitimate means of attraction. Merit, that is to say, is directly discouraged by a plan of which it is the one boast that it gives to merit a special advantage. It was proposed lately to make the appointments to the Indian Civil Service equally accessible to natives as to Englishmen. In other words, in governing a great empire, it was proposed that we should take no notice whatever of the one absolutely essential quality—namely, the power of governing; that we should leave that to mere chance, and take for the future rulers the lads who, at the age of twenty-two, could write out answers to most questions in the shortest time. This is only a legitimate consequence of the method which deliberately resolves to take into account only one, and that by no means the most important, criterion of ability.

It may be said that this argument is only applicable in the case of the higher offices, and that when we are considering the case of ordinary clerks, who have nothing to do but to copy letters and accounts, and whose appointment will in no case rest upon a careful consideration of their merits, the examination test is on the whole the best we can obtain in practice. Even here, however, there are certain obvious limitations to its utility. In the first place, there is the obvious consideration noticed by Mr. Lowe. So long as our public offices are in their present state, we are doing a very questionable service to our clever young men by inviting them to such a competition. A sharp youth who is just coming of age is strongly tempted to gain an immediate independence by going in for a competitive examination, which, moreover, under our present system of training, has a certain factitious attraction. He has been competing for exhibitions, scholarships, fellowships, from his earliest boyhood, and he fancies that success in such matters is of infinitely more importance than grown-up men can easily imagine. He accordingly goes into an office where he is set to spend years of his life upon merely mechanical drudgery. The direct tendency, in fact, of the system, is to get men who are too good for their work, and to give to public offices an attraction altogether disproportionate to their real value. We deliberately do our best to get our blocks cut with razors, for in a competitive examination there can be no limit, except the eagerness of the competitors, for the qualifications demanded. Instead of getting a fit man for the place, we probably get some one in whom it will necessarily be a constant source of discontent. This objection may, indeed, be removed to a great extent by a better organization of public offices, and we fully admit that under wise regulations there is much to be said for the competitive principle as compared with the old plan of entirely unrestricted patronage.

There is, however, another very different consideration, of which nothing was said in the debate, but which probably deserves more attention than any. The argument, so far as we have gone, rests upon the assumption that if a man has the good quality A, he is equally likely to possess the good qualities B, C, D, and so on to Z. If he succeeds in a competitive examination in mathematics, he will also be probably as good as his neighbours, or possibly better, in moral virtue, physical excellence, and social qualifications. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that this is true, it entirely neglects what we may call the secondary operation of the system. Choose the best mathematician for once, and you may perhaps find that he is also the most accomplished scholar; but give public notice that you are always going to take the best mathematician, and mathematics will be cultivated at the expense of scholarship. The effect upon the many persons who do not win the prize is at least as important as the effect upon the one who is successful. They have guided their studies by the course marked out for them, and have been educated for some years entirely with a view to excelling in this particular test. In other words, by selecting any particular study or course of studies as the necessary gateway to official preferment, we put an enormous premium upon those studies, and do for a great part of our educational bodies what fellowships and scholarships do for the Universities. The effect already produced by the appointments thrown open is very considerable, and is likely to be increased in future. The question whether the influence has, on the whole, been healthy is doubtless a large one; but one point is sufficiently clear to be noticed, and will suggest that our future action in this direction should at least be carefully considered. It is held by most thoughtful observers that the system of competitive examination, to which it is proposed to add a considerable stimulus, has nearly reached, if it has not exceeded, its reasonable limits, so far as the interests of our schools and Universities are concerned. A boy's career one series of competitions, if he shows any signs of talent, and many results of questionable value have been developed. The system of cramming and grinding has been raised to a fine art, and in itself is simply deleterious. Nor is it easy to see how competitive examinations can ever be thoroughly relieved from this evil. If the examinations are wide enough to test the general system of education, there is an irresistible temptation to superficial knowledge; if they are strictly limited, education tends to become unduly narrowed. An additional and artificial reason is given for neglecting the introduction into the curriculum of new studies which every one is anxious to see fairly encouraged. Meanwhile the characteristic evil of English schools, the idleness and ignorance of the inferior mass of commonplace boys, is not even touched; the stimulus is felt exclusively by the cleverer lads, who already are often urged beyond any judicious bounds. If entrance into public offices were limited to those who had satisfactorily passed a certain educational course (which supposes, of course, an organization of schools which we do not at present possess), the influence of the change would be more or less felt throughout the school. As it is only proposed to throw them open to competition amongst a few, the influence will be of an entirely different character; it will increase the tendency, already regarded with reasonable suspicion, towards cramming in all its branches, and will further strengthen the disposition to make examinations, not what they ought to be, the tests of the education given, but the determining objects towards which education is to be directed. We repeat that, within due limits, the principle may perhaps be carried out judiciously; but it is impossible to overlook the fact that it tends directly to encourage one of the most growing evils of the present day. Instead of hailing it as an obvious improvement under all circumstances, its extension ought to be carefully watched, and only admitted with proper securities against its too easy abuse.

THE BULGARIAN QUESTION.

THE Eastern Question is a fruitful mother of unruly children, and each succeeding year presents some new difficulty in the management of its offspring. Bulgaria is the youngest child, and she is now offering a difficulty for solution which cannot fail to influence the Eastern question in a manner extremely distasteful to the Greeks. The number of Orthodox Bulgarians in European Turkey, who have long been the sheep in the Greek Church with the best fleeces, exceeds four millions and a half. The Greeks themselves amount only to one million; and the whole Greek race, even when the Greeks of the Hellenic Kingdom, Asia Minor, and those scattered in Russia are included, is supposed to fall short of the Bulgarians by at least a million. The Bulgarians dwell together in one great body, inhabiting a fertile though thinly peopled country, which invites man to multiply and replenish the earth; while, on the other hand, the Greeks live dispersed along a thousand miles of sea-coast, in regions where limestone rocks forbid cultivation, and a smiling sea calls on them to build ships and plough its waters. The Bulgarians are naturally an agricultural people. The Greeks are a commercial people. Their union might lay the foundations of a powerful Christian State, but there are no signs that any ties of sympathy and interest can be formed to bind them together in a close alliance. At present their feelings are not friendly, and they seem to be steadily accumulating a large capital of national antipathy.

The Greeks have been long working to undermine the foundations of the Ottoman Empire, by rousing the feelings of nationality in all the Christian races subject to the Sultan. Historical traditions, and the position of the Eastern Church at Constantinople, suggested the ambitious scheme of establishing a new Greek Empire, and they called this grand project "the great idea." The position of the Greek Patriarchate is singular. Mohammed II., when he conquered Constantinople, found the Eastern Church in a disorganized state. He saw the importance of rendering the violent animosity of the Greek clergy against the Latins of practical use to his government, and of attaching them to his rule by entrusting them with administrative as well as ecclesiastical authority. The measures he adopted for organizing the Greek Church, and employing it as an instrument of his power, were singularly sagacious, and have secured the allegiance of the great body of the Greek clergy to the present day. He declared the Sultan the protector of Orthodoxy against Catholicism. He reorganized a Greek Patriarchate as a branch of the civil government, and found in the Patriarch Gennadios, and the Bishops of his Empire, a Secretary of State and a number of Prefects for the government of his Orthodox subjects of every race. The name given to the whole Orthodox population of the Ottoman Empire was, and is, Roum or Romaioi; and the practice has become general of calling them Greeks, without distinguishing in many cases whether they are Greeks, Vallachians, Servians, Albanians, or Bulgarians. Thirty years ago the Greeks themselves believed that their race in European Turkey numbered from nine to ten millions.

The spirit of nationality has now been roused in Bulgaria, and the Greeks, instead of striving to form an alliance with a spirit which they can neither lay nor guide, are constantly irritating its feelings and scorning its traditions. Bulgarian nationality ranks among the old nationalities of Europe. It is older than the English monarchy both in Church and State, and was nursed more than a thousand years ago by long and glorious wars with the Eastern Roman Empire and the Greek Church. Its revival could not fail to awaken some opposition to Greek nationality and the ecclesiastical domination of the Greeks, for, in the East, the mind of man is always recurring to the past. Already Bulgarian nationality is raising a barrier against the progress of what the modern Greeks call Hellenism, and its political significance is attracting attention in the East, though the Bulgarian question of to-day is essentially ecclesiastical. The strength of the feelings that impel the Bulgarians to demand ecclesiastical independence and the recognition of their national Church cannot be fully understood without some knowledge of their history.

The Bulgarians crossed the Danube, to establish themselves as conquerors and colonists in Mœsia, during the latter part of the fifth century. While the Angles were creating England, the Bulgarians were creating Bulgaria, and they fixed their name on the country between the Danube and the Balkan about the same time that the Angles gave the name of England to Southern Britain. The Bulgarian conquest resembles the Saxon, by the conquerors imposing their nationality on the conquered; while it also resembles the Scandinavian conquest of Normandy, inasmuch as the Bulgarians adopted the language of the Slavonian population which they absorbed. For many centuries the Kings of the Bulgarians were the sovereigns of a powerful monarchy that extended on both banks of the Danube from the Carpathian Mountains to the Balkan, and their conquests often embraced extensive districts of Thrace and Macedonia, where the agricultural population speaks the Bulgarian dialect at the present day. The Bulgarian monarchs, in a long series of bloody wars, sought to drive the Byzantine Emperors into Asia Minor, and they frequently encamped before the walls of Constantinople. As early as the year 712, the commerce of Bulgaria had acquired great political importance. In that year the Bulgarian troops defeated the armies of the Eastern Roman Empire, stormed the long wall of Thrace, and laid siege to Constantinople. Three years later, their King, Kormersios, concluded a commercial treaty with the Emperor Theodosius III. This treaty regulated the duties that were to be paid on the frontiers of the two States, and at every period of peace its stipulations remained in force for two centuries—a singular testimony to the stationary condition of Eastern society, and an honourable proof of the invariability and purity of the Byzantine coinage by which the money payments were regulated. About the time that Egbert founded the kingdom of England, a great king named Krumn ruled the Bulgarians. He defeated and slew the Emperor Nicephorus I., and the Greek chronicles tell us he made a drinking cup of the Emperor's skull. We can only hope that he used it solely for drinking viper broth and similar medicaments. He defeated the successor of Nicephorus, Michael I., who was dethroned by his subjects for his incapacity. The next Emperor, Leo V. the Armenian, though a soldier, was not more successful than his predecessors. He attempted the assassination of Krumn at a conference held under the walls of Constantinople, and to avenge his treachery the Bulgarian King laid waste the suburbs of the Imperial city, burned all the palaces and villas on the European shore of the Bosphorus, and desolated all the country, on his way back to the Balkan, with fire and sword. Fortunately for the Greek population, he died shortly after this expedition, and Leo V., in the year 817, concluded a treaty of peace with Mortagon, the new King of the Bulgarians. It is recorded that the commercial treaty of 715 was again renewed in the year 852, and a few years later Bogoris, the King of the Bulgarians, embraced Christianity, and was baptized by a Byzantine bishop, sent for the purpose by Michael III., called the Drunkard. At his baptism, Bogoris received the name of Michael from his disreputable godfather.

The conversion of the Bulgarians raised the question of nationality in ecclesiastical affairs more than a thousand years ago, which is the Bulgarian question of to-day; so that, in order to take a comprehensive and accurate view of the conflict that is going on between the Greek Patriarch and the Bulgarian clergy, we must note the leading events in a struggle for ecclesiastical independence on one side and for episcopal dominion on the other, which originated in the ninth century and is vigorous in the nineteenth. The mutual animosity has frequently been so violent that the Bulgarians have sought to separate themselves completely from the Greeks by submitting to the supremacy of the Pope; but a short experience has always convinced them that Papal despotism demands a more absolute sacrifice of ecclesiastical nationality than Greek domination requires. They have therefore always returned, in a short time, to the Eastern Church, and renewed their quarrels with the Greeks within the pale of Orthodoxy. Neander, in his History of the Christian Religion and Church, gives an interesting notice of the state of things in Bulgaria during the ninth century. The power of the Greek clergy was great, and the deficiency of priests induced a Greek layman to simulate the character of a priest, and to baptize and marry Christians. The people discovered the deceit of the wily Greek, and punished him by cutting off his nose and ears. The Greeks, both laymen and clergy, furnished the Bulgarians with many strange stories concerning their conduct, and taught them many superstitions. Some of the priests made themselves men of importance by boasting that they were able to foretell future events from the Scriptures.

During the reign of our Saxon King, Edward the Elder, the Bulgarians were ruled by a great monarch, Symeon, who placed Bulgaria on a footing of equality with the Byzantine Empire, both in political power and ecclesiastical independence. After vanquishing the Imperial armies at a place called Achelous, which Gibbon confounds in a strange way with the classic banks of the Ætolian river, and in virtue of the confusion calls Symeon a barbaric Hercules, the victorious Bulgarian monarch marched to Constantinople. In the year 924 he compelled the Emperor Romanus I. to hold a conference with him outside the walls of Constantinople, and agree to the terms of peace imposed by the victories of the Bulgarians, in presence of the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Senators and great officers of State of the Eastern Empire. The Byzantine historians have, as far as lay in their power, concealed the terms of this treaty. But several documents exist which prove that it contained an express article recognising the independence of a national Church in Bulgaria. The Byzantine writers record the terrible effect produced on the mind of the Greek Emperor by the communication of the ultimatum of the Bulgarian King. The political and ecclesiastical pride of the Emperor and the Patriarch were alike humbled in the dust, and together they entered the sanctuary of the great church of Blachern, where the Emperor Romanus, extending his hands to heaven, fell prostrate on the ground, and prayed long, with bitter tears, that the Virgin would soften the heart of Symeon, and avert from the Empire and the Church the degradation with which he threatened them. But neither prayers nor diplomacy availed, and in the year 924 the Greeks were compelled to recognise the national Church of Bulgaria as an independent autokephalous Church, observing the holy apostolic canons and traditions, and holding the doctrines of the Orthodox Church of Constantinople, with the most ample authority to administer its own ecclesiastical affairs, independently of every other Orthodox Church. The vindication of these rights forms the Bulgarian question of our day.

The brilliant reign of Symeon exhausted or corrupted the strength of the Bulgarian Kingdom. About fifty years after his death, the Russians invaded Bulgaria from the north; and the Armenian Emperor of Constantinople, Chumuskik Keurjan, who, from feelings of compassion for European throats and ears, is called John Zimisces, drove back the Russians and conquered Bulgaria. He restored the supremacy of the Greek Patriarch in the country north of the Balkan, but the Bulgarians prolonged the existence of their kingdom and their independent Church in the western provinces of Macedonia and the eastern part of Illyria; and Achrida became the capital and the seat of the Bulgarian Patri-archate. The Emperor Basil II. put an end to this first Bulgarian Kingdom in the year 1018. He drowned the monarchy in blood, and merited his title of "the Slayer of the Bulgarians" by his acts of unparalleled cruelty. Finding himself embarrassed with 15,000 Bulgarian prisoners, he put out their eyes and sent them back to Achrida. The King Samuel was so horrorstruck by the sight of these unfortunate men that he died of apoplexy. The Patriarch of Bulgaria, John of Dibre, was reduced by the Emperor to the rank of Archbishop of Bulgaria, and compelled to recognise the supremacy of the Patriarch of Constantinople, but he was allowed to retain eighteen episcopal sees under his jurisdiction.

The ecclesiastical legislation of Basil II. regulated the degree of subordination of the Archbishops of Bulgaria to the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and of the suffragan Bulgarian bishops to the Archbishop of Bulgaria, for many centuries. It must be observed that feelings of nationality were almost dormant in the Byzantine Government and the Eastern Church in the tenth and eleventh centuries. With some modifications, the state of things established by the Slayer of the Bulgarians continued in force for a period of 750 years. When Sir Paul Ricaut wrote his work, The Present State of the Greek Church, Anno Christi 1678, he observes that the Archbishop of Achrida had still eighteen suffragan bishops, and adds, "the certain reason of which I cannot tell." The shadow of independence in the Bulgarian Church was destroyed in the year 1767 by the Patriarch Samuel, who abolished the Archbishopric of Bulgaria. The tranquillity with which the Bulgarians submitted to the loss of their Church misled the Greeks into the belief that the Bulgarian race had no strong feelings of nationality. They overlooked the circumstances which silenced the voice of the nation, and they were unable to trace the connexion of the numerous heresies that flourished in Bulgaria with feelings of nationality.

The Ottoman conquest and the political organization of the Patriarchate of Constantinople by Mohammed II. created a close alliance between the Sultan's Government and the Greek clergy. Orthodox Bishops performed the duties of Ottoman officials, and the Porte consulted its interests in filling the Archbishopric of Bulgaria and its suffragan sees with Greeks. There was consequently no national sympathy between the people and the clergy when the Patriarch Samuel abolished a mere ecclesiastical title. The national impulse which now demands ecclesiastical independence has been awakened partly by that general quickening of the intellectual powers which is apparent in every race in European Turkey with the exception of the Albanian, and partly by the excitement of Greek and Russian emissaries who hoped to make the physical force of the Bulgarian nation subservient to their schemes for dismembering the Ottoman Empire. They had no suspicion that, in awakening the intellectual powers of the Bulgarians, the strength that was roused to activity would be employed first of all to advance Bulgarian interests and gratify Bulgarian feelings.

In order to complete a sketch of the complications of the Bulgarian question, it is necessary to notice the ecclesiastical history of the second Bulgarian Kingdom founded in the latter part of the twelfth century. This Bulgaro-Valluchian Kingdom is better known to Western historians than the first great Bulgarian monarchy on account of the intercourse of King Joannicius with Pope Innocent III., and of the defeat and death of the first Latin Emperor of Constantinople, Count Baldwin of Flanders, who ended his days in a Bulgarian prison. Joannicius had perceived the importance of securing the support of Papal authority against the Crusaders, and had reconciled himself with Pope Innocent III. by recognising Papal supremacy and placing his throne under the especial protection of the Pope before the Latin conquerors of Constantinople summoned him to become their vassal. To their insolent demands he replied, "I rule the land of my ancestors, and I received my crown from the hands of the Pope; you have violently taken possession of the imperial city, and the title of Emperor of Constantinople assumed by your leader is a manifest usurpation." It was, however, only a very short time before he sent this haughty reply that the diplomacy of Joannicius had succeeded. Pope Innocent III. sent a Cardinal with a crown and sceptre to Ternovo, who, after investing the Archbishop with the pallium as Metropolitan or Patriarch of Bulgaria, crowned Joannicius King of the Vallachians and Bulgarians on November 8, 1204. The submission of the King was a political manœuvre; the people remained attached to the Eastern Church, and only the Court and higher clergy conformed to Catholicism. The ecclesiastical union with Rome can only have lasted about thirty years, for John Asan, King of the Bulgarians, allied himself in 1234 with John Vatatzes, the Greek Emperor of Nicæa, and the Archbishop of Ternovo then returned to the communion of the Eastern Church, but he retained ecclesiastical supremacy in the Bulgarian Kingdom and the title of Patriarch of Bulgaria.

It is difficult to follow the history of the Bulgarian Patriarchate in the second Bulgarian Kingdom, and still more difficult to define its relations with the Patriarchate of Constantinople and the Archbishopric of Achrida. But there is little doubt that it remained supreme within the limits of the second Bulgarian Kingdom until its conquest, and that the Bulgarian Church was autokephalous, and not subjected to the Church of Constantinople. The extinction of the ecclesiastical as well as of the political independence of Bulgaria occurred in 1393, when Sultan Bajazid I. conquered the kingdom, the last King, Sisman, surrendered himself a prisoner, and his son became an apostate. When Mohammed II. organized the hierarchy of the Greek Church as it now exists in the Ottoman Empire, the Archbishop of Ternovo became entirely dependent on the Patriarch of Constantinople, but was honoured with the title of Exarch. We must repeat, what has been already observed, that the position of the Metropolitan of Achrida, as Archbishop of Bulgaria, representing the ecclesiastical traditions of the first Bulgarian Kingdom, and that of the Metropolitan of Ternovo as Exarch of Bulgaria, representing the more recent ecclesiastical traditions of the second Bulgarian Kingdom, cause considerable confusion; but the obscurity that prevails on some ecclesiastical details does not affect the main issue of the Bulgarian question, which is the claim of the Bulgarians to possess a national Church.

This sketch of Bulgarian ecclesiastical history was necessary to enable the reader to see clearly all the sources of the present conflict, and to avoid the necessity of any digressions in our short account of the actual position of the Bulgarian question. The feelings of nationality in the East are first felt through the action of religion, and, if there be nothing that can be called religious persecution, mental activity displays itself in ecclesiastical questions. The Patriarch of Constantinople, in his recent encyclical and synodal letter to all the independent Orthodox Churches, says that those who flattered the feelings of nationality, and awakened the prejudices of race among the Bulgarians, worked to detach them from his authority. The agitation of the Bulgarian question forced the Greek clergy, as early as the year 1848, to consent to the erection of a Bulgarian church and the foundation of a Bulgarian college at Constantinople, in order that religious service might be performed and theological instruction given to Bulgarians in their own ecclesiastical language. Shortly after this, several Bulgarian Bishops proclaimed themselves the champions of the deliverance of the Bulgarian Church from what they termed the intolerable exactions of the Greek clergy, and they demanded that the Patriarchs of Bulgaria should be restored to their former independent position. The Patriarch of Constantinople and the Greek Synod were so alarmed that some concessions were made; but, as usually happens where past traditions decide on present circumstances, the measures of conciliation adopted were so trifling that they served only as a recognition of ecclesiastical grievances, and gave strength to the demand for independence.

The Hatt-i-Humayoun having enlarged the liberties of the Christians in the Ottoman Empire, the Bulgarians in the year 1856 petitioned Sultan Abdul-Medjid to concede to them the same ecclesiastical privileges as a nation that are enjoyed by the Greeks and Armenians, and of which they had been deprived by an arbitrary act of the Patriarchate of Constantinople. From that time the disputes between the Greeks and Bulgarians in all the provinces where they are mingled together, from the western districts of Macedonia to the north-eastern part of Thrace, have been frequently very violent. Each nation attempted to take exclusive possession of the churches and schools, and drive out the other by force, and a number of Bulgarians resorted to the old stratagem of increasing their power by an alliance with the Papal Church. Communications were opened with the Pope, and a union with the Church of Rome was effected, but, as of old, the movement was repudiated by the nation. In 1860 the principal inhabitants of Ternovo presented a petition to the Sublime Porte recapitulating the exactions of the Greek bishops in Bulgaria, and enumerating the obstacles offered by the Greek clergy to the education of the people and the cultivation of the Bulgarian language. The prayer of this petition was, that the Archbishops of Ternovo and Achrida be restored to their ancient position in an independent national Church. On Easter Sunday in that year, Hilarion, the Bulgarian bishop who celebrated divine service in the national church at Constantinople, struck a heavy blow at Greek nationality by omitting to name the Patriarch of Constantinople in the Liturgy, and praying only for all Orthodox bishops, according to the form used by the Patriarchs of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and other independent patriarchs in the Eastern Church. He was condemned by the Greeks, but supported by several Bulgarian bishops. It is needless to follow the conflict of Greek and Bulgarian nationality into further details. The Greek Patriarch, in his encyclical letter, mentions that the animosity became so vehement that many Greek bishops were expelled from Bulgaria.

This state of things induced the Porte to listen to the demands of the Bulgarians so far as to name a mixed Commission, in 1862, for the purpose of bringing about an amicable arrangement. It was, however, already apparent to calm spectators that the feelings of two rival nationalities were too deeply engaged in hostilities on a narrow arena to leave any alternative between a decisive victory or a complete separation. When all hope of an amicable termination of the conflict ceased, the Sublime Porte addressed a communication to the Greek Patriarch, dated October 15, 1868, in which, after stating that the Bulgarian nation claimed a right to live under their own priests and bishops, that the efforts of the Porte to reconcile the differences between the Greeks and Bulgarians had proved unavailing, and that it was necessary to put an end to the existing discord, the Porte submitted two projects of arrangement to the Patriarch, and invited him, in case any third plan could be devised in harmony with the rights of both nationalities, and better adapted to ensure concord, to lay such plan before the Sublime Porte.

The first project conceded to the Bulgarians the right to have priests of their own nationality, and stipulated that in those dioceses where the Bulgarians form the majority the bishop is to be a Bulgarian, and in those where the majority of the Orthodox is Greek the bishop is to be a Greek. The Bulgarians shall have a Chief Metropolitan or Patriarch, and a Synod residing in the capital of the Empire. This Patriarch shall be elected by the Synod, and invested by an imperial berat. On dogmatic points the Bulgarian Church must refer to the œcumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, and his name must be mentioned in the service of the Bulgarian Church. The bishops, whatever be their nationality, must reside in their dioceses. The churches where the Bulgarian service is now performed shall remain the property of the Bulgarians, but the churches in which both Greek and Bulgarian services are now performed shall become the sole property of the Greeks, and the Bulgarians must build a new church. Regulations relative to the constitution of the Bulgarian Synod must be drawn up and submitted to the Porte. The second project differed from the first in conceding to the Bulgarians the right of having a metropolitan in every province and a bishop in every district where there exists a large Bulgarian population. But it accords to these metropolitans and bishops only the authority to establish their residence in, and to take their ecclesiastical titles from, towns not occupied by Greeks. The other articles of the second differ little from those of the first project, and the right to form a national Synod is conceded.

Both these projects were rejected by the Patriarch of Constantinople, who declared that they are opposed to the councils and canons of the Orthodox Church. Instead of proposing a third plan in conformity with these councils and canons, he proposed that an Œcumenical Council of the Eastern Church should be convoked. The proposal of convoking an Œcumenical Council under the protection of a Mohammedan Government was understood by the Porte to be a Patriarchal device for leaving the solution of the Bulgarian question to time and circumstances. The Ottoman Government must feel some satisfaction in being allowed to remain a passive spectator of an ecclesiastical conflict of Christians. Judging from the tendencies of society in the East, it seems probable that time and circumstances are strongly in favour of Bulgarian nationality in the struggle to gain ecclesiastical independence and establish a national Church.

THE IRISH SOCIETY.

IN the year 1609 unsuccessful rebellion, followed by confiscation, had placed the county of Derry and five adjoining counties of Ireland at the disposal of the Crown. In that year negotiations were commenced between the King and the Corporation of London for the purpose of settling the terms on which the forfeited lands in the county of Derry should be conveyed to the Corporation, for the purpose of planting them with Protestant colonies. For the management of the estates intended to be thus conveyed, the Common Council elected a body, consisting of a Governor, Deputy-Governor, and twenty-four Assistants, of whom one half retire every year, their places being supplied by a new election. The body thus elected was incorporated by Royal Charter, and its estates were erected into a county which was called Londonderry. This body is generally called the Irish Society. A large portion of the lands originally belonging to it was afterwards divided among the twelve great Companies of the City of London, which thus became landowners in Ireland. Some of these Companies from time to time disposed of their estates in perpetuity. Others granted long leases; but the Drapers', Grocers', and Mercers' Companies retained their estates in their own hands, and manage them by resident agents. The lands not divided among the Companies remained vested in the Irish Society, which thus counted among its possessions the city of Londonderry, the town of Coleraine, the fisheries of the Bann and the Foyle, and 30,000 acres of land. The introduction of this colony changed the aspect of the country, which had theretofore been one of the most desolate parts of Ireland. Artisans in all the chief branches of trade and manufacture were brought over by the Companies, and habits of industry and independence became at once fixed among the population. The native Irish, who had been driven from the country, returned by degrees, and imitated, although they did not equal, the diligence and frugality of the colonists.

We seem to approach the border of the burlesque when we mention that a body composed of the Common Councilmen of the City of London, as we now know them, are the inheritors of these grand traditions, and the owners of these magnificent possessions. Within recent years Mr. Cox, the member of Parliament for Finsbury, was Deputy-Governor of the Irish Society, and visited in that capacity the famous city of Londonderry, the bulwark of the Protestantism of Ulster, of which, as representing the Society, he was the visible master and possessor. A deputation of the Society visits its estates every year, and we do not doubt that the Common Councilmen of London enjoy their ease and maintain their dignity upon these expeditions. The estates of the Society and of the Companies, compared with estates in other parts of Ireland, are well managed. We do not exactly know what becomes of the surplus revenues of these bodies after defraying expenses of management, but we suppose that it must be a very nice thing to be a solicitor or surveyor employed by them, because we are sure that they pay their servants liberally, both as being their duty and as a means of preventing the surplus from growing inconveniently large. It is a pity that the Common Councilmen of London should be interrupted in this pleasant business of playing landlords over Londonderry, but we do greatly fear that Mr. Gladstone has his eye upon them, and that Mr. Bright will be wanting to try, at their expense, some of his plans for regenerating Ireland. It is quite true that the management of their estates has become much more economical and efficient than it used to be, and that those estates present an aspect of tranquillity and prosperity which other parts of Ireland would do well to imitate. It is not the least of the difficulties of legislating for that strange country, that any admission which may be made of the evils of the system of absentee landlords must be qualified with the remark that some of the best-managed estates belong to absentee landlords. It was stated by Mr. Alderman Lawrence, who defended the Irish Society in the House of Commons against Mr. Maguire's attack, that six-tenths of the revenues of the Society are spent in Ireland. But we cannot wonder if Irishmen complain that the remaining four-tenths are spent, as we suppose they are, in London. It is stated again, and probably with truth, by Mr. Alderman Lawrence, that the Society does not job for the benefit of the families of its own members. But an Irishman would think, if he did not say, that the Society ought to job for the benefit of his compatriots. Nor can we wonder that an Irishman, even if he admits that the present management is as good as the managers represent it as being, looks back with fond regret to the pretty pickings which Englishmen must have got out of these estates in former years. The Society has been involved in protracted and costly litigation, and although this is now treated as a misfortune, we suspect that it was borne with considerable equanimity both by the Society and by the lawyers who were employed by it. There was a grand lawsuit between the Society and the Skinners' Company, which claimed a share of the surplus revenues of the Society. The claim failed, and the Society was declared to be entitled to retain its surplus upon trust, to apply it in its discretion to public purposes. If the claim had succeeded, the Skinners' Company would have got a share of the surplus revenues, and what it would have done with them we cannot tell, but we can hardly suppose they would have been applied exclusively for the benefit of Ireland. We hear much from Mr. Alderman Lawrence about gifts of money by the Society to build bridges and found schools, and it is doubtless pleasant to Common Councilmen to perform the part of Providence during a tour in Ireland; but, unfortunately, a view of the subject presents itself to Irishmen according to which these gifts, for which they are called upon to be grateful, are made to them out of their own money. There is as much difference between the views entertained at London and Londonderry as there is between Mr. Cox and the founders of the Irish Society. The view entertained at Londonderry may perhaps be mistaken, but it would at least be desirable that Common Councilmen of London should endeavour to understand it.

The Irish Society necessarily shares that weakness of the Corporation out of which it is derived, which arises from the fact that the most intelligent and influential of the citizens of London keep aloof from the management of its affairs. Mr. Crawford, as a member for the City, felt it his duty to speak upon Mr. Maguire's motion; but he stated that, as he was not a member of the Corporation, he knew little about the management of the Society. It is difficult to maintain that a body composed of twenty-four Common Councilmen, who hold office for two years, is well qualified for the performance of its duty, unless indeed that duty be, as suggested by a speaker in the debate, the consumption of a surplus. If it be admitted that the whole revenues of the Society ought to be applied to public purposes, it seems to follow that the administration of these revenues ought to be placed in different hands. But if it could be successfully contended that the Society ought to limit the extent of the application of its revenues to public purposes, so as to have the largest possible surplus available for division among the City Companies, then the Society, being composed of the same elements as the Companies, may be considered as well constituted to protect their interests. To put the matter shortly, if the Society exists for the benefit of London, it might remain as it is; but if it exists for the benefit of Londonderry, its constitution ought to be changed. There is a clear distinction between the position of the Society as a landowner and the position of the Companies. The Society holds its lands, as has been judicially decided, upon trust for public purposes; but the Companies acquired their lands in return for the contributions of money which they made to the colonizing project of King James I. Indeed, the fortifications of Protestant Londonderry, which stood 105 days' siege by the Roman Catholic army of King James II., were built with the money of the Companies, and when the houses and churches which had been ruined by artillery were rebuilt, the Companies again found the money. The case of the Companies is even stronger, because the contributions which they made under King James I. were compulsorily levied upon them by the Corporation. They hold their Irish estates, therefore, by the same tenure as they hold estates in England. Whether it is beneficial to Ireland or to England that such bodies should hold estates, and apply the revenues thereof as they do apply them, is a large question into which we will not at this time enter. The case of the Irish Society, as we have said, is different. It is bound to apply its revenues for public purposes in Ireland, and if it fulfils that duty it is not likely to be embarrassed with a surplus. It will not be forgotten that although the administrators of these estates are, and have been in the present century, what we know them, yet they represent the instruments of a great act of policy concerning which an historian has written that "the experience of ages bears the most honourable testimony to the design, and Ireland must gratefully acknowledge that here were the first foundations laid of her affluence and security." We admit that the Society amply fulfilled the purposes for which it was created, and we have only to add that it fulfilled them a long time ago. The inquiry which is now promised by the Secretary for Ireland will not add much to the knowledge which may be derived from the Report of the Royal Commission on the Corporation of London which examined into this matter in 1854. We learn from that Report that the revenues of the Society are at present appropriated partly to the expenses of management, partly in grants for the municipal institutions of Londonderry, and partly in grants to various charitable and educational institutions connected with the districts around Londonderry and Coleraine. It has become in substance a large charitable endowment for the North of Ireland, managed by an absentee committee in London. The relations between the Society and its tenants and dependants are unsatisfactory. "We feel bound," say the Commissioners, "to express our opinion that great abuses existed no long time since in the administration of this trust property, and that the expenses of management went far beyond the necessary costs attendant upon a distant executive." In the thirty years which elapsed from 1818 to 1847 the costs of management amounted to more than half the expenditure, if we exclude from the calculation certain items of expenditure which were of a permanent nature.

It was said by King James I. that, when his enemies should hear that the famous city of London had a footing in Ulster, they would be terrified from looking into Ireland. In the lapse of two centuries and a half the power and influence of the City of London have come to be principally directed to maintaining a position which it gained by the display of qualities other than those which get a man into Parliament for Finsbury. We doubt whether the Fenians would be terrified by the arrival in Ulster of Mr. Cox or the twenty-four Common Councilmen, his colleagues, with their wives and daughters. Truly said the Commissioners of 1854, "the influence of the City of London in civilizing, in governing, and in protecting the North of Ireland, is no longer felt." In the last agony of that protracted siege when famine within the walls of Londonderry became more terrible than bigoted and infuriated enemies without, the watchers upon the city's towers looked forth upon Loch Foyle and saw traversing its waters ships with friendly ensigns. The fort was passed, the boom was broken, and the ships which bore succour from the City of London to her distant and afflicted daughter lay along the quays. Then the citizens of Londonderry might have exclaimed, with heartfelt gratitude, ex oriente salus. We suppose they are expected to say the same when they now complain that their English landlords will not grant them building leases, and when a deputation of London Common Councilmen comes in state to listen to the recital of their grievances.

THE SHILLING CORN DUTY.

"FAITH in principles" and "the strength of abstract reasoning" may have been sufficiently good reasons for the remission of the Corn duties, and if Mr. Lowe had contented himself with resting his case on them he would have shown more wisdom in this matter than he has done. Beyond these reasons, all his arguments, all his assumptions and speculations, are of the weakest type—almost laughably weak to those who strip the subject of its sentiment, and look at it calmly in its practical bearings. Those parts of his argument which had truth for their basis were weak, while those which unfolded great prospects of advantage were founded on expectations of which it may be safely said that they will not be accomplished. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, having created for himself a surplus by drawing from certain classes of tax-payers fifteen months' taxes within twelve months, had before him the whole field of British taxation from which to select for remission the most obnoxious or the most unjust tax. Whether he has done so it is not our purpose here to discuss. It ought to be remarked, however, that among merchants and the public the Sugar duties were those which had been specially marked as requiring alteration; duties heavy in themselves, amounting perhaps to about 30 per cent. on the value of the raw material, and levied on such a scale, if the complaints made through the public journals are true, as to amount to giving a premium to the producer abroad for supplying consumers here with the worst article. The Tea duties, amounting to 25 or 30 per cent., were pointed out for reduction by Mr. Bright's "free breakfast table" cry; yet these and others have been passed over in favour of a duty with which no one except perhaps a few of the surviving Anti-Corn Law Leaguers was dissatisfied to the extent of even grumbling at it. It is a duty which it really costs nothing to collect; at least we presume that not an officer of Customs less will be employed, for Mr. Lowe has told us of no saving under that head, which he would have done if such a saving were contemplated. Here was nearly a million of money levied by a tax so small in amount as to be practically imperceptible. But it was necessary for Mr. Lowe to magnify the evils and wrongs wrought by the tax in order to exalt his merit and judgment in striking it out of the tariff. The only point he raised worth discussing was the statement that it is "a kind of poll-tax" "graduated in a peculiar fashion, because it falls heaviest on the poorest of your people." Now there are many who believe that in fact the duty does not fall on our people at all, but that it is—like the cost of freight, for instance—a charge borne by the foreign producer. It is argued that, if the cost of freight rises, the foreign producer has to accept less for his corn, because, this country being in most years the only grain-importing country of any importance, it has, so to speak, the monopoly of purchase in all the markets of the world, and producers have no option but to sell their goods at what may be current values here, or to keep them. If the cost of conveyance to this country advances they must accept less prices at home; so with the duty, if it has to be paid before the corn can enter, the producer must accept so much the less for his corn. In the same way it is contended that cargoes of grain on sale at ports of call will fetch more when the duty ceases to be levied, by the amount of duty, than they would have done had it not been removed; and it was for this reason that merchants were so anxious to extract from the Government information as to the time when the duty would cease. Others believe that the reduction is shared between the foreigner and the consumer at home; and this probably is the fact, and for these reasons. The real basis of value for foreign corn is the value of British corn; the merchant or the speculator when he buys abroad has to consider what, from its plenty or scarcity, will be the value of home-grown grain at the expected time of the arrival of his ships. Having formed his opinion, he knows by experience the comparative value of the foreign grain; he deducts from this assumed value the cost of freight and insurance, and other transit charges, and the profit he sets down for his venture, and offers the merchant abroad the remainder as the price he is willing to pay. When he had to pay the duty, the price he could offer was clearly one shilling less than he will be able to afford to give after the removal of the duty; and so far the shilling would appear to go into the foreigner's pocket. But as this extra shilling would be pro tanto an additional inducement to the foreigner to part with his produce, or would pay carriage on a greater distance from the interior to the sea-board, there would be an increase in the quantities sent to our country, which would tend to bring down prices. This fall in prices would, however, as Mr. Caird has shown, tend to restrict the cultivation, and we should have again to seek in foreign markets what would be wanted to make up the deficiency. Thus, after some oscillations, the shilling duty remitted would be found to be shared in some indefinable proportions between the producer abroad and the consumer at home, so that, after all, the relief to our poorest classes is not to the full amount of the impost.

Mr Lowe made a great point of the exceptional severity with which this tax presses on the poor, and it is worth while to inquire into the extent of their grievance. However the matter may stand, it is scarcely fair to infer that the Corn duties amount to an exceptional income-tax of 1½ per cent. even on the means of a family whose only diet is bread. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the price of wheat will fall to an extent equal to the duty, the real extent of the grievance is that the bread-eating family has had to pay a shilling per quarter duty on its consumption of wheat over and above that of the better-fed family higher in the scale of diet, who eat "meat, eggs, butter, and the like, articles that are duty free." This difference of consumption between the lowest and the middle classes, according to the researches of Dr. Gilbert and Mr. Lawes, amounts to 1¼ bushel of wheat per head per annum; so that a bread-eating family of six souls would have to pay the duty on 7½ bushels of wheat per annum, or about one shilling in all, more than their better-fed neighbours—a grievance no doubt, but, after all, no very great grievance, even if the matter rested here. It is the same sort of grievance as that complained of by the tradesman who has to pay for a penny receipt stamp on small transactions, while his larger neighbour with fewer transactions, each ten times as large, pays a less amount in stamp duties to the revenue. But of the duty levied on corn, amounting altogether to 900,000*l.*, only about 400,000*l.* falls on wheat; the remaining half million is paid on articles of food which are converted into "meat, butter, eggs, and the like"; and as, ex hypothesi, the tax must be held ultimately to come out of the consumer's pocket, it appears that the better-fed classes, though paying slightly less of the bread tax, pay the whole half million levied on corn other than wheat, and thus, after all, substantial justice is done to all. Indirect taxes are never exactly just in their incidence, but the small duty on corn was probably as just a one as could be devised.

Proceeding from his denunciation of the Corn duty for its unjust pressure upon the poor, Mr. Lowe's next point was its wrongful levy on a "material in its rawest state"; and he argued that "this 1*s.* per quarter—or whatever it is—has to bear the profit of the millers, the retailers, and all the different persons through whose hands the corn passes before it reaches the poor man in the form of a loaf." This was indeed to labour the argument, just as much as when, later on, he went into an elaborate statement to show that the duty amounted to a rate of from 2 to 3 per cent. If all the profits together between the importer and the consumer—and, notwithstanding all Mr. Lowe's catalogue, they are only those of the miller and the baker—exceed, or even come up to 10 per cent., we are much mistaken. Now 10 per cent. on a shilling is little more than a penny, and the average value of wheat being about 50*s.* per quarter, and the quarter being more than the consumption of each of the poorest even of the population per annum, Mr. Lowe's indignation was kindled about a "poll-tax," in the shape of profits, of one penny per head per annum, one penny on fifty shillings—a piling up of agony about a very small matter.

Passing from the consideration of the evils due to the Corn duty, Mr. Lowe proceeded to expound the advantages which our merchants are to gain by its removal. Having shown by returns "how little of an exporting country England is," and that the quantities transhipped were greater than those taken from warehouse, "plainly showing the evil effect of the duty in preventing the establishment of a great corn depôt in this country," he said, "Nothing but its importance to the poorest and most helpless class of the community could justify me in saying so much as I have done. In doing what we propose we shall be doing that which will greatly tend to their benefit, and be laying the foundation of a great entrepôt trade which will be of enormous advantage to the mercantile classes," &c. We do not hesitate to say that a greater fallacy has never been propounded, and that on this topic the Chancellor of the Exchequer has indulged in anticipations which mercantile men only laugh at, and has thus brought on himself ridicule which might have been avoided had he taken the trouble to make the slightest inquiry into the subject amongst the classes interested. In his spirit of self-reliance he abstained from taking counsel with any expert, just as in his financial scheme he neglected to consult the authorities at the Bank of England. That he should have fallen into this error is not of itself a matter of importance, but it is to be regretted so far as it produces among the trading classes the impression that mercantile topics receive but careless and shallow attention from Mr. Lowe. Another sign of this absence of consideration of the interests of trade may be found in his declaration on Monday night that the money-market must take care of itself. His error arose from the dependence he placed on the Government Returns. If he had inquired from any merchant engaged in the corn trade he would have learned that an enormous trade has been done in this country, in all seasons of scarcity in Western Europe, by means of cargoes of grain from exporting countries touching at Cork or at Falmouth to learn their destination. These cargoes are sold for, and can be directed to, the best market at the moment of their arrival. Thus all expenses of removing from the ship to the store, and from the store back to the ship, and the warehouse expenses and the new freight, are saved by the merchant, who sends his corn direct to the market in need of it at about the same cost as would bring it to England. And in times of plenty and low prices merchants retain their corn in the depôts at the ports of shipment, because it can there be stored cheaper than in this the most expensive country in the world, and is available to be sent direct to any country that may be in need, whether on the Atlantic or the Mediterranean, without incurring the preliminary cost and risk of a voyage to England. And if it were true that the impost prevented grain from being brought to England for storage, the impediment might have been removed by the adoption of the French system of allowing drawbacks on exportation. The French Government not only returns the duty on imported grain if it be re-exported, but also allows the drawback if native grain be exported in place of foreign grain imported, and this without limitation as to the export taking place at the port of importation. Thus duty received on foreign grain at Marseilles may be returned on an equivalent quantity of French corn exported from Dunkirk, Havre, or Nantes. The fact is, we believe, that much larger quantities were retained in granaries in the ports of this country under the old sliding scale of duties, when speculators stored their corn under bond, for the double chance of making a profit by the rise in price and by the consequent reduction of duty, than ever have been or ever will be under a Free-trade system. Now there is no inducement to store corn here which can be housed more cheaply where it is grown. To the farmer the change is likely to make little difference; if it should turn out that he loses somewhat on the price of wheat, he will probably gain something on the reduction, if there be any, in the cost of feeding stuffs. But, as was said in the debate on Monday, the removal of the Corn duties will help him in his agitation against the Malt duty, which, rightly or wrongly, he believes to tell unfairly against the price he obtains for his barley.

On the whole, then, the Corn duty is, as Mr. Baring said, a sentimental grievance that presses upon nobody and injures nobody, and Mr. Lowe would have done better had he simply rested his proposition to put an end to it on the fact that it was the last rag of Protection. In other words, he would have done well to follow the advice of the crafty old judge, who recommended his disciple to give his judgments, but to be very chary of his reasons for them.

SOLDIER LABOUR.

ALL the recent ideas as to Military Reform point in one direction—the combination of mere fighting, and its accompaniments of drill and the like, with more or less of civilian work. In the Prussian army, which has earned by its achievements the right to be regarded as a model of organization, you find men who are essentially civilians trained to the highest point of military efficiency and endurance. No soldiers ever camped with less luxury, or marched with better will, or fought with more tenacity, than the semi-civilian levies who won the decisive battle of Sadowa. In their own, and that a peculiarly British, fashion, our Volunteers have furnished an example of the same tendency, in which the military element is still more decidedly subordinated to civil life; and even in that exclusively fighting machine, our regular army, it is beginning to be seen that some infusion of civilian work and industry will rather improve than deteriorate the quality of the troops. The notion that a soldier should over soil his hands with ordinary work, like the theory that mere civilians can be of use with rifles in their hands, is of course extremely distasteful to that purely professional class of military officers—of which "Hippophylax" and the "Military Critics" of the Times are flagrant specimens—who think that the blunders of general officers are to be explained and excused by the fact that the men for the time being under their command are only Volunteers. But there is a higher class of representatives of the British Army who are not too narrow-minded to see the value of improvements which clash with the prejudices of the Service, and we do not doubt that all the superior intelligence of the army will range itself on the side of those who wish to make the soldier something more than a trigger-pulling piece of mechanism, and at the same time to diminish the unexampled cost of the British army. But that an enormous mass of prejudice has to be forced aside before anything effectual can be done was evident enough from the discussion on Monday evening. Mr. Hanbury Tracy, backed by Mr. Headlam, made out a really conclusive case in favour of their proposal, that an authorized organization should be adopted for extending the system of military labour to military works throughout all the stations of Her Majesty's Army.

Napoleon's dictum about an army fighting with spades has been borne in mind by his successor and imitator, who has recently directed the energies of his large and vigorous army to the art of rapid entrenchment in the face of an enemy. The actual experience of the Americans in their tremendous civil war proved, not only the importance of employing soldiers on this entrenching work, but the value (in some emergencies quite inestimable) of the skilled labour to be got out of an average regiment. Not only earthworks, but railways and telegraphs, were pulled to pieces and built up again with marvellous rapidity by the soldiers themselves, and more than one successful campaign was due to this obvious mode of utilizing the means at the disposal of the commanding officer. In the very few places where the experiment of using soldier labour has been tried by our army, the result has been an average saving of 30 or 40 per cent., and a marked improvement in the tone of a soldiery whose direst temptation is the enforced idleness in which the greater part of their time is spent. Except at a few isolated stations, the commonest barrack repairs have been executed by contract, by artificers and labourers being hired for the occasion to work while thousands of soldiers were looking on with folded arms. It stands to reason that men with no other opportunity of earning anything for themselves will gladly work for lower pay than is demanded by civilian artisans; and though the value of soldier labour is said to be on an average not more than three-fourths of that of workmen specially trained to the particular labour required, the pay which fully satisfies the otherwise idle soldier is not much more than a quarter of the ruling market rate. A great saving to the country is at the same time a boon and a means of moral training to the soldier, and the marked success of the experiment, wherever it has been tried, is amply sufficient to justify and require the establishment of the general rule which Mr. Hanbury Tracy proposed for the acceptance of the War Department.

One, and only one, objection was started in the House. General Herbert observed that the obstacle to be surmounted was not merely the opposition of officers, because superintendence was requisite, and Engineer officers were not always available for the duty. The idea that a Line officer should be expected to learn just enough of engineer duties to be able to look after the common repairs which his men were doing in barracks, would of course be treated by General Herbert as a monstrous invasion of military privileges; but it it is good for the men and for their country that they should be taught to do the ordinary work of the Service, it cannot be bad for the officers to acquire the simple art of seeing whether the work is effectually done. But what General Herbert hinted at—the opposition of officers—is really the only substantial difficulty, and this would soon cease to be a difficulty at all in any army over which an intelligent Minister exercised a real authority. Mr. Cardwell, with that singular admixture of natural simplicity and official astuteness which characterizes him, half unconsciously revealed the whole truth. He did not attempt to deny that the Resolution proposed was in every respect right; and while the mover had dwelt chiefly on the substantial saving to be effected by the projected reform, and the increased efficiency which it would give to the army, the Minister reinforced his arguments by dwelling on the great benefit which the soldier would derive both by the opportunity of accumulating a little store of his own, and by the escape from those habits of idleness which are the bane of the army. So strongly did Mr. Cardwell express himself in favour of the project as to make it at first sight unintelligible why he did not at once declare that the Resolution ought to be carried, and that it should immediately be enforced. This is what a Minister who was really master of his department could scarcely have stopped short of saying. But Mr. Cardwell was content to say that he should be "happy to permit any organization which would have the desired result;" as if the functions of a Minister who calls himself supreme in his office, and acknowledges his personal responsibility for everything done or neglected in his department, were confined to permitting the reforms which it is his duty to originate and enforce. But Mr. Cardwell knows his position. Notwithstanding certain brave words on occasion, he is not master of the army over which he nominally presides. What he thinks right he does not venture to direct, and he deprecates even the soundest resolutions of the House until he has ascertained whether he can carry with him the commanding officers whom a strong Minister would control. Mr. Cardwell knows, no doubt, as other people know, that a certain number of commanding officers—not by any means the best of them—set their faces against soldier labour. He is not quite sure whether he will have the co-operation of the Horse Guards in battling with petty prejudices of this description. He would gladly do all in his power, but it might "materially impair discipline and do serious injury to the army if the commanding officers were in any way ignored in this matter." One is tempted to ask whether the War Minister is the master or the servant of the commanding officers of regiments. Has he not a Commander-in-Chief as his principal subordinate, through whom to issue the unpalatable order that henceforth soldiers, when off parade, shall do the work that lies ready to their hand, instead of spending the whole of their spare time in smoking and in other, it may be less harmless, amusements? If the terrible commanding officers would loosen the bonds of discipline rather than give a cheerful obedience to a sensible order from the War Office, surely they would submit with a good grace if the mandate were addressed from the Horse Guards. Something of this sort seems to have occurred to Mr. Cardwell, but then he could not pledge himself to anything definite, for it was not for him to issue orders to his illustrious subordinate. What he could do he had done. He had communicated the information contained in the returns to the Commander-in-Chief, and "had expressed a hope that the attention of commanding officers might be drawn by a circular to the good resulting from the system." If our army had been under a dual government this language would have been a matter of course, but for a Minister to express a hope that his chief subordinate will point out to certain inferior officers the advantages of taking a certain course, is a beautiful example of the delicacy and courtesy with which a Secretary of State, wielding supreme power in his department, finds it desirable to make his orders known. How many of the commanding officers addressed (if they ever are addressed on the subject) will see the advantage of setting their men to work, is a problem which Mr. Hanbury Tracy will have to solve before making up his mind as to the value of the assurances which he has received from Mr. Cardwell.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

TO the professional advocates of "working-men's rights" it is inconceivable that any one who dislikes Trade-Unions can be anything but an enemy of the working-man. Therefore everything that we or anybody else can say on behalf of working-men's best interests will of course be set down as mere hypocrisy by those who traffic in their credulity. For all that, there are people in this world who can discriminate between the policy which would aid the working-man in making a decent provision against evil days and that which would make him simply the controlling and irresponsible partner in his employer's business. No doubt, to the working-man himself a free system of Unionism, without any check upon picketing, opens out the prospect of the speediest and surest way to competence. But the weak point of the system is that it destroys the fruit which it would grasp; in its greed it kills the source of the wages which it hopes to increase. There comes a time when, under its pressure, the strain upon the wage-fund becomes so severe that capital, wages, and labour are all overturned in one common ruin, and the last condition of the working-man is worse than the first. It is perhaps less a sentiment of generosity than of enlightened self-interest which impels us to sympathize with every effort to promote the present and future comfort of the working-man by legitimate means. The most legitimate means are those by which he can be made himself to ensure his own future maintenance by present economy. As a rule, he has three courses open to him. He may by superior talent and energy save money, become a capitalist, and ascend from the ranks of the labourer into those of the employer; or he may become dependent on funds to which he has himself contributed; or he may go to the poor-house. The first of these is so exceptional a contingency that it may safely be left out of sight. The last is both so unfortunate and so unexceptional that the contemplation of its possibility only inspires the desire of averting its realization. The second is so desirable a contingency that one can only regret its infrequency, and seek to repair it by any means which present themselves. And to do this was the object of Mr. Richards's motion, last week, respecting Friendly Societies.

We treated this subject some months ago; but it is of such great importance to the working-classes generally, and therefore also to the employing classes, that we do not hesitate to revert to the facts which we have already brought forward, and which Mr. Richards repeated on Friday week. No one who has not read the Report of the Registrar can form any notion of the number of the different Friendly Societies established throughout England, and of the members belonging to them. The Odd Fellows number 412,000 members; the Foresters over 300,000. The receipts of the former last year amounted to 499,000*l.*; of the latter, to 366,000*l.* These receipts look large, but they are not too large in proportion to the objects to which they are devoted. These are the relief of members during sickness or other physical incapacity; a superannuation fund, payable after sixty years of age; and, in some cases, provision for funeral expenses. Now when we consider how often—quite irrespectively of strikes—men are thrown out of work by accidents or badness of trade, it is clear that a Benefit Society should have a good stock of money in hand to meet its ordinary demands. But then it has other demands which can only be computed after it has been some years in existence. These are on account of the superannuation fund. The pressure on this fund is much diminished by the cessation of members to contribute. As those who cease to subscribe cease to have any claim on the funds of the association, and as fresh members are perpetually admitted, there is, practically, less reason to apprehend failure under this head than a contrast between the prospectus of the association and the state of its chest would often suggest. But this is not so much a subject of congratulation to the societies as it is of regret that so large a proportion of the members should forego the most important benefit which their association holds out. And the knowledge of this fact must confirm the societies in a thriftlessness which seems habitual to many of them. Five hundred thousand pounds among 400,000 persons would be a large income if all the members were young, in good health, and constant work. But as this is not so, and a provision has to be made for the old, the disabled, and the unemployed, there is the greater urgency for a strict examination of accounts. The Foresters and the Odd Fellows have, respectively, a capital fund of one million sterling and two millions sterling each. These are large sums. But it is questionable whether, considering the time that they have been in existence, and the aggregate subscriptions which they have received in that time, each of the members ought not to have more than 3*l.* and 5*l.* respectively to divide among themselves on the immediate dissolution of these two Societies. Yet these figures represent the only sums divisible among them. Mr. Richards does not seem to have given the items of the expenditure, so that we do not know how much has been spent in management, and how much on the professed objects of the association. But we do know only too well the disproportionate vastness of the sums expended by many of these societies upon their management. For instance, the Royal Liver, a society quoted by Mr. Richards, for every 20*s.* it gives in relief, expends 15*s.* 9*d.* on management. Each of its committeemen receives a salary of 520*l.* a year: at least, this was the scale of payment very recently. In another Liverpool society, the Victoria Legal, the expenses of management are nearly in the ratio of one pound to every pound expended on relief. The Registrar of Friendly Societies mentions twelve Burial Societies, which consist of one million insurers, insured for an amount of not less than three millions sterling, and of which the gross receipts for last year reached upwards of 247,000*l.* The amount paid for benefits assured was 138,151*l.*; the amount of expenses for management, 94,763*l.*; and the whole of the funds in the hands of treasurers, agents, and collectors was last year only about 181,000*l.*, that is, three-quarters of a year's premiums. It is, moreover, worthy of notice that the monthly payments required by comparatively solvent Burial Societies would give to persons insuring with the Post-Office (if the latter insurances were reduced to 5*l.*) a larger sum than these societies promise to pay, and this would be guaranteed by Government security. For instance, for 1*d.* a week, or 4*s.* 4*d.* a year, while the Royal Liver pays 6*l.* and the Victoria Legal 7*l.* at death, the Post-Office pays 8*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; and, in cases where the "Royal Liver" pays 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, the "Victoria Legal" 2*l.* 5*s.*, and the Loyal Philanthropic 2*l.* 10*s.*, the Post-Office pays 2*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* This is the aspect presented by societies in good repute. There is another aspect presented by many smaller societies and branch establishments, which fills the mind with dismay and pity at the unhappy lot of their contributors. We find one branch which, with forty-one members, possesses only 43*l.*; another with eighteen members and 17*l.*; another with forty-two members and 32*l.*; another with twenty members and 17*l.*; another with forty-one members and 14*l.*; another with forty members and 8*l.*; another with forty-eight members and 4*l.*; another with forty members and 5*l.*; another with fifty-three members and 8*l.*; another with thirty-seven members and 3*l.*; another with sixty-three members and 3*l.* We might multiply indefinitely the instances of beggarly assets. But we cannot forget the piteous import of these statistics. They all mean that the savings of the provident poor have been squandered on guzzling, jobbery, or, it may be, fraud; that men and women have toiled and stinted themselves in order to keep a respectable roof over their heads in their declining years, and that the fruits of this painful labour, and more painful parsimony, have been wrenched from them by the wickedness of designing, or by the carelessness of blundering, men; that, after a life spent in honest toil and hard thrift, nothing remains for them but the pauper's dole, the pauper's asylum, and the pauper's funeral.

It needs no diffuse rhetoric to show that things should not be left in this state. If there is one object which appeals with equal strength alike to our feelings of benevolence and to our self-interest, it is the encouragement of prudence and economy on the part of the poor. Without these virtues there can be no self-respect, and without self-respect there will be no respect for law, order, property, rank, and dignities. Hitherto the bulk of the poor of England have taken with willingness and alacrity to a life of continuous toil. They have worked early and late to earn honest bread, and to maintain a respectable independence in the midst of poverty and hardship. They have generally looked with equal abhorrence on the beggar's alms and the pauper's allowance. And they have done their best to make their children follow their example. But they have had sad temptations and bad examples to resist; and both the temptations and examples are on the increase. When they see how prodigally enormous wealth is squandered by the idle and luxurious on selfish indulgence, how lavishly it is flung away by an almost equally selfish liberality, how easily the thoughtless good-nature of the idle rich can be tricked into largesses of money, how quickly a clever lie may extort from the pockets of foolish opulence more than a whole day's wages—nay, how often petty and successful crime may escape detection—is it wonderful that they begin to compare their own hard lives not only with the luxurious lives of the wealthy, but even with the pleasant condition of the patterer, the beggar, and the mendicant impostor or thief? Is it wonderful that they should ask themselves in what way they are better requited than the scourges of society on whom they have hitherto looked with contempt? But if, in addition to the normal disabilities under which they live, they are forced to feel that discouragement of honest and laborious thrift which is imposed on them by the folly of pretentious or the rascality of fraudulent associations; if they see the fruits of their industry filched from them by bungling fools or designing knaves, one great mainstay of their virtues will be rudely shaken, and the general character of the working-classes seriously impaired. No greater social calamity can well be imagined than this would be. Take away an honest and cheerful hope from the labouring poor, and what would be the result? A desperate recklessness would seize upon them, blinding them to all sense of duty, of diligence, of prudence, and honesty; to the degradation of beggary and the disgrace of crime. They would all become what we see too many of them have become in the suburbs of London and other cities—the envious adulators of wealth which they covet, and would gladly appropriate, if they could. These are not the days in which it is either wise or seemly to aggravate the normal discomforts of the labouring poor; and if we wish to make them an industrious and contented community, we must do our best to secure for them the most powerful protection and support in their efforts to save from their earnings a pittance for the alleviation of disease, infirmity, and old age. And the best way of helping them is to remove every impediment which now obstructs their endeavours to help themselves. It is the business of Parliament to interfere with the management of their societies and clubs, only so far as to prevent them from being perverted to purposes of fraud and injustice; and this might be done by a proper registration and audit.

CIRCULARS.

THE introduction of a halfpenny book-post is now probably a simple question of time. When Mr. Graves's motion in its favour was met by the previous question, the intention of the Government was evident. Ministers were just now very much engaged, but here was this morning's paper, and would the gentleman be so good as to wait? Meanwhile it may not be amiss to compare the advantages and the drawbacks which a cheapened book-post will bring to the large class of men whose doors the postman never passes without some addition to their correspondence. The circular nuisance will be aggravated. Of this there can be no doubt, because it is mainly in the interest of the promoters of the nuisance that the reduction of the tax is proposed. At the same time, however, it will be abated and rendered less noxious by the process which aggravates it. The distinction between the letter and the circular will be marked by the stamp, and will be obvious at first sight. At least for half the year the halfpenny packet may pass immediately into the fire without the trouble of opening. During the fireless months the accumulation of waste paper will become somewhat more troublesome than before, and the sudden arrival of exceptionally hot spring weather coincidently with Mr. Graves's motion has been rather prejudicial to a calm consideration of the subject. But the Rag-collecting Brigade is a beneficent institution. It will call as regularly as the dustman, and it won't ask for beer. We see its passing hand-cart, and we bless the good Earl of Shaftesbury.

To men whose occupations involve frequent absences from home the halfpenny circular postage will bring a material saving both in pocket and in temper. At present the only direction which it is possible to leave behind one is, "Send on all my letters, but no book-post packets," and a heap of worthless advertisements and similar rubbish follows the unlucky traveller about the country, bringing with it no slight provocation when the letter-bag is opened. These things are mostly contrived so as to weigh less than half an ounce, and are enclosed in envelopes. A judicious wife or daughter may certainly do a good deal of weeding by the help of eye and touch. Silver-paper can be detected as easily as bank-notes or postage-stamps in an envelope; and tradesmen, and charitable or uncharitable institutions, who are weak enough or honest enough to put a die on their seals do much to save the trouble they give. The signature of a peer or a bishop, in what used to be the franking corner of the cover, will not mislead feminine eyes accustomed to lithographs, and the counteracting device of a mitred seal, which has been adopted by some religious societies, has hardly been successful enough to induce the more secular institutions to follow suit with a coronet. But in spite of all precautions the circular enclosed in an envelope is a persistent and penetrating annoyance, which we may hope the halfpenny stamp and open cover will go far to diminish, even if they do not abolish it altogether. The operation of the change will in the main be confined—apart from a possible increase of circulation of some of the less bulky newspapers—to the distribution of circulars for trading purposes and for purposes of begging, borrowing, or stealing, and to the circulation of the immense and growing volume of milk-and-watery literature in the shape of tracts, reports, and cheap serials, of which the religious societies and Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin are the perennial sources. As nobody, however, will be troubled with Messrs. Cassell's serials, except so far as an occasional specimen copy may count, unless he chooses to order them, and as nobody will be presented with the reports and quarterly papers of the societies unless he happens to have subscribed to them, the only way in which the contemplated reduction of book-postage will be found to affect the general public is in the matter of circulars. And the result on the whole will be that everybody who likes to issue circulars will be able to do so at half the present rate of taxation; that everybody who likes to receive circulars will have the privilege of getting twice as many as before; and that educated and sensible men will be put to the cost of larger waste-paper baskets, and will repay themselves in a considerable economy of time, temper, and postage-stamps. So that things will be made generally comfortable all round if the Marquis of Hartington can get his annual 300,000*l.* back again. And the mystery of circulars will continue to exist, and to share with the mystery of Parliamentary petitions the disputed pre-eminence of being the most costly method as yet discovered for the manufacture of waste-paper.

The division of circulars which we have already given may be assumed as approximately exhaustive. By far the larger portion of the whole number consists of those which are issued for trading purposes. The object of nearly all the rest is either to beg or to borrow, or, implicitly, to steal. The small remaining proportion may be set down to some one or other of the various forms of mental delusion. Why it should occur to an anonymous correspondent in a remote country village—a lady, of course—to address to a dozen London barristers or merchants, or to the members of a Cathedral Chapter, a series of extracts from Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy, or of couplets in the cracker-bon-bon style of poetry, or of "leaflets" about things in general, is a problem of familiar experience which defies all attempts at rational solution. Of course, if a man chooses to crow over his newly-acquired honours of paternity in the first column of the Times, he must expect to get "a sight of good advice" in femininely-addressed envelopes from all sorts of quarters, together with the inevitable shower of advertisements from purveyors of baby-linen and perambulators, and of appeals from Orphan Asylums. But this is an early weakness which is easily outgrown.

Among the strangest and most grotesque forms in which the modern belief in circulars is exhibited, perhaps the most prominent is the superstition of lithographs. This singular worship, we are obliged to admit, has found very little acceptance among advertising tradesmen. Its devotees belong to a higher, and presumably a more intelligent, class of society. We regret to be obliged to state more precisely that they may even be found on the Episcopal benches in the House of Lords. It is painful to impute in such exalted quarters a definite belief in graven images, and a literal making of idols of stone for the common people to bow down to, but honesty and fairness leave no other course open to us. A letter in lithographed facsimile of a man's handwriting is a deliberate—we will not finish the sentence as we had intended, but will borrow from schoolboy language a milder phrase, and say it is an "awful chouse." For the theory of it is this. It is assumed that a man will not read a printed letter if he receives one, but that he will be at the trouble to read what another man has been at the pains to write. It is further imagined that an autograph letter from a man of mark will be read by the recipient with more attention than a letter written by a clerk or secretary and bearing only the great man's signature. Both these assumptions are true as matters of experience. Accordingly, in order to secure attention for the contents of the circular, which is usually one of the begging class, its promoters prevail on a man whose name is more or less known—in the religious world preference being given to a bishop—to write or to copy the letter which it is intended to circulate, and the manuscript so obtained is forthwith lithographed in facsimile, signature and all. The only possible interpretation of this cumbrous and costly proceeding lies in the measure of increased attention which the lithographed letter may be expected to receive, beyond that which would be accorded to a printed copy of the same words, and which of course is in direct proportion to the extent of the delusion which has been created. The actual result, we imagine, in a large number of cases is, that on the first glance at the well-known hue of the lithographic ink, the paper is thrown aside unread, with a touch of contempt added to the customary impatience with which the ordinary circular is consigned to the waste-paper basket or the fire. There is, indeed, one alternative interpretation, which to some minds might appear more tenable than it does to ourselves. It might be supposed that committees and secretaries had so little reliance on the public judgment of their own character, as to think that a merely printed letter bearing an influential signature would be taken for an invention of their own: and that, therefore, they felt it important to persuade their right honourable or right reverend supporter to write it out himself, in order that the handwriting might go in evidence of its genuineness. But in either case the fact remains, that the lithographed letter is a "dodge," only a little more artistic than the large-legacy-and-skittle-alley arrangement by which foreigners and country greenhorns are periodically victimized in London public-houses.

The lithograph, however, is capable of development in relation to some of the higher branches of advertising ingenuity. Not long ago a circular dated from Libourne in France, and commencing "Sir and honoured Pastor,—Previously to soliciting your powerful concurrence in the work of charity I have undertaken,' was addressed to most, if not all, of the English beneficed clergy. The front page was covered with signatures in facsimile of French Protestant clergymen, testifying to the great worth and excellence of the writer. "Now," the letter proceeded as the reader turned the page, "I am known to you, and I can explain my intention with the certainty of being patiently and favourably listened to." The writer proved to be a "commissioner for Bordeaux wines," and his "intention" was to offer the clergy ten per cent. on all the orders they could get for him among their parishioners, the money so secured "to be distributed to the poor" of their parishes, as "those gifts, accompanying your pious exhortations, while relieving much distress, may also stir up their zeal and contribute to their spiritual good." The French wine-merchant seemed to have heard how much value was supposed in England to attach to a list of names, and how very impressive the names become when they appear in more or less illegible handwriting. For a begging circular, indeed, a good list of names is held in some official quarters to be both indispensable and irresistible. You are interested in the building perhaps of a new school, or of a church, or in some similar undertaking, and you apply to the "Secretary of the Parent Society" in that case made and provided, for advice and assistance, pecuniary and otherwise. "You must have a committee," replies the oracle, "and you must issue a circular." The circular is the only known way of reaching the public eye at all; and the public eye will turn away in listless apathy from a circular without a committee. It is useless to suggest that a committee is a person or body of persons to whom a larger body has committed or entrusted the execution of some designed work. We have changed all that; and you must get together your committee by hook or by crook. If it is further intimated that there is scarcely any one in the neighbourhood with time or opportunity to undertake the management of the work, the reply is that this is of no sort of importance; you can have a "general committee," and then a "small working committee" besides. The "general committee," it is explained, are not expected to "work"; they are only wanted for the circular, and the circular is wanted for the public, and the public is wanted for the money. From all which it would appear that general committees and lithographic facsimiles have their raison d'être in the great formula of administration, "Populus vult decipi, decipiatur." But there chances to exist another formula of at least equal weight, and possessing the advantage of being familiar in its English garb, bidding us "do to all men as we would they should do to us." And considering that nine educated men out of ten detest the circular system as always a troublesome and generally a serious nuisance, and look especially on a money-begging letter from a man of whom they never heard and who has no sort of claim upon them as little better than an under-bred impertinence, it is probable that the tenth will be found with very strong objections to taking part in the manufacture and issue of circulars in any shape, and will leave the benefit of Mr. Graves's halfpenny in this respect to the advertising tailors and quack doctors who may hope to make their fortunes by it.

REVIEWS.

PANTHEISTIC PHILOSOPHY.*

M. ADOLPHE FRANCK, celebrated for his labours in the broad field for dissertation offered by the Jewish "Kabbala," has collected into one volume a number of articles which on different occasions he contributed to the Journal des Savants and the Journal des Débats, adding to them an Academic Memoir, which he read before a grand assembly of the Institute. Though the articles reprinted from the journals are reviews of books written by authors who devote themselves to various branches of erudition and thought, they are united together into one compact whole by an intellectual link stronger than the thread of the bookbinder. M. Franck himself finds their union in their joint establishment of the truth that religion and philosophy cannot be substituted one for the other without detriment on both sides, and that, to borrow the language of mathematicians, they ought to be regarded as incommensurable quantities. Here he hardly does himself justice. The illustration of the truth in question, however important in his eyes, will seem but a secondary matter to his readers. The chief purport of his book, whether intentionally on his part or not, is to show the natural tendency of various systems, arising under the most diverse circumstances, to flow into Pantheism or Atheism, like so many rivers which, having their respective sources at all sorts of points, discharge themselves into one common ocean.

The quantity of information on recondite subjects which M. Franck puts within the reach of the general public, and the ease with which he describes and criticizes one system after another, are really marvellous, when we take into consideration the fact that the whole book is not nearly so large as an ordinary-sized novel. His reviews, moreover, have this advantage, that they treat much of works with which none but very special scholars are likely to become immediately familiar, but of which many intelligent persons would desire to know something. Though he takes a critical position, M. Franck is more constantly employed on description than on criticism; and his descriptions, under the circumstances, may be pronounced singularly exhaustive.

We may illustrate our remarks by surveying the subjects brought successively under consideration by M. Franck. His first article, "Le Mysticisme chez les Grecs," takes its rise from the wonderful labours of M. N. Bouillet in translating the Enneads of Plotinus, and contains a lucid exposition and criticism of the doctrines taught by the chief of the Alexandrian school, in which the reaction of the better nature of the philosopher against some of the consequences of his own philosophy is pointed out in a very ingenious manner. The next article, "Le Mysticisme et l'Alchimie," the paper read to the Institute, treats largely of the first dawnings of modern experimental science, the human figure that rises into symbolical significance being the hastily adored and hastily abused Theophrastus Paracelsus. As the toils of M. Bouillet furnish the subject of the first article, so do those of M. S. Munk, who has very lately published for the first time the "Moré-Néboukhim" of Moses Maimonides, supply the basis to the third, "Le Rationalisme religieux au douzième siècle," which is perhaps the most interesting portion of the entire book. A survey of the works of a more modern thinker occupies the fourth article, "Les Travaux bibliques et la nouvelle Religion de M. Joseph Salvador," which is followed by another of far less interest on M. Alexandre Weill, bearing the not very appropriate title "Moise expliqué par Spinoza." The sixth article, ostensibly a review of a work by M. de Gobineau, and entitled "Une nouvelle Religion en Perse," contains a complete history of the "Babys," a religious sect which sprang up in the East rather more than twenty years ago, and which, in spite or in consequence of sharp persecution, still flourishes, to the scandal of both orthodox and heterodox Mahometans. The seventh article, "Le Rationalisme religieux dans la France du dix-huitième siècle," treats of a book called "Les trois Filles de la Bible," the author of which, M. H. Rodrigues, proposes to show that the three kindred religions, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, will all be blended into one in the faith of the future. The last four articles—namely, two directed against Auguste Comte and Positivism, a review of one of M. Caro's works headed "L'Idée de Dieu," and the eleventh headed "L'Immortalité de l'Âme," in which M. Franck reviews a recent book by M. T. H. Martin, "La Vie future suivant la foi et la raison"—belong more than the rest to the department of modern philosophical controversy. The stand-point taken by M. Franck, when he directs his glance to the past and present, is that of a "spiritualist." Let not our table-rapping friends jump at this expression, and fancy that their forces are increased by the acquisition of a French savant, a member of the Institute, who has Alexandrian and Arabian philosophy at his fingers' ends, and can pour forth unlimited dissertations on the Kabbala. The spirit of M. Adolphe Franck will never be summoned from the vasty deep by their invocations. In French philosophical parlance, a spiritualist is one who believes in a personal Deity distinct from the world, and an immaterial soul distinct from the body, and susceptible of individual immortality. The modern thinkers with whom M. Franck expresses the greatest sympathy are MM. Caro and Martin, though the latter sins against that canon which denies the identification of religion and philosophy. With M. Martin, philosophical truth is not to be found beyond the pale of Roman Catholic doctrine; whereas M. Franck is of opinion that certain broad principles which lie at the basis of every religion worthy of the name may be legitimately vindicated by philosophy, which will however wisely leave untouched the details proper to particular creeds. What is the faith of M. Franck himself does not appear. There is not a line in his book that might not have proceeded from an orthodox Romanist or an orthodox Protestant, or—we may add—an orthodox Jew. When the battle is to be fought with Positivist, Pantheist, or Atheist, he is unquestionably a doughty warrior on the side of the faithful.

Though the component parts of M. Franck's work harmonize themselves into a compact whole, this is easily soluble into its primitive elements, and some readers will probably concentrate their attention on particular articles, to the exclusion of the rest. Curiosity will be most generally excited by the article on the "Babys," whose name the unsophisticated Briton will scarcely sever from engaging infantine associations till he is plainly impressed with the fact that the word "Bâb," from which this is derived, denotes a door, and was bestowed upon himself by Mirza-Ali-Mohammed, the founder of the sect. Moreover, the very modern origin of the Babys, the rapidity with which they have spread, and their hostile attitude towards the Government, suggest a comparison with the Mormons of another hemisphere, and one can hardly contemplate the figure of Mohammed without reminiscences, however faint, of Joe Smith or Brigham Young. The very fact that, whereas the Mormons promote polygamy in the midst of a people who recognise monogamy as the basis of social order, the Babys discourage, if they do not absolutely prohibit, plurality of wives in a country where this is regarded as proper to the fitness of things, presents a point of resemblance as well as of difference between the prophets of the East and the West—both exhibiting the phenomenon of an exceptional body of fanatics setting themselves up in opposition to received social institutions. Again, Joe Smith and Mohammed have both earned the crown of martyrdom, while the followers of the latter gain a romantic interest by including in their number a lady whose surpassing beauty gained for her the name Gouroet-Oul-Ayn (Solace of the Eyes), and who makes a figure not unlike that of a Deborah or a Judith. In the theology and moral code of the Babys there is not much that is of a distinctive character; but their theory of divine appointment is certainly curious. As Mahomet acknowledged Moses and Jesus as predecessors, so is he, in addition to them, acknowledged by the new sect; but the "Bâb," while he is the embodied spirit of prophecy, does not predominate above his fellow-creatures, since he is accompanied by eighteen assessors, of both sexes, who are equally inspired with himself, though their functions are various. The number eighteen is selected because it is represented by the letters that form the word denoting the "living God," and when to these the "Bâb" is prefixed as an additional unity or "point," we have an expression that signifies at once the divine unity and the active principle of creation. Thus we have a singular development of that theory of a spiritual union between founder and disciple which is noticeable in other religions. If we are rightly informed, not only union but unity is professed by the spiritual oligarchs of the Babys. There is but one soul in the nineteen persons, who are absolutely inseparable from each other and immortal, being altogether the most complete emanation of the Deity. If one of them, in the human sense, dies, his share in the divine spirit is at once transmitted to an appointed successor. Such a metempsychosis is altogether distinct from that taught by Pythagoras or Plato, but M. Franck finds its prototype in the Kabbala, and communicates the fact that the new sect has found partisans among the most accomplished Jews in Persia.

It is perhaps in Judaism, as manifested in connexion with Alexandrian philosophy, that M. Franck is most at home, and his paper on Moses Maimonides, which is the longest in the collection, is also the most instructive. As it is not likely that any district of Persia, bursting into spiritual activity in the midst of the nineteenth century, will have any great effect on the intellectual future of the civilized world corresponding to that of the Egyptian Athens, the Babys will very likely depart as they have come, like shadows, under the pressure of stronger influences, and any temporary importance they may obtain may merely be set down among the many "flukes" of history; but the purport and the operation of Alexandrian philosophy must be thoroughly mastered by any one who would acquire a scientific knowledge of the movements of thought in the middle ages, whether they manifest themselves under a Jewish, a Mahometan, or a Christian exterior. Especial care must be taken by the student not to be misled by the names Platonist and Peripatetic into a belief that his Plato and his Aristotle implicitly contain all that he is required to know. He had better start by so varying the vowels of the first name as to change it into "Plotinist," and with respect to the second, by keeping clearly in view the fact that the Stagyrite took a new shape when seen through Arabian spectacles. The difference between the old and new founder of Platonism would have been rendered most palpably manifest had the petition of Plotinus to the Roman Emperor for permission to establish a "Platonopolis" in Campania led to the desired result. M. Franck says in his first paper:—

> Il est bien regrettable que sa prière soit restée sans effet, et que Platonopolis n'ait jamais vu le jour. Nous aurions vu une fois à l'epreuve cette utopie fameuse, sur le modèle de laquelle ont été conçues toutes les autres. Mais d'après ce que nous savons du caractère et des idées de Plotin, il n'est pas difficile de dire ce qui serait arrivé. Au lieu de la société théocratique et guerrière, au lieu des mœurs plus que faciles et des amours plus que libres que rêve l'auteur de la Republique, nous aurions eu une association monastique comme celle des Esséniens, des thérapeutes ou des prêtres de Bouddha. Cela seul nous montre la différence qui sépare les deux philosophes, les deux époques et les deux écoles.

In the article on Moses Maimonides we have a picture of a learned Jew anxious to adhere to the faith of his fathers, and perceiving, subject to certain modifications in favour of a creation, a whole system of Arabian peripateticism embodied in the Hebrew Books of the Law. The polemics, not only with adversaries, but with oneself, that arise under this strange position, the difficulties that obtrude themselves to be solved by difficulties equally great, are reviewed by M. Franck with singular completeness; and probably his book stands alone in the world as conveying the largest possible amount of information concerning Aristotle among the Arabs, in the fewest possible pages.

There is one portion of the article on Maimonides that will be found interesting by many readers who do not greatly care for metaphysical speculation, and that is the learned Jew's justification of those precepts in the Mosaic code which seem merely arbitrary to the Gentile mind. To effect this justification, Maimonides explained the external circumstances amid which the religion of the Israelites was placed in its infancy, deriving his information from a work on "Nabatæan Agriculture" which for a long time was known to Europe through his citations only, but on which recent investigations have thrown new light. The "Agriculture" teaches him the abominations against which the Hebrew legislator had to contend when first he established his code. To the philosophical objector who finds an inconsistency in the burnt-offerings and sacrificial acts required with so many ceremonial details by so perfect a being as the Deity of the Israelites, Maimonides replies that, in the days of Moses, the habit of offering sacrifices was universal among mankind, and could not possibly have been avoided by the chosen race. The demand for burnt-offerings was a compliance with a prevailing error, but a reformation was so far effected by Moses that he required for the true God the sacrifices that had previously been offered to Hebrew deities. The prophets of an after-time, who spoke slightingly of "bulls' flesh and the blood of goats," and the like outward signs of devotion, and exalted at the expense of these the worth of internal piety, revealed the spirit of the legislator, while seeming to oppose him in the letter; and from the fact that Moses authorized sacrifices at Jerusalem alone, while any spot was fitted for prayer, Maimonides infers that he sought to throw a practical difficulty in the way of the former. Moreover, if sacrifice is in itself, according to Maimonides, a compliance with heathen usage, there is an opposition to heathenism in the peculiarity of the offerings made by the Israelites. The ram, the bull, and the goat were objects of adoration among the peoples with whom the Hebrews came in contact, and it was the most atrocious impiety to put them to death. Ordering their immolation at Jerusalem, Moses marked out the Israelites from their neighbours by exalting into a holy act the very deed that was considered a crime elsewhere. The fact also is to be considered, that the animals offered on the Hebrew altar were within the reach of the poorest class, and here is another contrast with the expensive rites insisted on by the heathens. The exceptional severity, with regard to magic, of a code generally humane in its provisions, is accounted for by the intimate connexion between magic, astrology, and idolatry among the Chaldæans, and also by the extreme licentiousness with which the practice of occult arts was accompanied. As it was the very mission of the chosen people to destroy idolatry, all that tended that way was necessarily treated with peculiar rigour. For the minutest details of the code reasons on a similar principle are found by the ingenious apologist. Why are the fruits of trees that have been planted for fewer than three years pronounced impure, as we read in the nineteenth chapter of Leviticus? Precisely because these were the fruits that were considered most acceptable to the gods by their benighted worshippers.

While tracing the connexion between different schools of philosophy, M. Franck is careful to convey the sound opinion that the similarity of two theories is no necessary proof of the derivation of one from the other. An opportunity is afforded him when he approaches the commonly received opinion that Alexandrian philosophy was the result of a contact between the philosophic intellect of Greece and the religious spirit of the East. He sees in mysticism generally a growth natural to humanity, without respect to geographical or physiological considerations, and ingeniously divides it into three species. Of these the first is the "mysticism of thought" (mysticisme de la pensée), the result of a logical operation which, by the abstraction of particular qualities, arrives at an incomprehensible unity, into which the individual mind is itself merged, as into an illimitable sea. Let us observe, however, that the word mysticism can never be employed unless something like feeling enters into a mental process. Under the name "substance," the abstract unity was grasped much more firmly by Spinoza than by Plotinus, to whom it was clouded over by a series of intermediate emanations. Yet Plotinus was a mystic of the first water, and Spinoza (as M. Franck admits elsewhere) was not a mystic at all. Why? Simply because the Dutch Jew quietly contemplated a logical result, whereas Plotinus was absorbed into his unity by "ecstacies." The second species of mysticism, that of love (mysticisme de l'amour), seems at first completely foreign to Pantheism, inasmuch as it takes its source in a loving admiration of the Divine perfections. This is the mysticism that is to be found among Christian enthusiasts of various sects, in Tauler, Saint Martin, Fénélon, and others; and indeed, without a tinge of it, a real devotion of the heart is scarcely to be conceived. Of this mysticism, without using or thinking of the word, even the coldest preacher hopes to awaken a modicum in his congregation. But when it reaches its highest degree of intensity it becomes a burning desire for absorption into the Deity, and a sort of sentimental Pantheism is the result. The mysticism of despair, which is the third species named by M. Franck, finds its expression in Buddhism, the devotee seeking, in the state of self-annihilation called Nirwâna, a refuge from the sufferings of this life. It is a common opinion that Buddhism is pure Atheism converted into a positive religion, but M. Franck warns us not to adopt this opinion too hastily in judging of a faith professed by several millions of believers. There must be something in the Nirwâna, after all, that is not a mere nothing, else how could the personal Buddha, after remaining plunged into it for ages, start out of it again to edify and cheer his followers? The desultory manner in which we have found it necessary to review La Religion et la Philosophie bears witness to the comprehensive character of a work which will amply reward the patient and thoughtful reader.

CUSSANS' HANDBOOK OF HERALDRY.*

IT speaks much for the advance of common sense that some rays of it should have made their way even among the students of heraldry. Mr. Cussans still holds that heraldry is a science—a professed heraldic student could hardly for very shame give up the word—but he is content to rest the claims of his science to any degree of attention on very rational grounds indeed. He does not call on us to believe, after the manner of the elder heralds, that his science contains any profound virtues and inscrutable mysteries; he only tells us, what is perfectly true, that a knowledge of heraldry often enables us to fix the dates of events, buildings, and documents, that by its help we may often make out a pedigree and sometimes even recover an estate. Heraldry is, in short, the knowledge of the way in which people adorned their shields, and is in itself one of the smaller branches of antiquarian knowledge, just like the knowledge of the different kinds of boots and head-dresses that people wore in any particular age. Let no one think that we are mocking at the boots and head-dresses. Far from it; though a knowledge of them is in itself a small matter, it often throws incidental light upon much greater matters. The shape of a toe, whether round or pointed, often marks the date of a monumental effigy, and the head-dress of a corbel may often fix the age of a church or a castle. The knowledge of the decorations of shields is knowledge of exactly the same kind, only accident has given it a wider range and has enabled it to throw more constant light on historical matters than the kindred kinds of knowledge. The fashion of boots and of head-dresses never became fixed in certain families. There was no time when every Howard wore round toes, while every Talbot wore pointed toes. If it had happened so, the difference in the form of the boot would have been an hereditary distinction of exactly the same nature as the armorial bearings on the shield. In this last case it did happen so; it became customary for the son to mark his shield in the same way in which his father had marked his. Certain arbitrary rules for the marking of shields gradually arose, and a knowledge of those arbitrary rules forms the "science" of heraldry. The claim of heraldry to be called a science is of course ridiculous; but if heraldry will be content to rank as the most important of those small branches of antiquarian knowledge which do yeoman's service to history, those services will always be thankfully acknowledged. It ranks decidedly above the knowledge of watches and brass pans; it ranks as decidedly below the knowledge of coins—a knowledge which is not so much a handmaid of historical knowledge as a real branch of historical study.

A herald, almost from the nature of the case, generally lives in a world of his own, a world unlike any world past, present, and we may safely add, future, and a world specially impervious to historical evidence. After all, the herald is not much worse than a certain style of lawyers. If the herald believes all that he finds in his Gwillim, so we have known lawyers who thought it wrong to doubt that William the Conqueror introduced the feudal system—whatever that is—in a particular Council in a particular year, because forsooth Blackstone says that he did so. Now Mr. Cussans's merit is that he does not look on heraldry as something eternal and immutable, but as something which had a beginning, and he knows pretty well what its beginning was. He is content to date his "science" from the thirteenth century. He rejects all such nonsense as the arms of Edward the Confessor; he shrewdly remarks that, if armorial bearings had been in use in the eleventh century, we should have seen them in the Bayeux Tapestry; he shows that personal bearings came in in the twelfth century, and hereditary bearings not till the thirteenth. He says with some point that if William the Conqueror had had a shield with two leopards or with anything else, his son Robert could not have unhorsed him without knowing who he was. This point, however, raises another question; how far did a nose-piece hinder a man from being known? for it is certain that William's face was not hidden by the full vizor of later times. And though one is a little disturbed at Sir Matthew Hale being called Sir William, it is comforting to find that Mr. Cussans holds that his assertion "that no Englishman was permitted by the Conqueror to retain any landed property in England" "is refuted by the pages of Domesday Book." So Thurkill of Warwick is a real man in Domesday, but whether he was "the ancestor of the Ardens of Warwickshire" is a point too subtle for us. "County families" are a subject too sacred for the mere historian. But it is very comforting to find that Mr. Cussans has "recently examined" William's charter to Deorman in the library of the City corporation. And the following remarks in a book of heraldry are really delightful:—

> If the pedigree can be traced up to the middle of the Seventeenth century, and the Family were at that time entitled to Armorial Bearings, the Visitations of the Heralds will carry it about three generations higher. The real labour now commences; and unless the Family were at that time—the Sixteenth Century—either noble, or constituted a portion of the Landed Gentry, further research is almost useless. County Histories, Documents in the Public Record and State Paper Offices, and, in some cases, Municipal Archives and Monastic Chartularies, must now be carefully and patiently examined; the genealogist bearing in mind that no reliance can be placed on the orthography of proper names, either of persons or places. Except in a few rare instances, it is utterly impossible to trace a Pedigree beyond the time of Richard the Second; and those persons who assert that their Ancestors "came over with the Conqueror," derive their authority chiefly, if not wholly, from Tradition, or their own imagination. For the same reason that it is difficult for such persons to prove their assertion, it is equally difficult to refute it.

What, then, becomes of Sir Bernard Burke's friend who came to meet the Conqueror riding on a bull?

On the other hand, we have a few things against Mr. Cussans. In the very page where he refutes Sir Matthew Hale, and tells us about Deorman and Thurkill, he tells us, what certainly is not recorded by William of Poitiers, that "one of the first official acts of William of Normandy, after his accession to the throne of England, was to assume actual possession of all the land." And it is equally mysterious when we read that "Charlemagne, who was contemporary with the first of our Saxon kings [Ælle of Sussex ?], is said to have added to the royal seal of France the words DEI GRATIA." After this, one is not amazed to read:—

> According to some authorities, a double-headed Eagle—as that of Russia—is blazoned as an Imperial Eagle. This, however, is manifestly incorrect; for the Eagles of Prussia and France are no less Imperial, although they have but one head.

King William certainly has more chance than other men of being crowned either at Frankfurt or at Aachen, but no telegram has reached us to say that the ceremony has taken place. Just before the eagle was said to be the arms of Austria, and in p. 207 it becomes the arms of Germany. When will people learn that the arms of Austria are a rampant lion? They may be seen on the walls of the Schlachtkapelle at Sempach, and on more than one torn and bloody banner in the arsenal at Luzern.

Mr. Cussans is hardly so lucky as we should have expected in the matter of titles. For example, it is odd to be told (p. 156) that "the son and daughter of a Duke would"—under any circumstance except that of the daughter marrying a Marquess—"be styled Marquess and Marchioness respectively." What is meant probably is that she ranks with—or rather immediately after—Marchionesses. Here again is a jumble, though one does not wonder at it, when one sees in reports of Drawing-rooms, the daughters of Dukes, the wives of Barons, and the wives of Knights all put together as "Ladies":—

> The title of Lady is used equally indiscriminately, for not only are the wives and daughters of certain Peers thus addressed, but also the wives of Baronets and Knights. These last, although permitted by courtesy to bear the title of Lady, are not allowed to prefix their Christian to their Family name, for this is the peculiar privilege and mark of distinction of the daughters of Peers. It was not until the reign of Henry the Eighth that Kings' daughters were styled Princesses. Previous to that date they were simply designated as "Lady." Thus, we find the daughters of Henry the Seventh were styled, "The Lady Margaret" and "The Lady Mary." Even the daughters of Henry the Eighth were occasionally styled the "Lady Mary" and the "Lady Elizabeth:" and in a tract on the Marriage of the daughter of James the First with Prince Frederick, she is spoken of as the "Ladie Elizabeth."

Now, as Miss Yonge, if no one else, has taught us, the wives of Baronets and Knights ought to use the Christian name, but then it should be with the title of Dame, and not with the title of Lady. It is strange that Mr. Cussans does not know how very modern is the affectation of calling every daughter of the Sovereign "Princess" instead of "Lady," a German device at which Englishmen kicked as late as the time of George the Second. About Henry the Eighth's daughters Mr. Cussans is probably led away by the fact that Mary was—strangely enough—created "Princess of Wales." Nor do we understand what is meant by saying that "the present Prince is the first who has enjoyed the title of Duke of Saxony, which was conferred on him in 1841." It could not well be conferred on him before, but surely the Prince is "Duke of Saxony," one of many "Dukes of Saxony," which no Prince of Wales ever was before him, for the simple reason that no Prince of Wales before him was the son of a "Duke of Saxony." But just before we read how the late Prince Consort quartered the arms of England instead of impaling them, which "has been justly described as an heraldic anomaly," which it certainly was. We have also to thank Mr. Cussans for pointing out the absurdity of the popular belief that "all the members of the Royal Family"—whatever the Royal Family is—are entitled to be called Royal Highness. The following passage is startling:—

> Even the eldest son of the Duke of Edinburgh would be legally entitled but to the qualification of "Highness," and, by an Act passed in 1399, would yield precedence to Dukes; and his younger sons, by a subsequent Act, would give place to Earls. The issue of such younger sons, although by courtesy they would probably be addressed by a higher title, would be simply Esquires.

Now an Esquire, and even a Duke's younger son, would need a surname. Even the Duke's eldest son needs one on formal occasions, as is more largely expressed by Mr. Cussans in page 194:—

> A Duke is styled "Your Grace," and "Most Noble;" his eldest son takes his second title, which is usually that of Marquess. This title, however, is only accorded by courtesy: thus the Duke of Devonshire's eldest son, who, as the representative for the Northern Division of the County of Lancaster, is officially styled "The Right Honourable Compton Spencer Cavendish, commonly called Marquess of Hartington."

Alas, thanks to Murphy and Co., Mr. Cussans's faith in the electors of North Lancashire was doomed to be disappointed, though the Radnor boroughs have since redressed the wrong. But still we do not understand why the description given applies to Lord Hartington "as representative" for any place, rather than in any other character that he may fill.

We will end with a few curiosities, old and new. One has heard of a beautiful woman ending in a black fish; heraldry has, in one instance at least, condemned the royal leopards to the like fate. What are the arms of the borough of Great Yarmouth, which once sent two members to Parliament, but which does so no longer? Every one who knows the fame of Yarmouth bloaters will recognise the propriety of its ancient coat, Three herrings naiant in pale. But there is a process in heraldry called "Dimidiation," which in English means splitting a thing in half. This was "the most ancient method of Marshalling two coats on the same Shield," and "was effected by simply dividing both Coats per pale, and joining the Dexter half of one to the Sinister half of the other." Now to the herrings of Yarmouth were "added, by Dimidiation, Three Lions of England." This produces what Mr. Cussans truly calls a "curious combination." If the lion or leopard simply had a fish's tail, making, so to speak, a mer-leopard, well and good; but the shield is so carefully "dimidiated" that the leopards have their tails and their hind legs sticking on to the stump of Dagon in a way to which griffins, wyverns, and cockatrices are a trifle.

Mr. Cussans very naturally makes himself merry with some of the absurdities of modern heraldry, though he tells us in a most becoming spirit that "it is with no intention of casting ridicule on the science of heraldry that he adduces these instances, but only to show how the most noble institutions may become degraded, and be rendered contemptible when perverted from their legitimate purposes." Well, it is, as Mr. Cussans says, hard to draw such arms as these, the augmentation granted to Lord Nelson:—

> On a chief undulated argent, waves of the sea; from which a palm-tree issuant, between a disabled ship on the dexter, and a battery in ruins on the sinister, all proper. Then, for crest: On a wreath of the colours, upon waves of the sea, the stern of a Spanish man-of-war, all proper; thereon inscribed, "San Josef."

Then follow the arms of the Tetlows of Lancaster, granted in 1760, which Mr. Cussans pronounces to be "perhaps even still more preposterous":—

> Azure; on a Fess argent, five musical lines sable, thereon a Rose gules, between two escallops of the third, in chief a Nag's head erased of the second, between two Crosses crosslet or; and in base a Harp of the last. Crest: On a Book erect gules, clasped and ornamented or, a silver Penny on which is written the Lord's Prayer; on the top of the book, a Dove proper, holding in the beak a crowquill Pen sable. Motto: Præmium virtutis honor.

Mr. Cussans adds:—

> This heraldic curiosity is said to have been granted in commemoration of the grantee's brother having written the Lord's Prayer on a silver penny. Even Turner, who delighted so much in strange aërial effects, would have been puzzled to paint the crest of the Tongue family: On an Oak-tree, a nest with three young Ravens, fed with the dew of Heaven, all proper.

Elsewhere he tells us:—

> In the Arms of Sir John Herschel, for example, the imagination of the emblazoner is seriously taxed; they are: Argent: on a mount vert, a representation of the forty-feet reflecting Telescope, with its apparatus proper; on a Chief Azure, the Astronomical symbol of "Uranus" or "Georgium Sidus," irradiated or. Such Armorial monstrosities are, however, extremely rare; and to the credit of the Science be it said, that no such composition is to be found of an earlier date than the Seventeenth century.

There is an amusing chapter on American heraldry. The arms of the original thirteen States Mr. Cussans allows to pass muster, though some of them seem to us rather queer. But let Mr. Cussans speak of those of the newest States:—

> Old Guillim himself would have been sorely puzzled had he seen the following blazon of the Arms of Kansas: Two Ox-teams and Wagons, between a Man ploughing in sinister foreground, and Indians hunting Buffaloes in dexter middle-distance; on sinister, a River and double-funneled, hurricane-decked Steamer: behind Mountains in distance, the Sun rising. on sky, in half-circle, thirty-seven Stars, all proper Motto: Ad Astra per aspera.
> I confess myself utterly unable to do justice to a verbal blazon of the Arms of Oregon. Perhaps the following will give some idea of this heraldic curiosity: On a Fess, the words, The Union; in chief, a Landscape, an Ox-wagon, a Deer, Trees, Mountains, and Prairie; in distance, the Sea, thereon a sailing Ship and a Steamer; in base, a Plough, Rake, Scythe, Garbs, &c.—which I may venture to blazon as, all any how.

We do not exercise ourselves in great matters which are too high for us, so we decline to follow Mr. Cussans into such profound subjects as the "appointment" of liveries and hammercloths. But there are a good many curious things scattered up and down his little book, and though he has made some slips here and here, he has shown that a man may study heraldry without altogether bidding farewell to common sense.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.*

THIS is an unpretending little book, containing a short course of lectures delivered to a working-men's club by Mr. Reginald Palgrave. Any attempt at antiquarian research would of course be out of place in such a work, although Mr. Palgrave speaks as one full of information upon all matters of Parliamentary history and practice. It would be equally out of place were he to indulge at any length in the political speculations which naturally arise from a consideration of the House of Commons, or to do more than express incidentally his admiration for the part which that House has played, and continues to play, in the British Constitution, thereby rendering us, as is well known, the dread and envy of the world. Besides the various questions which interest philosophers and historical inquirers, there is a large number of facts in which the ordinary Englishman may well be excused for taking a keen interest. What the House looks like, what visible signs of legislative wisdom are marked upon the brows of its leaders, what occasional lapses into levity relieve the profoundly serious character of its ordinary labours, and many similar bits of information should doubtless be amusing to the working-man. Nor will severer critics look upon their curiosity with disdain. Around any old institution there gathers in the course of time an immense growth of what the vulgar call "shop." Undergraduates pass from generation to generation legends as to old University practices, little time-honoured jokes about proctors and bulldogs, stories of the dons of former days, and a mass of floating anecdote which is inexpressibly interesting to those immediately concerned. So the doings of courts and kings are regarded with an interest which is not all snobbish; rational beings may like to know at odd times what are the ceremonies which surround the august presence of Majesty with a visible halo, and what the bodily presence and the personal habits of various historical characters may have resembled. Similarly, the House of Commons has a whole library of gossip of its own. We like to hear of celebrated debates when a gentleman prefaced his remarks by saying that it was his usual time for getting up in the morning; of the times when the sanctity of the legislative chamber was invaded or threatened with invasion by kings or mobs, and of the less remarkable incident, on the 14th of May, 1666, when "a strange spanyell of mouse colour came into the House"; of that notable appearance of the rough-looking gentleman upon whose hand Sir P. Warwick noted certain small specks of blood; and of the later occasion when the gravity of the House was hopelessly upset by a member accidentally carrying off the wig of the miser Elwes on his swordhilt. Traditional lore of this kind accumulates rapidly, and we may suppose it handed down from one venerable usher to another, in whose eyes the smallest trifle connected with the sacredness of Parliament gained unspeakable sanctity. From oral tradition, from the Journals of the House, and from numerous memoirs and histories, Mr. Palgrave has made a sufficiently happy selection to enlighten the working-men of Reigate. The question remains whether they will catch the contagion of his enthusiasm, or come to the conclusion that members of the House of Commons, admirable as they may be in many respects, are after all human. It must be confessed that some of the jokes sound rather small when transplanted from their natural soil; and that we fancy, as we so often do in reading reports of trials, that members of Parliament, like barristers, are mighty easy of amusement. Neither do we at a distance quite share the awe so graphically described in this entry from the Journals of 1601. "Mr. Zachary Lock began to speak, but for very fear shook, so that he could not proceed, but stood still awhile, and at length sat down." What is there so tremendous in the collection of a few hundred gentlemen, that Mr. Zachary Lock and his like should shake for very fear? or what is the secret of the fascination which reduced a later orator to confine himself to this remarkable utterance:—"Mr. Speaker, Sir, I am astonished! Sir, I am astonished! Sir, I am astonished!" Did not that honourable member reflect, when he went home, that he had been astonished at a very terrestrial, not to say a very ordinary, phenomenon?

If these gentlemen shared Mr. Palgrave's opinions of the House, we may to some extent sympathize with the terror which seems to have struck them to the soul. The writer, he tells us, of a newspaper article expects to move his hearers; yet the world goes about its business as though he had never thundered. The divine may preach, but on Monday morning his congregation will wear their weekday faces. The man of science writes a book which affects men's thoughts for all futurity; yet the passers before his door look mightily unmoved. "But," says Mr. Palgrave, "the member of Parliament by his vote fills granaries with corn, the very streets with merchandize; he can by means of Public Health Acts cleanse populous cities; he can note how pestilence is warded off by measures he has proposed; or he may procure education for thousands of children, who else would die depraved." If the member can do all these and many other wonderful things, it is a pity he does not do them a little oftener. The argument sounds a little like saying that powder can do nothing; it merely makes a flash and a noise, and the next moment nothing is left but an unpleasant smell; but a cannon-ball can knock a hole in a ship and send it to the bottom for ever. The House of Commons is not quite independent of propulsion from the press, or the pulpit, or even from men of science. Mr. Palgrave, however, gives us to understand that the "true attraction" of the House lies in this power of doing unlimited good—or mischief. The intellectual pleasure of listening to debates is great; the interest and excitement of political contest is absorbing; but, above all things, it is the desire of conferring public benefits upon a grateful world which stimulates the noble anxiety of our upper classes to obtain a seat. Bribery and corruption within the walls has long since vanished; there is no longer, as in old days, a public office where members may repair to receive from 200*l*. to 500*l*. for a vote; the members have given up the degrading practice of eating nuts and oranges on the floor of the House; the Speaker of the House sums up in himself all the virtues which become a legislator in our day; those exalted personages do not "merely represent good order, dignity, and justice; such is their life and conduct, that they are those virtues personified"; never again shall we see a Speaker held forcibly down in his chair by a couple of stalwart county members, or hear him put to the House a motion that he has been guilty of a high crime "for receiving a gratuity of 1,000 guineas." And the members are worthy of their Speaker. They are patterns, not only of patriotism, but of dignity, decorum, and all the virtues which should adorn a Legislature. Once a member made faces in the face of the Speaker, and scornfully popped out his tongue at him; another time one came behind the Speaker as he was putting the question, and in "a loud and violent manner" cried "Baugh! in the Speaker's ear, to his great terror and affrightment." Such things, we are happy to say, are quite out of the question nowadays; and, we add with pleasure, that Mr. Palgrave has attributed their suppression partly to a right cause—that is, to the presence of reporters in the gallery. For in this mighty improvement Parliament has not stood alone. The press has also grown virtuous:—

> How is it [asks Mr. Palgrave] that the Press and the Parliament work together so unselfishly and so well? This is the cause. Our leading newspapers are not class newspapers, the advocates of one separate interest, or of one separate portion of the country. Nor is Parliament the advocate of one separate class or interest distinct from the general interest. Thus newspapers and Parliament act with one common motive; they are inspired by one common spirit; they think and speak for all of us alike.

Thrice-blessed country! With the Times and the Telegraph and a reformed Parliament combined in one unselfish desire for the common good, free from all suspicion of party spirit or private ambition, labouring by day and night to spread knowledge, civilization, and good feeling to the furthest borders of the land, we begin to wonder dimly how it is that we can still require laws to suppress pauperism, crime, or ignorance. Why, we ask, have we not already entered a political millennium? The only answer seems to be, that the bad effects of the old days, when members ate nuts and oranges, and held down Speakers by the arms, have not quite disappeared from among us, and that more patriotic endeavours are still needed before we can reap the fruits of our lofty philanthropy. Yet we should be doing injustice to Mr. Palgrave if we did not admit that he thinks well of the old nut-cracking Parliaments, and thinks that they did some good in their rough way. Perhaps they were even at times a little more efficient than the present body, which is not seldom oppressed by the huge accumulation of its benevolent enterprises, and suffers from a plethora of public spirit. However this may be, we will make one confession. Mr. Palgrave dilates forcibly and properly on the providential escape of Parliament from that infamous Guy Faux and his associates. He trembles to think of the fearful consequences which would have ensued if King and Queen and Prince and both Houses of Parliament had been summarily blown to atoms. It is little use speculating on might-have-beens, but of course we fully agree with him that it was fortunate that the experiment was never tried. Yet, putting aside for a moment all moral considerations, and regarding the plot from a purely æsthetic point of view, it is impossible not to feel a momentary pang of regret at its premature discovery. Everybody concerned is dead by this time, and would have been so in any case; and it is almost a pity that so gigantic a crime should not have added one more picturesque element to our history. All the murders commemorated by De Quincey and other students of the æsthetics of crime would have sunk into utter insignificance by the side of so tremendous a catastrophe. The Gunpowder Plot, for boldness of design, for neatness of conception, and for thorough completeness and harmony of detail, might have challenged comparison with any event recorded in history. Its failure causes as great a loss to historians as would have been the loss to artists had Raffaelle and Michael Angelo and a few of their contemporaries been strangled in their cradles. We repeat, to prevent mistakes, that we are fully convinced that this longing is decidedly wrong; and had we known of the plot in time, no weak desire for dramatic effect should have restrained us from giving full information to James or his Ministers; but even Mr. Palgrave will admit that it would have had incidentally the good effect of adding one very exciting chapter to his amusing little book.

BLUNT ON THE ENGLISH REFORMATION.*

MR. BLUNT is a true and loyal son of the Church of England, and has done that Church good service by several of his publications; but, in attempting to write the history of the Reformation, he has undertaken a task beyond his powers. He does not possess sufficient acquaintance with the works of the so-called Reformers to be able to appreciate their tone of mind or the systems of theology which they represent, nor does he appear to us in this volume to have the grasp of mind necessary in order to form a true estimate of the bearings of European politics upon the subject. We do not complain that he writes from an Anglican point of view. An English clergyman belonging to his school of thought could scarcely do otherwise; and though an historian should always strive to be impartial, no history could be written to interest people by a writer who was not possessed of his own view, and, we may add, entirely penetrated with the conviction that his view was the true one. The fault we find with Mr. Blunt, then, is not so much on the score of misrepresentation of facts, for he has in general succeeded in placing them before the reader with more impartiality than most of those who have handled this difficult subject before him; but rather that his horizon is far too limited, and that his mental gaze does not take in the true proportions of historical events. Again, there is a conspicuous absence from his pages of a true appreciation of the characters of the persons who figured in the great movement of the reign of Henry VIII. He does not judge them wrongly for the most part, as far as he goes, but he is deficient in the power of estimating them. In much of his defence of Wolsey, and his description of Henry's rapacity, as well as in the incidental remarks in which he condemns the time-serving of Cranmer or the selfishness of Cromwell, we quite concur. But neither of these two latter personages, who played so important a part in the changes effected in the last twenty years of this reign, cuts any conspicuous figure in his pages; whilst the account of the Cardinal of York leaves wholly out of sight his unscrupulous conduct and barefaced lying in the matter of the divorce. The particular view of which we complain can scarcely be illustrated better than by an extract from the last chapter of the work, which is headed "The Rise of Protestant Dissent." The author says:—

> All the more solid, learned, and thoughtful Reformers said to themselves, "If we break off from the old Church of England we cut away the ground from under our feet. We must continue the line of the episcopate, and hand it on unbroken to our descendants; we must provide a true priesthood, the same in every respect as has been provided hitherto; we must guard the ancient sacraments of the Church, and take care that no essentials shall be wanting to their due administration recte and rite, as to principles and ritual; we must see that whatever changes may be expedient in our Liturgy and other services, nothing is taken away, nothing added, which shall cut them off from the fellowship of primitive offices; we must maintain the creeds intact, and whatever special formularies may be needed for our special position, we must in all things be sure that the Catholic faith is still held by the Church of England. Let Rome treat us how she will, be it ours so still to hold our place in the one body of Christ, that we may still claim union with her, and with all living branches of the one true Vine."

And this, we are told, is the principle which actuated the Reformers, or—to quote the author's exact words, lest we should at all misrepresent him—which deeply influenced all the official movements of the Reformation. Now Mr. Blunt is fully persuaded that this is the view which the Reformers did take, because in his opinion they ought to have taken it, as opposed to those narrow views which he speaks of as having been known for three centuries under the designations of Protestantism, Puritanism, Nonconformity and Dissent, and which he says are as strictly antagonistic to the principles of the Church of England as to those of the Church of Rome.

Now we should like very much to know who these solid, thoughtful, and learned Reformers were. The present volume does not extend beyond the reign of Henry VIII. It is, therefore, scarcely likely that the author means to include in this description the Bishops and dignitaries of Edward VIth's creation, who were authors of the Prayer Book of 1552—a book which, we take it for granted, is not exactly to Mr. Blunt's mind; still less can we think he is looking forward to the reign of Elizabeth, or would care to pin his faith upon what is known of the opinions of Parker, Grindal, Horne, Scory, and Cox. We are, therefore, driven to the supposition that he refers to the Reformers of the reign of Henry VIII. Now, the Bishops who were the King's tools for reforming the Church of England were Cranmer of Canterbury, Goodrich of Ely, Shaxton of Salisbury, Hilsey of Rochester, and Barlow of St. David's. If to these be added the name of that scurrilous writer, Bale, afterwards Bishop of Ossory, who was employed by Cromwell to write ribald plays against the Pope and in favour of the new learning, we have a pretty complete list of the most influential Reformers of Henry VIIIth's reign. And we think it would be difficult to quote a single passage from any of their writings which in any way confirms the description given of them by our author; whilst, of the three most distinguished among them for learning—namely, Cranmer, Bale, and Barlow—two have expressed their opinion most unequivocally in contempt of the very idea of an apostolical succession, as well as of the other opinions alluded to in the above extract; and Cranmer, we suppose, can scarcely be thought a very ardent admirer of episcopacy. We should have thought the case scarcely worth arguing; but, as Anglicans of Mr. Blunt's school are loth to give up Cranmer, we will quote a passage or two which may be read in Burnet, and which we can vouch for as having been transcribed correctly from Cranmer's own MS.:—

> In the New Testament, he that is appointed to be a bishop or a priest needeth no consecration by the Scripture, for election or appointing thereto is sufficient.
>
> A bishop may make a priest by the Scripture, and so may princes and governors also, and that by the authority of God committed them, and the people also, by their election.
> All the officers and ministers, as well of the one sort as of the other, may be appointed, assigned, and elected, and in every place by the laws and orders of kings and princes. In the admission of many of these officers be divers comely ceremonies and solemnities used, which be not of necessity, but only for good order and seemly fashion; for if such offices and ministrations were committed without such solemnity, they were nevertheless truly committed. And there is no more promise of God that grace is given in the committing of the ecclesiastical office, than it is in the committing of the civil office.

We do not ourselves of course write from an Anglican, or any specially controversial, point of view, but simply in the interests of historical truth; but we would recommend Mr. Blunt and so-called High Churchmen to rest their case on the well-known opinions of the divines who, at the Restoration, made the Book of Common Prayer what it is, and to forego their appeals to the opinions of the Reformers, which cannot really be made to serve their purpose.

We have dwelt the longer on this point because it supplies the key to Mr. Blunt's failure. He has started with a wrong hypothesis, and that hypothesis is continually meeting us. His view of the learning, the character, and the opinions of the Reformers is not tenable; and were it ever so just and true, he attributes far too great weight to their personal influence. They were for the most part mere tools in the hands of the King, and there was perhaps not one of them who would have ventured long to maintain any opinion at variance with his known wishes.

After what has been said, some of our readers will be surprised at hearing that neither the marriage with Anne of Cleves nor the divorce of Henry from his fourth wife, nor again the marriage and execution of Catharine Howard, nor again the sixth wife and her surviving her tyrant husband, are so much as mentioned in this History. Yet two at least of these affairs are intimately connected with the subject of the Reformation, if on no other ground, at least on this, that they prove the abject servility of Cranmer and the rest of the bishops and leading clergy of the King's appointment. The earlier part of the reign is chronicled in somewhat more minute detail, but though upon the whole proceedings are given with tolerable accuracy, there are slight mistakes of fact which betray hasty writing, and there are several omissions which could not have occurred had the author been acquainted with recently published collections of documents. For all that appears to the contrary, Mr. Blunt has never seen the interesting collection of Vatican documents printed at Rome by Theiner, in 1864; and though he has made good use of Mr. Brewer's valuable volumes of Letters and Papers, it is unfortunate for his credit that these volumes extend as yet only to the year 1523; that is to say, only to within four years of the period when the actual history of the Reformation may be said to begin. Had he read the diary of Campeggio, as contained in Theiner's volume, there are many passages in this part of the work which would never have been written; though even then he would not have been saved from the ridiculous mistake of speaking of Wolsey's supposed marriage as a parallel case with that of Campeggio. We are told that "there can be little doubt that he, like Cardinal Campeggio, whose son was knighted by Henry VIII., had been married, perhaps secretly, as Archbishop Cranmer was." This little sentence contains by implication three mistakes. There is no evidence whatever to show that Wolsey had married the person who was the mother of his two children; and Cranmer's marriage was no secret, though he did not parade it, as was natural enough in the teeth of the Act of the Six Articles. As to Campeggio's marriage, it was quite different in kind from either of the other two cases, in that he never was in any kind of holy orders till after his wife's death, so that no sort of scandal attaches to his name on this score. Little instances of misstatements of this kind are of perpetual occurrence, and show the narrow compass of the writer's researches. In one place we are told that the Cardinal of York had failed to secure the triple crown, though backed by all the influence of Henry, Francis, and the Emperor. If Mr. Blunt had taken the trouble to read Mr. Brewer's preface to his last volume, he would have seen that Charles V. never intended that Wolsey should be Pope; and, in fact, that the election of Adrian VI. was probably entirely due to the adroit management of the Emperor.

The best chapter, perhaps, is that which gives the account of the suppression of the Monasteries. The author very fairly weighs the testimonies for and against the monks, and accurately describes the real motives which led to the destruction of the religious houses. He has, perhaps, charitably overstated the case in their favour, and his desire to do justice to a set of men who certainly do not deserve all the abuse that has been heaped upon them has in one instance led him into an absurd suggestion. He thinks that the secret of such charges being laid against abbots, priors, and other brethren lay in the fact that they were married. Now, whatever apology could be made for the supposed marriages of the secular clergy, surely none of the regulars would have entered such a plea in their defence; and if such defence had been pleaded, it would have been quite conclusive against their promotion to rectories and other positions in the Church. The King, however he might be inclined to overlook acts of incontinency, was certainly very unlikely to promote the Prior of West Acre, or any other monk who was known to be married. The promotion of such men to benefices in the King's gift, whether they were of good, bad, or indifferent character, is just what might be expected. Such appointments provided for the quiet employment of men who, if they had been at large, might have been found troublesome to the Government, and they saved the Royal Exchequer from the expense entailed upon it of paying the abbots and brethren their pensions.

The author has wisely avoided the form of annals, and broken up his history into separate chapters, each treating of its own proper subject. The chapter on the Divorce will probably be read with interest, and he is entitled to praise on the score of his fearless endeavour to represent the facts of the case in their true light, for which we have no doubt he will incur the wrath of all who take their accounts of the English Reformation from Foxe's Acts and Monuments. Nevertheless, this chapter exhibits in a stronger light than any other part of the book the writer's want of acquaintance with recently published sources of information, and recalls to our mind, perhaps more forcibly than other part of the work, the often repeated complaint that the History of the Reformation of the Church of England still remains to be written.

MR. RASSAM'S MISSION TO ABYSSINIA.*

If the great History of Human Error ever comes to be written, a special chapter must be taken up by the unbroken series of blunders that makes up the record of the Abyssinian quarrel. Of course we say this with no wish to detract from the merit of the expedition which marks its final and crowning episode. Both in conception and execution this movement will always stand among the highest in our military annals. Happily for us, the blundering in this latest instance was taken upon himself by our adversary. Theodore's overweening pride, sublime ignorance, and propensity to ardent spirits, crowned by dementia leading to suicide, were the means of extricating us from a strait in which military skill and courage, diplomatic fence, and pecuniary outlay might alike have proved ineffectual. Had that infatuated ruler not held some fond idea that he had only to face the forces of his enemies for them to fall down dead, he would hardly have given them the chance of meeting him in the open, or have turned at bay in his chosen fortress. Had he with the faintest glimmer of warlike intelligence lined his mountain passes with sharpshooters, or even sent stones rolling down upon the troops toiling painfully in Indian file at his feet, the Cabul disaster might have been outdone. In Theodore's song of triumph "Flodden had been Bannockburn." Or had he, like the Nana, simply bolted for the trackless hills and forests of the far west, taking with him the captives or leaving us a present of their mangled bodies, how long should we have kept up the wild-goose chase, and to what multiple of ten millions would the bill, which now makes the nation grumble, have run its terrible items? We had best pay with a good grace the supplementary estimate, and we may hope, with the final reports and narrative of Mr. Rassam before us, soon to shut our memories upon a record of the most causeless and unmitigated muddling to be met with in the long annals of human folly.

The most provoking part of this melancholy business is the trumpery origin out of which grew such unbounded fuss, anxiety, and cost. The sole business which professedly took Messrs. Stern and Flad, with their wives and families, to King Theodore's dominions, was, as the King formally repeated to Mr. Rassam, "to convert the Jews to the Christian faith." Was it because there were no Jews in Palestine that these gentlemen were driven to seek objects for their zeal in the wilds of Abyssinia? Or was it the known trouble and cost of the convert with his foot, so to say, on his native heath, which made them shy of the home-grown unbeliever? Of the value per head of Abyssinian converts we have unhappily no means of making even a guess, for throughout the whole business no one ever hears mention of a real convert at all. A dozen, ten, or even a solitary believer would have been something to point to in the long account of ten millions. But there is a lamentable and entire blank on the credit side of the ledger. Once, however, these zealous missionaries are seen comfortably settled in the country, we find them as usual embroiled ere long in some way with the powers and rulers of the land. Mr. Rassam does but repeat with authority King Theodore's fundamental grievance that, "notwithstanding all his kindness, Stern had listened to the stories of the Bishop about the origin of his (the King's) mother, and proclaimed to the world that she was a woman of low degree, who used to sell kósso—an Abyssinian vermifuge—on the common highways." What the descent of King Theodore from the Queen of Sheba or the kósso-seller had to do with the conversion of the Jews was perhaps more obvious to missionary intelligence than to our own. Next it is Consul Cameron who gets into the King's black books, either through his interference in the same matter or through the miscarriage in his hands of Theodore's correspondence with Queen Victoria. To these supposed causes is superadded a trumpery story of the King's that Consul Cameron had taken some Abyssinian servants with him to Kásala, who, at a party given to him by Turkish authorities there, were told to imitate the war-dance of the Royal troops; that some had refused to obey, but one was forced to do as he was ordered, and made the Turks laugh at His Majesty; that they had said sneeringly to the Abyssinians, "Is that the way the soldiers of your great King fight?" This story, it appears, was related to the King by one Ingădā Wark, a scamp who had been in Captain Cameron's service, but who, thinking himself underpaid, did all he could to injure and betray his master. Ingădā Wark having shared the fate of the 197 wretches who were massacred by the King in his last outbreak of fury, April 9, 1868, the disclosures which Mr. Rassam hoped to have extracted from him were lost to the public. It is something, though but a poor equivalent for all we have laid out and undergone—and a still poorer index, to our thinking, to the diplomatic depth of our envoy—to be told that, in Mr. Rassam's opinion, "this man was at the bottom of all the misunderstanding which existed between the King and the European captives." What a pity no one was there to put a foot in the first instance upon the fons et origo of all this trouble! From first to last it would appear our proper business was to fight neither with small nor great, but only with Ingădā Wark. Meanwhile ambitious hopes having been kindled in the breast of King Theodore, and the regulation snubbing or official ignoring having been effected in Lord Russell's happiest manner, the vengeance of the semi-savage descends upon the whole body of Europeans within reach. By way of extricating the victims, letter after letter, and envoy after envoy, are despatched, like the messengers after a schoolboy's kite, and with about the same appearance of a return; and so the whole familiar story is brought to pass, till armed force, aided by Theodore's opportune insanity, settles every account save that of money.

Out of the whole tissue of blunders, the appointment of Mr. Hormuzd Rassam strikes us as among the most conspicuous. We need point to no more convincing proof of this opinion than that furnished by his own pages now before us. The many excellent qualities which have deservedly won him esteem in private life make us the more regret that he should have been thrown into a position calling for men of rougher mould, men downright, or even brusque, rather than scrupulous or cringing in their political manners. For Theodore's wayward, suspicious, and scheming temperament a match might better have been found, it may be thought, in the school of Indian experience, from the roll of the captors of Delhi, or the tranquillizers of Affghan and Punjabee chiefs. A determined growl of the British lion might have had more effect upon the savage ear than the mild mixture of the serpent and the dove which to Mr. Rassam seemed to give the true note of diplomacy. "Humouring the King," when there was any object to be gained, occupies too prominent a place in our envoy's method of approach. The wiliness of the monarch, of which Mr. Rassam was fully aware, was not to be met by a mere attempt to outreach him in weaker fashion at his own game. The ill effects even of an apparent paltering to His Majesty's ill-humour or caprice, and stooping to the tone of alternate blandishment and supplication, is sufficiently shown in the ill-starred interference of Dr. Beke, undertaken in the teeth of every discouragement, from that of Colonel Merewether to every friendly native adviser. What are we to think of a British envoy, when put in chains, sending a message of this sort even when "in low spirits," and beginning to think the lives of himself and his fellow-captives hung upon a thread:—"Tell the King that my fellow-prisoners and myself have reached this gaol in safety, and that when this act of his becomes known, it will doubtless serve to increase his fame, especially when people hear that a great Sovereign has imprisoned a man merely because he was his friend"? This playing up to the King's combined vanity and humour for a joke may have seemed to Mr. Rassam a happy thought under the circumstances. It is the received way, we believe, in many asylums, of working upon certain moods of lunatic patients. A mixture of plaintiveness with chaff might have been expected to act with this sort of spell upon the disturbed spirit of Theodore. We have an inkling of something of this kind of ruse in the fable where the fox finds himself helpless under the paw of the lion. It strikes us, however, as somewhat novel in the history of British diplomacy. Put into still more courtly phrase in the mouth of the messenger Lih, the reply came to His Majesty's ears in the form that "I had not manifested any vexation, but had simply remarked that whatever came from the King was acceptable to me, from a gauntlet to a fetter round the leg." The friendly chiefs, whose conventional native tone Mr. Rassam may have thought himself happy in so well catching, also thought to work upon the Royal pity by the same Oriental attitude of lying in the dust. To the King's first question as to what the English envoy had said, the Bitwáddad's reply was that Mr. Rassam felt highly favoured in having so exalted a locality allotted to him during the rainy season, and one so near His Majesty's Ilfing; "that my only regret was being so far from the Royal presence, but that the thought of soon meeting the King again was a source of great consolation to me." We are not surprised at the result which followed this kissing of the rod, while attempting to throw dust into the wily monarch's eyes. It was presently told to Mr. Rassam, for his comfort, that when the courier delivered the message the King said, "Do those asses of Mágdala chiefs think that Mr. Rassam is such a fool as to believe that any person could put him in chains without my special order? The thing is done, and he must wait until I go there myself"

From the moment that the landing of the British force was reported to the King, courier after courier brought polite and complimentary letters to Mr. Rassam, and on the 18th of March the Royal Commissioners came to Mágdala to strike off his chains. All proofs to the contrary notwithstanding, it seems to have remained a settled point with him that a policy of finesse and submission was preferable to vigorous acts or outspoken words. His reply to Theodore's "kind consideration" probably strikes him still as the model of diplomatic letter-writing on the occasion:—

> I have had the honour of receiving your Majesty's kind letter by Mr. Flad, Alaká Engadá and Yashalaka Lih, and was glad to learn therefrom that your Majesty was in the enjoyment of good health.
>
> I am much obliged for your Majesty's kind consideration in having released me from my chains. May the Lord reward you for all your acts of kindness.
>
> Your Majesty has always tried to befriend me since my arrival in your country; and I trust it will not be long before you perfect my joy by granting a similar boon to my companions.
> I return you my best thanks for having sent me by Mr. Flad, Alaká Engadá and Yasháláka Lih, two thousand dollars; also one hundred sheep and fifty cows, which I have received with pleasure.

We can partially sympathize with Theodore on having had so long to take his measure of the British character, whether for action or diplomacy, from what came officially under his cognizance. A keen judge of human nature, and veiling under a cynical or playful disguise much instinctive sense of what was bold, downright, and even chivalrous on the part of those opposed to him, he may have detected on many an occasion the ring of metal such as meets our ear in another passage of the book before us. Two priests, who had publicly called the King "a Frank" to his face for having failed to keep the Lenten fast, and for having granted a similar dispensation to those of his soldiers who preferred meat and butter to dry bread, on being arraigned before His Majesty, were denounced by him as fools and asses for their meddling, and ordered to be unfettered and forthwith banished from Mágdala. "If I find you in my camp again," was the judge's valedictory, "I will have you flogged." Everybody in the place expected to see them hurled over the fatal precipice. For the "wretched priests," who received the sentence "with downcast looks and without uttering a word," what most moved Her Majesty's Envoy was the "inward exstacy they must have felt at having got off so easily." His fellow-feeling is rather with the poor in spirit than with the candidate for the martyr's crown. It is hard, however, to pledge all his companions to the like way of thinking. "How we all envied their summary banishment, and wished that a similar fate awaited ourselves, even with the superadded disgrace of being kicked out of the loathsome place!" Theodore having so long and so characteristically dissembled his love, it was doubtless by way of suitable return that his victim, on his first reception after his fetters had been struck off, "deemed it prudent to put the best face up our misfortunes. I endeavoured to look as pleased as if I h never been put in chains by the despot, and were not even then his prisoner." This quite bears out Dr. Blanc's odd picture of Theodore and Rassam's last shaking hands, "both crying at the idea of parting." Every allowance must in fairness be made for any man lying at the mercy of a ruthless and capricious tyrant, and it may be thought somewhat harsh, on the part of gentlemen who sit at home at ease, to fix what some might call an heroic or ideal standard of speech and demeanour under circumstances of such severe proof to human nerves. Still it is not for the countrymen of Conolly and Stoddart to forget what has been the actual deportment of British officers and gentlemen in even more trying straits than these, and they will hardly be persuaded that the honour or the repute of England gained much from the choice of a representative of blood and culture alien from their own. We are far from grudging Mr. Rassam the satisfaction he thinks it fair to claim from the official expression of the "high sense entertained by Her Majesty's Government of his conduct during the difficult and arduous period of his employment" under the Foreign Office. "You appear," writes Lord Stanley, "throughout to have acted for the best, and your prudence, discretion, and good management seem to have tended greatly to preserve the lives, and thus to insure the ultimate release, of the captives." Still less would we begrudge him the 5,000*l.* which the Government has granted, not only as some compensation for his sufferings, but as a "testimony of appreciation of good service." A great nation ought to be generous, and, since all's well that ends well, we care little to calculate with niceness or jealousy how far our envoy's diplomatic energy or tact is to be credited with the ultimate release of the captives. However, "preserving the lives" of the party and of himself being logically a premiss of some importance to this most desirable conclusion, we feel too happy in welcoming back our imperilled countrymen to linger critically over every stage of the ordeal through which the credit of the country had in the interim to pass.

It is not possible to pass so lightly over the closing episode of Mr. Rassam's mission. We allude to the famous business of the cows, of which Dr. Blanc speaks as "Mr. Rassam's unfortunate mistake," and which has been taken advantage of in some quarters to cast upon the British Commander-in-Chief a charge of having deceived Theodore. It is distinctly asserted by Dr. Blanc that Samuel was authorized by Mr. Rassam to intimate to Theodore Sir R. Napier's acceptance of the present. Mr. Rassam's own narrative confirms the statement. Samuel wished to know what reply he was to carry back to the King respecting the proffered present of sheep and cows. "On my repeating this question to the Commander-in-Chief, His Excellency said 'I accept them,' and that was the message which I gave to Samuel." It does not appear that Mr. Rassam was at any pains to explain to Sir R. Napier that any particular significance attached, by native usage, to the acceptance of such a present. Had he so understood it, he must be judged culpable, in his position, of a plain omission of duty; while to be ignorant of it would imply singular lack of knowledge on his part of native ideas of etiquette in general, or of the craft of Theodore in particular. Anyhow, his throwing the blame of the matter upon the Commander-in-Chief is beyond excuse. We now learn from General Merewether that no word in reply escaped Sir R. Napier's lips. He merely "bowed his head," probably thinking the matter of little moment. If Theodore was really deceived, with no one else than Mr. Rassam can the blame possibly rest. With him, too, must rest the fault if any suspicion of laxity or inexactness be thrown by this crucial instance upon the general tenor of his narrative. Much, as we are expressly told, was compiled from memory, most of the original notes, diaries, and other documents having been made away with under fear of detection and its consequences. Making allowance for this drawback, as well as for what we have felt bound to notice as signs of weakness in mind or character, there is much in the tale of this anxious and wearisome captivity to render it interesting to the public.

A NEW HISTORY OF PARIS.*

TO the grumbling Parisians who complain of Baron Haussmann's destructive propensities, and who see all the vestiges of the past swept recklessly away, the municipal authorities have just been offering a most splendid sop in the shape of the magnificent volume now before us. The Prefect of the Seine is certainly quite justified in boasting that no constitutional Government would have been bold enough to incur the enormous expenses entailed by the publication of a work like the Histoire de Paris, and he may confidently point to this gorgeous folio as one of the noblest specimens modern France has ever produced of erudition, art, and typography.

We may begin by reminding our readers that some years ago the Paris Administrative Council voted the publication, on an extensive scale, of a complete history of that city. The works of Lebeuf, Sauval, and Dulaure are, no doubt, valuable in their way, and can well be profitably consulted; but they are of too summary a character, and neither the resources of private speculation nor the zeal of religious communities could have been sufficient to bring out a history of Paris really worthy of the subject. The plan adopted by Baron Haussmann is that of a series of monographs. It is, of course, liable to the objection of want of unity; but it presents advantages which considerably overbalance this defect, and amongst others is the fact that the preparation and issuing of the various series which are to compose the entire work can be undertaken simultaneously. Thus, besides a general introduction to the history of Paris, complete in one volume, we have already before us the first instalments of a Topographie historique du Vieux Paris (Louvre et Tuileries) by M. Berty, and also of a survey of the old Paris libraries by M. Alfred Franklin.

The folio entitled Les Historiens de Paris au XIV^e^ et au XV^e^ Siècle, composed jointly by M. Leroux de Lincy, M. L. M. Tisserand, and M. A. Breul, is, in point both of size and of intrinsic value, the most important contribution to the whole collection as yet issued, and it is fully entitled to a distinct notice. Let us say a word, first, of the numerous illustrations which have been added to it, and which throw so much light upon the descriptions given in the letterpress. With a view to render this part of the volume as attractive and as perfect as possible, the chief public and private libraries, both in France and abroad, have been consulted; chromolithographs, photographic engravings, woodcuts, and steel plates are scattered throughout the book in endless variety, and every opportunity has been taken of showing pictorially what Paris was six centuries ago. Some of the most splendid miniatures contained in the old mediæval missals and manuscript Bibles are reproduced with admirable accuracy and perfection. Here are two views of Paris during the fifteenth century; a little further on we have a curious representation of the Petit-pont, such as it appeared about the same time; then comes the famous Maison aux Piliers, where the turbulent citizens of the mud metropolis held their meetings; and, finally, the artist treats us to a gorgeous sketch of the interior of the Sainte Chapelle. The facsimile of original charters, of seals, escutcheons, portraits, buildings, and old prints are so numerous that we must be satisfied with a passing mention of them. We spoke just now of the miniatures to be found in some of the MSS. belonging to the great libraries and collections of Europe; the information which they furnish on points of topography is often singularly curious, and at the same time extremely correct. When an illuminator, for instance, in endeavouring to illustrate the Bible, found that the subject he had to deal with was, say, the Crucifixion, instead of giving as the background of his miniature the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, which of course he knew nothing about, he very naturally substituted scenes with which he was familiar—Montmartre, Vincennes, Montfaucon, Saint Denis, &c. If he had to represent the taking of the Holy City by the Crusaders, he delineated the walls of Paris; and his contemporaries thus found Notre Dame, the Louvre, the University, and the Town Hall immortalized à propos either of the Holy Scriptures or of some popular legend. Such is the peculiar value (in addition to its artistic merit) of a beautiful illumination borrowed from the missal of Juvenal des Ursins, copied in this volume, and which represents the shepherds receiving the tidings of Our Lord's nativity; the landscape being a view of the Seine, with the tower of the Temple, the Church of Saint-Jean-en-Grève, the Petit Châtelet, and the Butte-Montmartre faithfully portrayed.

But it is time that we should come to the text, and give some idea of its importance. As the title of the work suggests, the learned editors have published descriptions of Paris written by authors who lived during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; let us add that the notes, elucidations, and comments by which these descriptions are accompanied show an amount of research and of patience above all praise. The first piece is an éloge of Paris, composed in the year 1323, by Jean de Jandun, a master of the College of Navarre, whose metaphysical works had procured for him the surname of Doctor Acutissimus. Jandun appears to have been in his day a supporter of opinions which were not considered very orthodox; his great friend was the celebrated Marsilio of Padua, well known by his attacks against the Papacy, and he became his collaborateur in the publication of a treatise entitled Defensor pacis, the programme of which was nothing else, as a distinguished critic remarks *, than the sovereignty of the people and universal suffrage. Translated into French, the Defensor pacis soon obtained the widest circulation; yet if its boldness was well calculated to make it popular amongst those whom the ambition and rapacity of the Court of Rome had long filled with disgust, that very merit could not, on the other hand, but excite the anger of the powers that were. Poor Jean de Jandun paid the penalty of his liberalism. Obliged to leave Paris, he retired first to Senlis, and then to Germany, where he died. It is from Senlis that his Éloge de Paris is dated. A friend having taunted him on account of his departure, Jandun replied by a pompous praise of the town where he had found a refuge. His correspondent retorted—"How? you, Doctor Acutissime, you are ungrateful enough to despise the advantages of Paris, and to prefer to it an obscure country town?" "No," answers the philosopher, "and I shall prove to you forthwith that I am quite as alive as you are to the great merits of the metropolis of intellectual Europe." Hence a long and curious éloge containing an account of the topographical beauties of Paris, its public buildings, its civilization, arts, manners, &c. The Latin original of that work had already been published in 1856 by MM. Leroux de Lincy and Taranne, in the Bulletin du Comité de la Langue, de l'Histoire et des Arts de la France; it is on the present occasion supplemented with a French translation and a learned commentary.

* Ad. Franck, Réformateurs et Publicistes de l'Europe, p. 139.

The next morceau is a short fragment from the pen of Raoul de Presles, a distinguished writer honoured with the favour of Charles V., and who took a part in ecclesiastical affairs during the fourteenth century. The King of France had ordered him to write a translation of St. Augustine's De Civitate Dei, assigning to him as a remuneration a pension of 400 livres, afterwards increased to 600, for the whole of the author's life. Raoul de Presles was not satisfied with merely giving a version of the bishop's treatise; he added commentaries of his own, and à propos of the 25th chapter of the 5th Book he wrote a short description of Paris. This fragment, the elements of which are borrowed chiefly from Paulus Orosius, Julius Celsus, Geoffrey of Monmouth, Helinand, and Gulielmus Brito, contains many particulars which never existed except in the imagination of the old chroniclers, who are responsible for them; and some of his etymologies are extremely fanciful, as when he says, "comme aussi les Allemans sont diz d'un autre fleuve qui est appellé Lemannus"; but at the same time he gives a great deal of valuable information respecting the Paris of his own days, and the notices which he gives the popular chansons de geste are very interesting.

Guillebert de Metz is the author of the third piece printed in this volume. Nothing certain is known about him, except that he was a German by birth, and that he studied at the University of Paris. He lived about the middle of the fifteenth century, exercised the profession of a scribe, and assumed the title of libraire to the Duke of Burgundy. The last ten chapters of his description are the most valuable of all because they contain quæque ipse vidit; he was evidently on familiar terms with all the University men of the day, the philosophers, scribes, illuminators, and artists of every kind; he mentions them as his friends, and describes them, as he goes on, in a few characteristic words.

Finally, the editors of this volume have published a Latin poem, hitherto inédit, of Antonio, an Italian writer, a native of Asti, who became one of the retainers of Charles, Duke of Orleans, after that prince was released from his captivity in England. Until quite lately, Antonius Astensis—to use the Latinized form of his name—was known only through a poem entitled De Varietate Fortunæ, published in the fourteenth volume of Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores; but a considerable collection of his works was discovered amongst the treasures of the Grenoble Library, and from that manuscript volume M. Leroux de Lincy and his collaborateurs have printed, together with a French translation, a description, in hexameters, of Paris, its suburbs, and the principal towns of France. Antonius Astensis is not satisfied with giving an account of all the buildings, both secular and religious, the streets, markets, &c.; he launches forth also into political digressions, and speaks more than once of the wars between the English and French, inveighing bitterly against the former, whom he accuses of thorough irreligion:—

> Ex hoc ergo patet Majoribus esse Britannis,
> Quos dicunt Anglos vulgari nomine Galli,
> Aut paulum aut certe nil relligionis in altum
> Cœlorum Regem, cujus non alma verentur
> Templa, manu si quando queunt violare nefanda,
> Quæ Galli exornant ingenti semper honore. . . .

This tirade, occurring in a description of the Abbey of Saint Denis, need not astonish us. A secretary to the Duke of Orleans—who, after the fatal battle of Agincourt, had been for twenty-five years a prisoner in England—Antonius Astensis had naturally no sympathy with those whom he calls Majores Britanni: he therefore draws from the premisses contained in the above lines the following conclusion:—

> Non igitur miror si tandem Rector Olympi,
> Exaltare solens justos et lædere pravos,
> Auxilii tantum Gallorum contulit armis,
> Et tantis sævis fuit adversarius Anglis.

We have thus given a short summary of the principal works which compose the new volume issued under the patronage and by the authority of the Paris Municipal Council. In addition, however, to the four productions just mentioned, we should not forget a number of other documents which complete the information furnished by Jean de Jandun, Raoul de Presles, Guillebert de Metz, and Antonius Astensis. Thus the topography of the Cimetière des Innocents would scarcely have been satisfactory had not the editors reprinted the famous Dit des trois Morts et des trois Vifs, the subject of which, together with the mournful doggerel accompanying it, was sculptured over the portal of the church. It is well known also that a representation of the dance of death was painted in fresco on the walls which surrounded the burial-ground, "pour esmouvoir les gens à dévotion." These gloomy figures are well reproduced, and a disquisition is added on the nature and origin of the danse macabre. Let us also notice a curious chapter on the Paris bourgeoisie between 1380 and 1424, with short memoranda of the principal citizens mentioned by Guillebert de Metz. Even in those troublous times, when civil and foreign wars seemed to have brought France to the verge of destruction, when the Church was rent by schism, and the sceptre was in the hands of a lunatic, the list of distinguished writers, of artists, poets, philosophers, and divines, supplies many a name which posterity still honours. Jean Charlier de Gerson, Pierre d'Ailly, Christine de Pisan, and Alain Chartier, are a few amongst those whom we might here mention.

The only fault we have to find with this sumptuous volume consists in the misprints. Some of the extracts are very negligently given, especially the ditié of Christine de Pisan, in which the printer has sadly blundered.

THE AUSTRIAN NARRATIVE OF BENEDEK'S CAMPAIGN.*

THE publication of the third official volume of the Austrian history of the late war enables us to see that there are other objects in view in this work than merely to show that the Cabinet of Vienna has resolved to purge away its old reproach of useless reticence, and to live in harmony with the age. The blame of the purely military portion of the failure of 1866 has lain so heavily on the Imperial advisers and their master, that they have chosen voluntarily to reveal in full detail the steps that led up hour by hour to the great catastrophe of Koniggratz, in order to show how much of the fatal result was due to the incompetence of the general whom the army, it is fair to say, quite as much as the Kaiser, had chosen for his office. Notwithstanding the necessity, to which we drew attention in our notice of the first section of the work †, of distrusting the completeness of all Austrian official narratives (the first condition of whose writers is to avoid throwing blame on the Emperor and his councillors), there is abundant reason to extol the faithfulness of the present narrator as far as his limits permit him to go, and to admire the minute precision with which he marshals his military details, and explains the causes of the mistakes made and the difficulties encountered. Making every allowance for all possible softening of the Imperial share in the disasters of that brief summer campaign which gave Prussia the supremacy of Germany, there is still plain proof, from his own orders and despatches, that General Benedek failed utterly to make the most of what advantages he had, or to answer to the expectations conceived beforehand of his strategic ability.

Benedek's history is an instructive one, as illustrating a truth often forgotten, that a dashing colonel or brigadier, brave as a lion in action, and with the quickest glance for the advantages to be won by tactical dexterity in a limited field, may yet be wholly void of that larger warlike genius which enables a general-in-chief to divine the yet undeveloped purpose of the enemy, and to wield his own forces, though not within sight, so as to bring their striking power to bear at the right time and place. His first distinctions were won in Italy, where, in 1849, his gallantry and quickness at Mortara, at the head of two battalions, turned a slight into a decisive success, and paved the way for Radetski's great victory of two days later at Novara. Few regimental officers—perhaps none except Colborne with his immortal 52nd—have done so much for an army; and when, ten years later, at Solferino, the corps of General Benedek checked and even repulsed the left of the enemy, triumphant along the rest of the line, he took his place at once by common consent as the future leader of the Imperial army, which that day was once more outgeneralled by its ancient foe within sight of the fields of Castiglione and Rivoli. For some years before the war he held the chief command the Emperor had to bestow, that in Venetia; and when he took up his headquarters with the forces gathering to oppose Prussia in 1866, no generalissimo had ever more completely the confidence of his soldiers. No contrast could be more striking in this respect than that between the popular Austrian hero whose chance words to some veteran Wachmeister, repeated from mouth to mouth, made cheerful the bivouac round Olmutz, and the almost unknown Prussian strategist whose representatives in the field were the two not very friendly Royal cousins—the one known as a soldier only by the bombardment of Duppel, the other by his constant adherence to the family foible of tight full-dress uniform. The two opponents had prepared for war in their several ways. Benedek had issued his well-known "Tactical Instructions for the Northern Army," which show that he judged the rapidity of Austrian manœuvring to make his troops more than a match for their better-armed enemies—a proof that he altogether underrated the breechloader. Von Moltke had worked out fully in the Cabinet each condition of the great problem before him; and, aided by Roon and Bismark, had carefully smoothed away each source of friction in the powerful but almost untried engine which he wielded. Theory was now to be matched against practice; the closet against the camp; improved arms and organization against tried leaders and a staff inured to the demands of war.

As was shown in our former article, the Prussians were so much the better able to collect and move their armies, that in the last week of May they had succeeded in collecting 288,000 men on the northern frontier of Bohemia, whilst Benedek was still pushing up from Olmutz the last corps of his lesser force of 255,000. It does not appear, however, that this movement of his was so far delayed as to put him at a serious disadvantage. On the 26th the Prussians were advancing on all sides, with intent to unite in the neighbourhood of the afterwards famous battle-ground. 160,000 men, under Prince Frederic Charles and Herwarth, moved in parallel columns from Saxony towards the Iser. 120,000, under the Crown Prince, were to enter by the more difficult frontier of Silesia; and, to avoid delay, Von Moltke had decided on the very critical operation of throwing them into Bohemia by three perfectly distinct passes, in the hope that they might force their way to a juncture before the enemy should act with decisive effect against either column, and that, these divisions united, the important design of bringing together the two vast invading armies might be accomplished by force or strategy. On the other side, Benedek had opposed to the greater army a left wing, 55,000 strong, two days' march off upon the Iser, under the Crown Prince of Saxony and Clam Gallas; whilst 200,000 were collected round Josephstadt and Königgrätz, the last of the corps, the 6th, being but a day's march off to the east, on its way towards the former place.

It has been urged, by those who take the most favourable view of Benedek's action at this crisis, that, knowing by certain proofs of the Prussian advance upon the Iser, he did not wholly believe in the reality of an attack on the side on which the Crown Prince threatened him, but counted the demonstrations there to be possibly a ruse, to be followed by a secret flank march round of this part of the Prussian forces to join the others; and that upon this false conception he based his own mistaken strategy. The documents now published by the Austrian Government clearly prove this suggestion to be beyond the known facts. On the night of the 26th, the arrival of great forces in the passes of Trantenau and Nachod was perfectly known by numerous reports at the Austrian headquarters. Of the third and central column, the corps of Guards, on its way from Braunau, there seems to have been little or nothing ascertained, an omission which seriously influenced the course of operation afterwards; but there could be no doubt that a very formidable army was passing the mountains close at hand. The great question then arose, whether the bulk of the Austrian force should be kept in hand to crush this army as it developed itself, or moved to fall on Prince Frederick Charles whilst the co-operating force thus signalled was yet entangled with its passage through the mountains and round the fortress of Josephstadt, which partly barred its way. Of a purely defensive attitude, such as that by which Laudon repulsed Frederic on the same ground in 1778, there was no thought, as is generally known.

The choice of Benedek fell, after some hesitation, on the second movement. Word was sent to the Saxon prince and Clam that they would be strongly supported, and four of the six corps of infantry were put under orders, on the 27th, for the march westward next day. The two remaining, those of Gablenz and Ramming, were to watch the passes of Trantenau and Nachod respectively, and detain the enemy. At this point it was that Benedek's judgment is clearly shown, by his own orders, to have erred. A mere containing force, such as that to be left behind, should not, on any sound principle, be risked in a decisive action with the larger one to be opposed. If the Crown Prince was really advancing as supposed, Gablenz and Ramming, on finding themselves outnumbered, had behind them the line of the Upper Elbe, partly covered by Josephstadt, and easy to defend with unbroken troops. But Benedek was misled apparently by his confidence in the tactical dexterity of his troops and the inexperience of the Prussians, and he gave his subalterns orders that their defence of the respective passes need not prevent them, "should the enemy show himself, from energetically attacking and overthrowing him" (dem Gegner, wo er sich zeigt, mit aller Energie auf den Leib zu gehen). The direct results of these orders were the actions of Nachod and Trantenau on the 27th, Ramming being thoroughly beaten by the Crown Prince with Steinmetz's column, and Gablenz repulsing that of Bonin, but only at a frightful sacrifice of men in repeated assaults in the face of the needle-gun. The latter of these actions seemed, however, to balance the former, and no change was made that evening in the intention to move westward against Prince Frederic Charles, although, with fatal hesitation, the orders to the corps were for the time suspended, and the 8th, supported by the 4th, even moved eastward on Skalitz to relieve the troops of the 6th, whom Ramming's report stated to be "unable without support to endure any fresh attack."

Before dawn of the 28th Benedek was roused from his hesitation by news from Clam Gallas of an advance of the enemy which threatened to bring the Prussians near Gitschin, and interpose their advance between the Austrian left wing and main army. The former was directed to fall back towards the latter; Gablenz to abandon the ground won at Trantenau, and retire southward; Ramming's beaten troops to withdraw behind the relieving corps. Benedek rode out to visit the latter; and, the Prussians up to 11 A.M. not having shown themselves, he concluded that the victorious column of the day before was waiting to unite with others on the march; and so, ordering his troops to hold their ground until 2 P.M., and then to retreat "should no severe fight have come on" by that hour, he left again for Josephstadt. But the opportunity of retreating safely was lost by the delay, for he was scarcely off the ground when Steinmetz advanced in force to attack the Austrians. Three brigades only of the four of the 8th Corps met him, and by 3 P.M. these had been driven out of Skalitz, worsted easily by the superior numbers and better weapons of their enemies, and suffering losses as heavy as those of Ramming the day before. Benedek had worse news than this to hear that fatal evening. Gablenz—retreating, according to orders, from Trantenau—had been surprised upon the way by the hitherto unobserved column of Prussian Guards, not engaged the day before. Two detachments which should have covered his flank had been withdrawn, one by a mistake of some staff officer who sent it to a wrong village, the other by a too precipitate rendering of Benedek's morning order of concentration. The result was the utter defeat of the victors of the day before, whom the vigorous pursuit of the Guards bore back upon the Elbe with terrible loss. It was 10 P.M. when this alarming news reached Benedek, who had been occupied, notwithstanding his accounts of the disaster of the 8th Corps, in disposing his available forces for the movement westward. But the details of the day's defeats which poured in during the night infused a natural hesitation into his counsels, and on the morning of the 29th he announced himself compelled to abandon his project, and concentrate in a neighbouring position behind the Elbe.

The Crown Prince pressed him still, but no general action came about this day on that side. The left wing, however, now suffered severely in its turn. Having halted at Gitschin upon the assurance (despatched by Benedek before his change of plan) that the main army would move to meet them at that place, the Saxon Prince and Clam Gallas attempted to hold a position there in face of the masses of Prussians following them from the Iser, were outnumbered, turned, and terribly beaten. At 7.30 P.M., when the fight was decided and the allies in full retreat, came a messenger with Benedek's orders despatched at daybreak, acquainting them that they were to expect no support, and were to avoid a fight! The messenger had taken sixteen hours to travel twenty-four miles. Benedek's staff, and the contradictory hesitation of his own orders, had conspired with the needle-gun to lose the scarcely opened campaign. The chief lost heart in himself and his army and his country's cause, and, to an encouraging telegram sent by the Emperor in reply to the first bad news, his reply, despatched three days before the great battle, was "I entreat your Majesty earnestly to make peace at any price, or a catastrophe cannot be avoided." The general who wrote this was hardly the man to retrieve a failing cause, or rally a demoralized army. Königgrätz was lost, in fact, before it was fought, if the Austrian narrative be as trustworthy as it appears.

TRIALS OF AN HEIRESS.*

It may be hypercritical to cavil at titles when authors find them so very hard to come by, but we are inclined to object to Trials of an Heiress, as implying that wealth has generally an immunity from suffering, and that the trials of the heroine were an exception to the rule. Perhaps, however, we ought to read the title in the opposite light, and Mrs. Gifford may have intended to point the moral that riches shut out but the single evil—poverty. We do not know that we can pronounce the conception of the story artistically good. Bessie Marchmont fosters in her bosom the snakes that are to sting her; she becomes contrite as she gets uncomfortable, and pitcously wails out her mea culpa when discomfort culminates in wretchedness. But as certain faults excite disgust, while others invite our sympathy—as some diseases, loathsome as they are painful, keep compassion at a distance—so the snakes that Bessie rears are of so particularly unpleasant a breed that it is difficult to feel much for her when her pets take to biting. It is of course the prerogative of an author to draw his characters as he pleases, so long as he does not utterly violate the laws of probability and nature. But if he chooses to give us a realistic picture of a disagreeable subject, he must not complain if it does not charm us like a study of grace and beauty. Bessie Marchmont's character may be true enough to nature, but then it is nature of a very sordid cast. It is quite conceivable that a petted young girl, accustomed to be mistress in her father's house, brought up as heiress apparent to his provincial grandeur, should bitterly resent being superseded by a step-mother whom she dislikes, nor hail very warmly the apparition of a baby brother destined to put her nose out of joint. But such annoyances, were they merely passing, would be a matter of course, and far too frail a foundation to base a three-volume novel on. So, instead of raging and having done with it, Bessie Marchmont sulks. Her indignation swallows up alike all weaker and better feelings; her love for a hitherto indulgent father changes itself into something closely resembling repulsion; she is frankly outspoken in her detestation of his new wife, and, when that lady dies in childbirth, her child succeeds to that heritage of hatred. It is on her ostentatiously displayed dislike to the little heir that the interest of the story is to turn, and the dénouement demands that it should be steadily borne in upon the reader. But it is so utterly repugnant to our ideal of a womanly nature, it so thoroughly divorces our sympathies from the heroine, that we regret when at last she comes out triumphant from a passage of love with another, where the hand of the man that each is in love with is the prize. This jealousy of her place, position, and prospects, which disgusts us in a creation of fiction evoked to interest our sympathies, sounds natural and appropriate enough in the mouths of her inferiors. When the housekeeper, the maid, and the little boy who was picked out of a gipsy tent to make a protegé of, vent their compassionate indignation at her dethronement, we can understand it; but we should have thought it inevitable that a refined, delicately nurtured girl would be scared back into her better mind by so mean a companionship of sentiment. To be sure, the unconscious little appropriator of her rights does find his way to her heart at last, and unlocks the fountains of tenderness which, it appears, have only been sealed up. The process by which this is brought about makes her conversion a more poetical one than if she had been shamed out of her naughtiness by seeing it caricatured among the courtiers of the servants' hall. But then it makes it evident that her eyes have been open to her meanness all the time she was indulging it, and to us it seems a radical blot in the book that its interest is to be found in the hopelessly degraded tone of the heroine's mind rather than in a fit of passing perversity.

Of the other characters many are very good in their way, and they have the great merit of being duly subordinated to the principal one. Where an heiress is the heroine, it might be expected that a lover or two would be so constantly by her side as to share with her the honours of the stage. Mrs. Gifford dexterously avoids this danger by assigning to Bessie successively two separate favoured lovers out of the many anonymous ones in the background, and one of these is disposed of by a fatal accident before the other comes conspicuously to the front at all. We cannot say we are much prepossessed in favour of either. The first we should say was entirely worthy of Bessie, and it will be seen that we do not in any way share his passion for her. He is a lady-novelist's hero—a young officer of cavalry, good-looking, strong-limbed, excellent at all manly games, as great a favourite in his corps as with the sex, taking to the saddle as naturally as a duckling to the water, and entrusted at steeple-chases with all the money of the regiment from the very day he joins it. Intellect is perhaps scarcely his strong point; he admires Bessie much and himself more, and, when he gets to his country quarters in Ireland, admires very promiscuously indeed. He is killed, as we said, leaving behind him a perfect museum of gages d'amour in the shape of fans, faded flowers, and solitary gloves; and peace be to his ashes. Bessie, had she known all and still loved him, might have consoled herself with the thought that he only anticipated one violent death by another, for assuredly some of the fair owners of the ravished trophies must have had fire-eating brothers. We may remark, in passing, that the chapter telling of the fatal steeple-chase does very great credit to a lady's pen. The next lover, and the luckier one, is another stamp of man altogether. He is not meant to captivate at first, but mentally and physically he grows upon us as we read. We have heard that ugly babies often turn into handsome men, but with Duberry the deformed is transformed when he has attained years of maturity. He is first presented to us as absolutely ugly, more as a foil to set off his brilliant friend and rival than anything else. Later we find him the darling of the London drawing-rooms, and although beauty is but skin-deep, and, as squinting Mr. Wilkes said, an ugly man with brains is at worst only so many hours behind an Adonis without them, yet positive plainness will hardly fascinate the many at first sight, even when kindled by expression. It must be owned that the author represents Duberry as making his way in society by his brains rather than his face, and his reputation as a rising barrister is the open sesame to hearts and salons. We fear that practical men may condemn these bits of his biography as being about as unreal as anything that could well be conceived. In the first place, very young barristers without money and connexion, even when rising men, do not as a rule take drawing-rooms by storm, recommending themselves to Belgravian mothers no less than to their daughters, and elbowing wealthy earls out of their way in contending for the hands of the latter. Then a young barrister without professional backing is scarcely likely to rise very rapidly at all, not at least without plodding hard. Unless he is a phenomenon of brilliant versatility, West-end drawing-rooms are the last places where we should look to see such a man night after night. But some men have a way of getting through their business that is utterly unintelligible to others, and Duberry finds time between his more serious and his lighter avocations to throw off a succession of articles for the leading periodicals. It is to enhance the merit of his faithful attachment to Bessie that he is conducted through these enchanted halls, among the groups of willing and wealthy houris. He has been desperately in love with her from the days when she was forbidden fruit to him, down to the time when his rival's death brought her something nearer, if not quite within his reach. But she treats him with as little tenderness as she does every one else, even after she begins to acknowledge to herself that he is almost as much to her as her fortune. Perhaps it may be our prejudice, but we are never softened in Bessie's favour, not even by her mournful soliloquies after her petulant rejection of her lover's attentions has sent him away in despair. Our first feeling always is that, if Duberry only knew it, he might think himself excessively lucky at not being taken at his word. In town, where he is thrown much with Blanche Mortimer and fancies himself in love with her, and when Blanche falls deeply in love with him while her mother looks on benignant, we only think how pleasant it would make things for every one if the heiress were to succumb under the mental and bodily sufferings which are weighing her down. Blanche is a very sweet, winning, delicate-minded girl, not in the least spoiled by a London season; and although you meet her seldom, and have slight opportunity of improving her acquaintance, you fall in love with her at first sight. We should be too glad to see her happiness secured, whereas we really care very little indeed what may be the fate of Miss Marchmont. But just then the critical state of the heiress—heiress no longer—tears down the veil which her caprice had interposed between her and her lover. Blanche Mortimer resigns him generously and with dignity, saying very truly that she is worthy of the first place in the heart of any man to whom she has given her love, and Duberry marries the impoverished and reformed Bessie Marchmont.

There is no doubt that the story is a very readable one, but, as we said, there is much that is unpleasant in it, and a good deal more that is very improbable. The author never hesitates to draw recklessly on our credulity, and she flies nearly as daring a flight as Mrs. Henry Wood in East Lynne, in introducing us to Colonel La Garde. Colonel La Garde is the younger brother of the squire, supposed to have perished at sea many years before; he comes back to his native parish under that feigned name; settles close to his ancestral home; is in daily familiar intercourse with his brother and those who have known him as a lad; treats his niece as an adopted daughter; and, although he nearly betrayed himself to the casual wayfarers he encountered on the evening of his mysterious arrival, yet succeeds in preserving his incognito till the necessities of the story compel him to unmask. Then, although in a matter of this sort we should be sorry to set our vague speculations against superior feminine knowledge, it does seem to us unlikely that Miss Marchmont, living under the same roof with her mother-in-law, should remain to the last in utter darkness as to that lady's impending confinement. Undoubtedly this makes the little stranger's appearance on the scene more dramatic, and gives occasion to an impressive situation as well, but it is surely as nearly impossible as, we should hope, is Bessie's unrelenting animosity to the infant which its mother's death has left an orphan. Her stepmother's character certainly goes far to extenuate Bessie's hatred to that lady, a hatred which is not even buried in the grave. Mrs. Duberry is the type of the intriguing adventuress, living by her wits, and at the mercy of her maid and confederate. But is it natural that she should catch the squire as she did, spreading her nets down in the country in full sight of the bird, and amid all the circumstantial gossip that was flying about the village and servants' hall as to her own dubious doings and antecedents? It seems strange, too, that a mother so coarse and so unscrupulous should have brought up a son with a mind so delicate and principles so high; or that a man, generally so close an observer of character as Duberry is, should have been utterly blinded by filial partiality to the nature of a woman he had lived with from childhood. The truth is, the author seems to us to pounce on any likely-looking materials without being very fastidious as to the general harmony of the workmanship. So long as she can get her personages into a painful situation, and can manage to heighten its disagreeables, it is a very secondary matter whether the attitude is unnatural or not. But even where the story most scandalizes our common sense, we fancy we can see a reason that is to a certain extent plausible, and if the author sacrifices nature and simplicity, it is with an eye to heightening the interest of something which you may possibly contrive to accept, if, like the Marchioness, you make-believe very much indeed. We do not intend a sneer when we say that, taken apart, the chapters would be very agreeable reading; but if we take the context along with us, we are always stumbling over inconsistencies that wake us up and remind us we are in an unreal world.

If we have dwelt on the faults of the book it is only because we are alive to its merits. The author has a pleasant style, and has fancy and tact enough to make a natural story an interesting one, and we are too glad to welcome lady-writers who always remember that they are ladies, and women as well. Among a good deal that is pointless and leads to nothing, her points are often very good indeed. We have no doubt that, if Mrs. Gifford sticks more closely to nature, if she studies more carefully the probable tastes and sympathies of her readers, if she takes Blanche Mortimers for heroines instead of Bessie Marchmonts, we shall be able some day to congratulate her on a very charming novel.

THE RAILWAYS OF INDIA.*

CAPTAIN DAVIDSON has earned the thanks of that increasing section of the public which has fixed upon Indian railways as a safe field for investment, and of that still larger class which takes an interest in the achievement of great ends in the face of great difficulties, by his work on the Railways of India. Shareholders will turn to its contents to satisfy a natural curiosity as to the sources from whence they derive their income, while the general reader will find in it a record of mechanical triumphs to which English engineering can show but few parallels. A glance at the very useful map affixed to the volume will show that the main system of Indian railways at present opened or sanctioned embraces two pairs of alternate parallel lines. One of these pairs consists of the line from Calcutta to Lahore, and the line from Madras to Bombay, both having a general direction from south-east to north-west. The other pair comprises the line from Allahabad to Bombay, and the line from Madras to Beypore, both having a general direction from north-east to south-west. Thus, when the system is completed, it will be possible to travel continuously from the Punjaub to the Malabar coast, crossing the continent of India four times in the journey.

Railway enterprise in India enjoys two great advantages in comparison with similar undertakings in this country. There are no unnecessary Parliamentary expenses, and the land is given by the Government. Taking the average of eight Indian and eight English lines, the proportions of law and Parliamentary expenses to the total capital of the Company are respectively ·108 and 2·79. The elements of cost are thus reduced to the payment of labour and the purchase of materials. In these respects the contrast is less to the advantage of India. The wages of masons, smiths, and carpenters have risen considerably, owing to the increased demand for workmen. In Bengal, before railways were begun, they earned from 6*d*. to 9*d*. a day. Now they are paid from 9*d*. to 1*s*. Foremen in these trades now ask from 3*s*. 4*d*. to 5*s*. a day, while formerly they could only make from 1*s*. 3*d*. to 1*s*. 8*d*. The greater rise in this latter case shows the disproportionate demand which exists for any kind of labour which implies headwork. In the higher branches all the superintendence has to be obtained from England, which involves more than double payments, besides the travelling and medical expenses, which at that distance and in that climate are both extremely heavy. The Railway Companies have made great efforts to substitute native operatives, but as yet with very partial success. Clerks and accountants are easily obtainable, nor is there any deficiency in mechanical aptitude; but, according to Captain Davidson, "natives are wanting in presence of mind, courage to deal with emergencies, forethought, and caution—qualities which a good driver of engines must have before he can be competent to manage an engine and train." Taking into account this necessity of importation from home, together with the inferiority, both in quantity and quality, of native as compared with English work, the advantage as regards cost of labour is not much on the side of India. The cost of materials is in some instances very much in excess of what would be paid in this country. Iron, for example, has been obtained from England, to the extent of 3,726,420 tons in the years from 1850 to 1867. Besides the freight, which now averages about 1*l*. 11*s*. a ton, the cost of transport from Calcutta and Bombay to the interior has been very great. The East Indian Railway had to build a fleet of barges and steamers for the purpose, the native boats proving unfit for the carriage of such heavy goods, and the Great Indian Peninsula had to overcome great difficulties in getting their iron work up the ghâts. Building-stone is abundant in Bombay and Madras, granite especially being so common in the latter Presidency that for many purposes it takes the place of timber. Telegraph wires, for instance, are carried on granite blocks, instead of on wooden posts. In Bengal brick is the principal material, and when properly made there is no fault to be found with it. Unfortunately, however, the Indian engineer has to make bricks, as well as build with them. "A native takes any clay that happens to be near at hand, digs it up, wets it, kneads it with his feet for a short time, then moulds the bricks on the ground, and leaves them to dry in the hot sun and wind." It is only by setting up brickfields of their own that the Railway Companies have been able to ensure a satisfactory result. Timber in a land of forests might have been expected to be abundant, but as a matter of fact the provision of wooden sleepers for the permanent way has proved the most fruitful source of difficulty which the constructors of Indian railways have had to encounter. The forests have been so recklessly cut down, that in many parts of the country there is an absolute dearth of trees; and even where more care has been taken of them, it is not easy to find 3,000,000 teak or sâl trees in the first instance, and the same number every ten or fifteen years. Sâl is the commonest and best kind of timber for railway purposes, and if the sleepers are cut from ripe and sound trees they will remain in use at least seven years. Teak is more costly, for which reason its employment on railways is confined for the most part to carriage building. In the Punjaub the deodar is largely used, and in Bombay and Madras rosewood. In a great number of cases, however, it has answered better to bring creosoted pine sleepers from England, where the order can be executed while the embankments and bridges are being constructed, than to organize a separate establishment for cutting and preparing them in India. With sleepers, as with bricks, engineers have found that they must make or get them for themselves. The less a Company depends on Indian contractors the more rapidly will its works be executed. The ravages of the white ant, from which at the outset so much mischief was anticipated, have not proved really serious. The ants are accustomed to work in covered earthen galleries, and as these are dislodged from the sleepers by the vibration of every passing train, they have continually to begin the attack over again.

The two most important members of the Indian Railway system are the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula, each presenting its peculiar difficulties from the nature of the country through which the lines are carried. Great rivers had to be crossed in the first case, a precipice had to be surmounted in the second. The first of these obstacles prevented the terminus of the East Indian line from being placed on the Calcutta side of the river. It was necessary that the railway should be carried by the Raneegunge coalfields on the right bank of the Hooghly, and the choice therefore lay between making Howrah, the town opposite Calcutta, the starting-point, and throwing a bridge across a river 1,700 feet broad, with a tide which at flood runs twenty miles an hour, a bore which abreast of Calcutta is sometimes six feet high, and low banks presenting unusual difficulties for making approaches. The most important bridge yet constructed on any Indian railway is one over the Soane, near its junction with the Ganges above Patna. For the last hundred miles of its course the Soane flows through a bed of sand more than two miles wide, though the river, even in the rainy season, rarely fills this immense channel. At one point, however, the stream contracts to 4,000 feet, and a vein of clay was found to underlie the sand across the whole space between the banks, and here it was determined to construct the bridge. The foundations of the piers were sunk through the sand into the clay, and a wrought-iron lattice superstructure was thrown across them, carrying the rails on the top, and a roadway for passengers beneath. The embankment along which the East Indian Railway mostly runs is composed of earth "brought by men, women, or children in small baskets on their heads from excavations alongside the line." This, says Captain Davidson, "though it seems a primitive and slow method, is in practice found to be sufficiently speedy wherever labour of any kind can be collected. It is the custom of the country, and the simple work, requiring no thought and no plant but a small basket, suits well with the unenergetic character of the population. It allows, too, the whole strength of a family to be employed, from the grandsire down to the girl and boy of ten and twelve. The bank has in all cases been finished without difficulty wherever the labourers have been punctually and fairly paid; and trouble has been experienced in those spots only where contractors have in the first instance failed to pay accurately and readily." On the Great Indian Peninsula line the main obstacle was the Ghâts, a line of precipitous cliffs averaging 2,000 feet in height, by which, as by one step, the traveller descends from the table-land of Central India to the low plains along the coast. The watershed of the country is at the very edge of these cliffs, the streams on one side making their way across the continent to the Bay of Bengal, while on the other side they are precipitated at once to the sea level. Until this century two bullock tracks, the Thull Ghât and the Bhore Ghât, formed the only means of communication between Bombay, and Agra and Calcutta to the north-east, and Poonah and Madras to the south-east. The British Government had made these tracks passable for wheel carriages by 1830, and after careful consideration, they were both adopted as the line along which the two sections of the railway should be taken. In this part of his book Captain Davidson is too chary of details. A mere enumeration of viaducts and tunnels conveys to uninstructed readers but a poor conception of the magnitude of the undertaking of which they form part.

The money with which Indian railways have been constructed is almost wholly English, native capitalists, usually so anxious to take up Government securities, having been discouraged by the nominal management of the lines by private Companies. The guarantee system appears, however, to combine the advantages of private enterprise and Government supervision in the highest attainable degree. If the payment of interest on the capital had not been assured, no one would have been found to take the shares, while if the Government had itself raised a loan for railways, it would have run great risk of being diverted to other purposes "during years of turbulence or pecuniary pressure." By the present arrangement, the money, though deposited with the Government, is lent for a specific purpose, and can be diverted to no other; and "thus it has happened, that even during years of great anxiety and commotion, funds sufficient for the annual outlay on railways have always been forthcoming." The Government guarantee interest at five per cent. for ninety-nine years on all moneys paid into the Treasury, and the Company has the right to demand the repayment of the whole of the capital expended on giving six months' notice of their intention to surrender the railway. In this way, should the Government at any time decline to pay the full interest, the shareholders might get their investment back again and be secure against heavy loss.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

IT would probably be a gross injustice to the accomplished bookmaker who has undertaken the biography of Count Bismark * to suppose him actuated by any other motive than the wish to sell his book. To effect this he must accommodate himself to the taste of his public, with which he must be far more accurately acquainted than any foreign critic can be. But for this, he might be supposed to be experimenting upon the fame of his hero, with the view of discovering how much ridicule it could support without injury. Count Bismark is probably not a very sensitive personage, or possibly he belongs to that genus of great men for whom no adulation is too coarse. In any other case his equanimity must be subjected to a sore trial on perusing his own biography. He will find himself in the predicament of Fouqué's hero in the enchanted castle, where every chamber was filled with likenesses of himself. Go where we will in the Count's biography, the Count's image meets us in every conceivable attitude except flying. We have Bismark the patriotic, scowling at a ragged democrat who is talking sedition to a sentry; Bismark the dutiful, communing with his King, a white waistcoat superimposed upon his loyal heart; Bismark the polite, the centre of a group of Conservative statesmen, a picture which somehow irresistibly recalls Landseer's "Alexander and Diogenes"; Bismark the martial, in the uniform of a lieutenant of cavalry, with spiked helmet complete. The letterpress is often of a piece with the illustration "This" (the state of politics at the time) "tempted the burning tear into Bismark's eyes, and his soul writhed in unutterable woe." Having made a speech, "his features appeared sharper than formerly, his countenance was pale, his white teeth, more pointed than before, protruded visibly." The work is also seasoned with anecdotes which no doubt appeared exquisite strokes of humour to the Prussian Conservatives, but which others might consider pieces of insolence, not to say brutality. Nor is there, so far as the writer's own part of it is concerned, a single redeeming feature in the book. Any one will, by its means, be able to discover what Count Bismark was doing at any particular period, and that is all that can be said for it. The really valuable part—and it is so valuable as to be indispensable to all who would know Count Bismark—consists of the numerous letters addressed by him to members of his family, which could not have been published without their consent. Besides the character of authenticity thus conferred on the publication, it becomes a repository of materials from which the Count's character may be estimated with more accuracy than from his speeches and State papers. He appears, on the whole, to much advantage as a kind, cordial, and affectionate man, estimable in his domestic relations. Some of his descriptions of travel are extremely graphic. Intellectually, he seems to be one of those persons who, but for the force of circumstances, might have passed through life without their eminence having been suspected. Two circumstances have made him what he is—the Revolution of 1848, which compelled him to think, and vastly expanded his intellectual horizon; and the embarrassed condition of his family, which obliged him to reside upon his estates, where he participated actively in local affairs, and mastered the practice of administration and the theory of representation on a small scale. On his entrance into public life he simply put into practice principles already familiar to him, and they proved to be the right ones. A purely military career would have destroyed the flexibility of his mind, a thorough diplomatic education would have impaired its force. In the former case he would never have accommodated himself to constitutional forms; in the latter he might have acquired a more polished address, but would no longer have been the one doer in a nation of talkers.

There is perhaps no sharper contrast in history than that between the despotic, unscrupulous, very prosaic, and very successful restorer of German unity, and the romantic, enthusiastic, and unfortunate Emperor * who vainly sought to revive the creed of Greece and restore the might of Rome. A perfectly impartial estimate of Julian the Apostate will perhaps never be arrived at. Gibbon and Neander both come very near the mark, but both are sensibly though slightly prejudiced, the one by his antagonism to Christianity, the other by his official relation to it. Dr. Mücke's excellent monograph is tinged by a more subtle influence—the admiration of a kindred spirit for Julian's generous temper and lofty aims. While professing, and evidently desirous of attaining, the strictest impartiality, he rarely holds the balance quite evenly. He perceives and exposes the visionary element in Julian's character, the inherent impracticability of his schemes, and the incidental faults of their execution; but the tenderness of his conclusions is hardly in keeping with the austerity of his premisses. It must be admitted that this is a fault difficult to avoid in dealing with a character like Julian's. Dr. Mucke defends his hero very successfully against the calumnies of ecclesiastical writers, and clearly establishes his innocence of the charge of persecution. He does not, however, entirely convince us that Julian's moderation was the result of settled principle. There seems something constrained about his ostentatious toleration; it strikes us as a concession to circumstances, and as always dogged by an arrière-pensée. Julian was no more capable than his contemporaries of rising to the philosophic idea of universal toleration. One remark of Dr. Mücke's is striking, and we think new; it is that Julian was misled by the turbulent feuds of the Christians into anticipating the break-up of the religion, whereas these were in fact a symptom of its exuberant vitality. We are ourselves continually hearing the downfall of England and the United States predicted on similar grounds, and with equal reason. The work is accompanied by a copious analysis of Julian's writings, and of all ancient sources of information respecting him. It is indeed an admirable volume, equally recommended by interest of subject, ability of treatment, generosity of spirit, and clearness of style.

St. Gregory of Tours † is in himself an interesting character, and his history of his own times is a most important work. It describes a period of anarchy and an almost total dissolution of social order; when, nevertheless, the foundations of modern France were established. Three national elements, the Celtic, the Roman, and the Teutonic, strove in violent agitation for more than two centuries, and the modern Frenchman is the result of the process. Gregory's narrative is simple, and no doubt trustworthy when it is not vitiated by his superstition. He has no insight into the causes or consequences of events, nor could such be expected from a writer of his age. Had he been a philosophical historian we might perhaps have learned from him how the Teutonic race, which impressed its character so powerfully in England, disappeared like rain upon the sands in France and Spain. As it is, his work suggests, and partially illustrates, a number of most important questions connected with the origin and institutions of the Romano-German Empire, and the framework of mediæval society in general. These are treated ably and perspicuously by Herr Loebell. If the arrangement of his book is sometimes difficult to follow, it must be remembered that he is treating of a singularly obscure and distracted period. Heinrich von Sybel has added a preface expressing his gratitude to his old and now deceased teacher, and some notes.

In a lucid and temperate essay C. Wittichen ‡ contends that the fourth Gospel is the work of the Apostle John, or at least that there is no good reason to dispute his authorship. He places the date of it between 70 and 80 A.D. He does not, however, regard the discourses which it contains as historical, but considers it as a polemical work, directed against the Christian Essenes

The work is significant as a symptom of the reaction towards more conservative views now taking place in German theology.

Dr. Kurtz's analysis of the Epistle to the Hebrews * is very close, and his commentary is pregnant with matter. The most interesting part of his work is the preliminary excursus, investigating the questions of date and authorship, and of the persons to whom the letter was addressed. He rather inclines to attribute it to Apollos, while quoting with approbation Origen's pithy summing up of the question sixteen hundred years since, "God knows."

Dr. Wuttke's work on the popular superstitions of Germany † contains an immense assemblage of particulars respecting the popular mythology of the country. In the writer's opinion all these superstitions are vestiges of the old heathenism, and he seems to take no account of the mass of new error engendered by the credulity of the middle ages. It is undoubtedly quite true that much modern superstition is directly traceable to the age of Thor and Woden, and that much which at first sight wears a Christian appearance is in reality but the old religion in masquerade. It will probably be found that the great factors of superstition—fear and ignorance—have in all ages, and under all conditions, given rise to ideas nearly similar. In general, the beliefs and practices described by Dr. Wuttke are of a prosaic and abject character; but some are founded upon the correct observation or intuitive perception of natural laws, and might have passed for beautiful and appropriate symbols had they never been designed for anything more.

Robert von Mohl ‡ combines the theoretical attainments of a professor of law with the practical experience of an administrator and diplomatist. The third volume of his collected essays contains two of great importance—one on the problems connected with the employment of labour, the other on popular education in its relation to the claims of the Church. He is not an original thinker, but possesses great powers of effective statement in combination with robust common sense.

An anonymous work on German schools and universities § is written from a professorial point of view. It is a somewhat eccentric composition, and we should hardly conclude that the author figured among the most eminent members of his profession, but it has hints and observations well worth attention. The writer is naturally much impressed by the pecuniary drawbacks of his condition. Few professors, he says, unless they remain single, can live in comfort until the age of forty or fifty. They consequently lecture to more pupils than they can instruct, as they cannot dispense with the fees. Being unable to receive their pupils at home, they see little of them, and exercise little moral influence over them. These defects are evidently obviated in England by the richness of our educational endowments, and by our collegiate system. The moral is that we must not, in introducing reforms, lightly sacrifice what others would give much to acquire.

Kopp's "Contributions to the History of Chemistry" ‖ might have been a very interesting work, being, so far as it has proceeded, concerned with the romantic childhood of the science, when chemistry was a form of alchemy, with an affinity to magic. Except for the learned, the book is rendered comparatively uninviting by the author's incapacity for conveying the results of his researches in an abbreviated form. He not only investigates literary questions with the minute accuracy demanded by chemical problems, but insists on exhibiting every stage of the process in detail. The inevitable result is tedium. It is also mortifying to find that so many of the questions raised admit of no satisfactory answer. The derivation of the word "chemistry," for instance, remains as obscure after Herr Klopp's researches as before. Perhaps this dim twilight of uncertainty is one of the charms of the subject. There is a singular fascination about it, much the same as the ancient alchemists may be supposed to have found in the perpetual promise and everlasting disappointment of their search for the philosopher's stone.

The second part of Teichmuller's commentaries on Aristotle ¶ is devoted to the æsthetic theories of the philosopher. It is a clear, precise, and not unduly abstruse investigation of the subject.

Helbig's work on the mural paintings of Herculaneum and Pompeii  is a very valuable performance. It principally consists of a complete catalogue, with full but not prolix descriptions of all these works, including those which are no longer extant, and are only known from the accounts written at the time of their discovery. An interesting essay by Otto Donner is prefixed, treating of these paintings from the technical point of view; and a folio atlas is annexed, giving examples in outline of some of the most remarkable among them.

Few writers can be better qualified to undertake the history of Italian art than Ernst Förster *, and the first volume of his work justifies the expectations naturally formed of it. It represents the accumulations of long years of researches, in the course of which the author has visited nearly every part of Italy, and personally inspected all accessible monuments. It may be regarded as in a measure the commentary and illustration of his well-known "Italien." The first volume, while perhaps the most important part of the work in the eyes of students like the author himself, as dealing with the most obscure portion of the subject, and representing the largest amount of original research and investigation, presents rather an archæological than an artistic aspect to the general reader. It begins with a short but masterly sketch of art in the Roman period; early Christian art is next discussed; the writer then dwells with visible partiality on the splendid barbarism of Ravenna and the Byzantine school, and so on to the great cathedrals of Venice, Pisa, and Monreale, where the work is suspended for the present. Its contents will probably be new to Herr Förster's readers, except to a peculiar and very limited class of students.

"Studies in German Art," by Herman Riegel †, are mostly reprinted from periodicals. They are of a somewhat slight character, but, being principally criticisms on recent works, afford valuable information on the character and tendencies of contemporary art in Germany. The fact that the most important works of the German school are frescoes, which can only be seen on the spot where they are painted, places the artists at a great disadvantage in comparison with those of other countries, so far as the popularity of their works is concerned. Herr Riegel's descriptions will go some way towards supplying this defect. His account of the unfortunate Alfred Rethel's works at Aix-la-Chapelle is peculiarly interesting.

Madame Lewald ‡ is a lively writer, and there are many pleasant pages in her narrative of her residence at Geneva. At the same time there is far too much bookmaking, too much of trivial incident, and in particular too much of the lady's own observations on political, theological, and such-like matters. These would have informed us, if we had not known it already, that it is perfectly possible for a very strong Liberal to be as conceited and intolerant as the most resolute adherent to the traditions of the past. The most interesting feature of the book is its graphic portraiture of the democratic leaders to whom Geneva affords a rallying-place, such as Quinet and Vogt. It is wrong to smile at the misfortunes of patriotism, but Madame Lewald's gallery of heroes forcibly recalls the six kings in Candide, who came to pass the carnival at Venice. Garibaldi, too, was brought thither during our authoress's stay, by the Peace Congress, which the promoters judiciously assembled under the presidency of the most eminent soldier they could find. Madame Lewald has also some amusing, though rather ill-natured, pages at the expense of the foreign residents at the boarding-houses, especially the English, who are no doubt frequently very remarkable persons.

Another work on Swiss travel § will possess great attraction for Alpine tourists. It is a history of all the most memorable ascents of the chief peaks in Switzerland, drawn up by one who may say, quorum pars magna fui. It is prefaced by a brief but luminous essay on the physical geography of the country. The first part, which is all that is hitherto published, contains the history of the ascents made in the Bernese Alps.

Adolf Wilbrandt ‖ is a novelist of the school of Paul Heyse, and possesses much of the finished elegance of his model. There is real pathos in the first of his three novelettes, which turns on a question of divorce, and considerable descriptive force in the second; but his powers are perhaps displayed to most advantage in the third, which is of a humorous character. A retired merchant, returned from some years' residence in South America, meditates espousing an old acquaintance, a celebrated beauty in her day, but thoroughly heartless, selfish, and disagreeable. The diversion of his affections to her unprepossessing but amiable sister forms the subject of a pretty and really dramatic story.

A. F. von Schack ¶, the translator of Ferdusi, is in a manner the representative of Rückert and Platen in the modern German Parnassus. Without rivalling either of these great writers, he unites to a certain extent the characteristics of both, possessing much of the rich diction, melody, and facility of the former, and recalling the latter by his consummate polish and attention to artistic form. His little volume of six narrative poems will sustain his reputation. The most remarkable is perhaps the attempt in "Lais" to recount a classical story in the trochaic measure of the Servians, selected by Dean Alford for his version of the Odyssey. In "Rosa" he seems to have had English models before him, both metre and manner closely recalling "Christabel" and "Rosalind and Helen." "The Rainbow Prince," a fairy legend in octaves, greatly resembles Keats's unfinished poem, "The Cap and Bells." Some stanzas of this little poem display a felicitous vein of humour, with which the tragic conclusion seems hardly in keeping.

There is great variety in the poems of Julius Grosse *, and also considerable metrical skill and power of diction, with every indication of a wide range of culture. The writer lacks native power to balance his impressionability and facility of reception; he reproduces much, and produces little. His volume may be read with pleasure, but nothing in it is likely to be remembered for very long.

The nine tales of Siddhi Kûr, and the history of "Ardschi-Bordschi Khan" (Bhoja Raja), published in the Mongolian text, with notes and a translation by Bernhard Jülg †, are originally from the Sanskrit. The Mongols acquired them along with the Buddhist religion which they learned from the Indian missionaries. There is, however, nothing Buddhist in the stories and nothing distinctively Mongolian, and though no doubt they are æsthetically all the better on this account, their ethnological significance is but trifling.

England, which has received so many presents from Germany in the shape of fairy tales, now makes some return by a translation of "Lewis Carroll's" delightful Alice in Wonderland ‡, admirably executed by Miss Antonie Zimmermann. The original illustrations are reproduced; they could not be improved. The translator has judiciously varied her original by substituting parodies of popular German rhymes for the pieces which would be unintelligible to German children.

THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

THE House of Commons has made rapid progress with the Irish Church Bill. The disestablishing clauses have been passed, and so much of the disendowing clauses as deals with the personal interests of members of the Established Church has also been settled. The question whether the policy of the Government in regard to disestablishment should or should not be adopted was fairly raised by Mr. DISRAELI'S amendment, and decisively settled by its rejection. This amendment did not contravene the principle of the Bill. It accepted disestablishment, but virtually enacted that the disestablished Church should be bound for ever by the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England. This was a point that deserved careful discussion, and Mr. DISRAELI injured his cause by diverting the attention of his hearers to extreme theories as to the Royal Supremacy, and by the curious paradox that the Romish Church is an established Church in Ireland. Very various views may be held as to the meaning of the Royal Supremacy, this variety being mainly caused by what makes so many things obscure in England—namely, that the language of the law, being traditional and conventional, does not harmonize with the facts. But, among this variety of views, Mr. DISRAELI certainly chose the one least likely to be acceptable to a modern House of Commons when he broached the theory that the QUEEN personally presided over the Church, and kept its doctrines and discipline straight. It is appalling to think that this duty—which, if the QUEEN had to discharge it, she would probably discharge as well as it could be discharged—must have been fulfilled in former days by GEORGE II. and GEORGE IV. What Mr. DISRAELI meant by saying that the Romish Church is established in Ireland was probably that, whereas it is one of the most conspicuous advantages of an Established Church that it abides by a system of doctrine and discipline fixed by an authority outside of the sphere of the actual clergy who labour in it, this advantage is possessed by the Romish clergy in Ireland. But, if his proposition is reduced down to this, it comes to little, and had no weight to counterbalance the error of confusing his enemies and friends alike by an apparently useless paradox. It would have been far better if he had contented himself with arguing that, although the Church was to be disestablished, yet it was for its good that Parliament should attach to it, from the outset of its existence as a disestablished community, the character of an inseparable unity with the Church of England. There are many persons who would be inclined to think that this would not be only advantageous to the Irish Church, but that it would be extremely unfair towards private persons who have given money to it, were it permitted that it should depart, if it pleased, from the standard of the Church of England in doctrine and discipline. As Dr. BALL truly said, this is a matter with which the Irish Catholics and Presbyterians can have nothing to do. If any body or any set of persons could be injured by the adoption of Mr. DISRAELI'S amendment, it must be the exclusively Protestant Episcopal Church and its adherents; and if the Irish Church wished to be under this bondage, why should it not be? Mr. GLADSTONE answered by denying that there was any general wish of the kind among the members of the Irish Church. But even if there were, there would be great difficulty in enacting that the Irish Church should be bound by the doctrines and discipline of the English Church; for the English Church may in process of time vary its doctrines and discipline, and the State would be much embarrassed to decide beforehand whether it should be optional or obligatory on the Irish Church to accept these variations. In the colonies the difficulty has been got over in a rough and ready way by assuming that the Church of England has no vital power in itself sufficient to enable it to vary its standards. But statesmen nearer home cannot pretend to believe this, and they therefore escape the difficulty of dealing in Parliament with an unknown ecclesiastical future by remitting it to the Irish Church to decide how intimate shall be hereafter the relations between it and the Church of England. That there is nothing in the Bill to prevent them from being very intimate is certain, and the Government expressly declared on Monday night that it was quite open to the Crown to continue to appoint the Irish Bishops, if this were on all hands recognised as desirable. The Irish Church may, in fact, although disestablished, enjoy, if it pleases, the advantage of being in close alliance with an Established Church; and if it is not wise enough to profit by the opportunity, it will have no one but itself to blame.

The general treatment of disendowment was naturally preceded by the discussion and decision of the two preliminary questions, whether the interests of persons, as opposed to the interests of the body to which those persons belong, shall be recognised as the subject-matter of compensation, and whether compensation should be given for what is termed the spes successionis. The scheme of the Government is to hand over the Church buildings to the new ecclesiastical body, but with this one exception, necessarily made in order to spare a great shock to religious feelings, everything is to be taken from the Irish Church except what some individual has a claim to. A totally different theory pervades the minds of a large portion of the House of Commons on both the Government and the Opposition side. This theory is that the money taken away from the Irish Church is to be regarded as taken away from the body, not from individuals; and that the money given back is also to be regarded as given back to the body, not to individuals. Assuming that the Irish Church is to be stripped of a certain amount of its property, of how much is it to be stripped? It is incontestable that it was from this side that Mr. GLADSTONE first approached the great question of disendowment, for he asserted that the Irish Church would retain three-fifths of its property. He looked on the Church as losing so much and keeping so much. Mr. DISRAELI'S Amendments, so far as they touch on disendowment, all repose on the same theory. Take away the property of the Irish Church, Mr. DISRAELI says, in effect, as you are so mad for disendowment, but then give it all, and a little more than all, back again. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER seizes on another side of the same theory. He is for taking away the property of the Church in places where the Church gets on badly, and not taking away its property in places where it gets on well. Mr. HARCOURT, again, comes to the same result in a different way. He compares, for example, the class of curates with the class of monthly nurses, and urges that the curates are equally meritorious, and that a handsome amount of money might be left in the hands of the Irish Church to make curates happy. The Irish Catholic members, on their side, say that enough concessions have been made to the Protestant Church; that enough has been left it of the national property; and that the Catholics would resent a larger slice being handed over. The Government measure proceeds on a totally different principle. It is a scheme for total disendowment. It takes everything from the body. It makes no presents or bequests to individuals. It does not aim at generosity, but at the sort of justice that is administered by actuaries. The State takes away the whole property of the body, but in taking it away, while it does not wish to benefit it, it takes care not to hurt individuals. Thus disendowment, coupled with compensation to individuals, calculated on such a basis as surveyors or actuaries would adopt, is the key to the Government proposal. The unflinching majority which supports everything Mr. GLADSTONE suggests has now ratified this proposal. The only concession Mr. GLADSTONE has made is, that curates who are not permanent curates shall have a slightly larger compensation than he proposed. A curate who is not a permanent curate, and who yet has served more than eight years, is to be allowed to get more than 200*l.*, which was the limit originally fixed; and if there is so strange and exceptional a being as a curate who has served twenty-four years without being, in the opinion of the Commissioners, a permanent curate, he will get as much as 600*l.* There is nothing at all at variance with the rigid principles of the Bill in this. There is nothing in the least generous towards curates in this. A man entitled to receive compensation at all as a curate, and who has served for twenty-four years without getting to be a permanent curate, gets little when he receives 600*l.* in a lump sum; for if he could but have managed to have been classed as a permanent curate, he would have had an annuity of a hundred a year.

The House of Commons has allowed the Government proposal to be carried out with the utmost consistency. A long discussion, for example, took place on the question whether, in calculating the amount to be given to an incumbent, the salary of the curate should be deducted. If the only question to ask is what is the net income of the incumbent, there can be no difficulty in saying that this salary ought to be deducted. The incumbent should most certainly deduct it when making his return for income-tax. He has so much a year minus so much, and the State only offers to secure him in the enjoyment of that which he really has to spend. All the difficulties suggested about organists, vergers, choirmen, and so forth, were easily settled in the same way. But it was not so easy to settle whether the spes successionis should be a ground for compensation. Ought a curate to be compensated for losing the chance of getting a living? ought a poor incumbent to lose his chance of getting a better living? ought an incumbent to lose his chance of being made a bishop? That there ought to be no notice taken of the spes successionis in any case, because it is impossible to take notice of it in all, is not evident. No one would seriously think of proposing to compensate incumbents for losing their chance of being rich bishops, because this chance does not enter into any pecuniary calculations. A living of five hundred a year has no extra value that can be appreciated because it may possibly lead to a bishopric. The prospect of a poor incumbent becoming a rich incumbent is also too remote to have a pecuniary value. The vast majority of Irish livings are in the gift of the Bishops. They appoint on public grounds such persons as they think decent ministers to the small livings, and naturally give the better ones to their relatives and friends. A poor incumbent has therefore the chance that some day the Bishop may know him and get fond of him; but this is not a chance that can be put into the form of money. But the curates have something much more definite in the way of a spes successionis. They know that in all probability they will get at least one of those little livings which the Bishops do not want for the members of their own circle. A curate with a hundred a year has every reason to suppose that he will, sooner or later, get a living of at least two hundred a year. An annuity of a hundred a year does not represent the money value of his office. His remoter hopes may be left out of calculation. He may be a rich incumbent, he may be a bishop; but, unless he is one of those odd geniuses who can go on serving for twenty-four years without ever becoming a permanent curate, he must some day be a poor incumbent. A curate cannot turn to any other occupation than that of being a clergyman, and a curate whose only prospect is that of being for the rest of his life in receipt of a curate's salary seems to suffer an injury when that modest increase of income which the prospect of a poor living gave is cut away from him. But then is it certain that this humble hope is really lost to him? Will the curate with a hundred a year have no chance of making hereafter two hundred a year by his profession? We should be very sorry to think so. As existing incumbents die off, their places will, it must be supposed, be filled by persons whom the new ecclesiastical body will appoint. Is it to be supposed that the rich Irish Episcopalians, the proprietors of six-sevenths of the soil of the country, will be so mean and niggardly as not to give their ministers who have attained middle age, and hold responsible positions, a couple of hundred a year? This seems incredible; for shame would make them do thus much, even if right feeling or sectarian jealousies did not prompt them to do much more. The Irish curates have lost the remote chance of getting good preferments, but they have not, we trust, lost the reasonable certainty of getting from their profession such a pittance as the incumbency of the smaller sort of Irish livings would have given them.

GERMANY.

THE late motion in the North German Parliament was directed to the object of surrounding the Chancellor of the Federation with a body of colleagues holding office by a tenure similar to his own. Count BISMARK himself is nominally responsible to the Federal Parliament, though his power depends on many other conditions, and more especially on his universally acknowledged superiority to any possible rival. Notwithstanding any adverse vote he would retain the confidence of the KING, the post of Prime Minister, and probably the control of the Federal Council. Although he has been defeated by a small majority, his speech against the measure will probably modify the opinion of many of his opponents. The vote of the Parliament will have no immediate operation, and it is doubtful whether Mr. TWESTEN and Count MUNSTER would be either willing or able to induce the Parliament to coerce the Government by a refusal of the supplies. English prejudices are naturally enlisted in favour of the most distinctive element of the Constitution which has served as a model to Europe; but in England there is neither a confederacy to keep together, nor are there kindred and external communities to be gradually assimilated. The establishment of a responsible Ministry has never yet been attempted in the United States, nor can the system be introduced as long as the several States retain any portion of independence. The Senate, resembling in this respect the Federal Council of North Germany, still represents the equality and the qualified sovereignty of the States; and if the Cabinet were made responsible to the House of Representatives, the more respectable and more powerful branch of Congress would be at once deprived of its character and its principal functions. A double responsibility to two Parliamentary bodies is found to be as impracticable as a double standard of monetary value, even where, as in England, it nominally exists. The English Ministry stands or falls by the voice of the House of Commons; and the American Senate, by assenting to the adoption of the English practice, would reduce itself to the secondary rank of a House of Lords. The establishment of a Parliamentary Cabinet would practically make the Chancellor for the first time responsible, although the motion related only to his possible colleagues. The Federal Council, which in some degree corresponds to the American Senate, exercises, according to Count BISMARK's statement, considerable power through its various Committees, but it would be useless for a Minister who was compelled to obey the decisions of the Parliament to conduct semi-diplomatic negotiations with the allied Governments. It may be added that Count BISMARK's personal position is virtually incompatible with a constitutional responsibility which involves a liability to be driven from office. Whatever may be the distribution of Parliamentary votes on isolated questions, the Chancellor of the Federation is the only statesman who commands the confidence of Prussia and of Germany. Notwithstanding the conflict between the parties which respectively hold liberty or unity to be more urgently required, no German Liberal would willingly renounce the hope of enlarging the bounds of the present Confederation. The resolute subtlety of the Minister is regarded as the best security against foreign aggression or interference; and if he were driven from office the bonds which unite the States of the Northern Confederacy would probably be relaxed. The leaders of the majority were eager to disclaim the alleged purpose of withdrawing the confidence of the Parliament from Count BISMARK, and they must be fully aware that his services can only be retained on his own terms. The apparent candour and openness of his speech will perhaps have conciliated his domestic adversaries, as it will certainly furnish fresh grounds of complaint to the foreign enemies of German unity. A more cautious politician would perhaps have evaded the issue of theoretical responsibility. Count BISMARK took the opportunity of avowing his impatience of the presence in the Cabinet of independent colleagues. According to his opinion, there ought to be an absolute Minister surrounded by a body of clerks, whom he would not have the trouble of talking over into acquiescence in his policy. The abolition of Cabinet Councils is not, perhaps, inseparable from the rejection of Parliamentary responsibility; but, in Germany as in France, the joint liability of the Ministers is as distasteful to the Government as their subordination to the Parliament. It would have been safer to maintain the proposition that, in the peculiar circumstances of Germany, large discretion must be entrusted to the head of the Government. It would not be easy to answer the Minister's argument against a system which would tend to efface the distinctions among the various States.

Count BISMARK passed over in contemptuous silence the chronic protests of French journalists against the inclusion of Southern Germany in the Federation. His chief objection to Mr. TWESTEN's motion was that it would tend, as he said, to deepen the Main as a frontier. In other words, it would ing, and were wont to think of them almost as a part of na[illegible] firmly rooted as the very hills. So they patched and pr[illegible] them up, and endured as inevitable the nuisances at which [illegible] nevertheless continually grumbled. Our own times, even the last few years, have witnessed a change in the spirit of the nation. Abuses and obstructions are no longer tolerated merely because they exist and were once useful. The discontent which for ages had muttered underground, shaking down only here and there the most decayed part of an institution, has now burst forth as a flood of inquiry and free thought, sweeping over everything, and sweeping away everything that is not strong enough to withstand its onset. Church-rates are gone, the Irish Church is going, and at length even the colossal structure of legal abuses seems tottering to its fall.

Long has the Law remained hidden in the inaccessible recesses of two thousand volumes. Long have we, alone among nations, dispensed two discordant systems of justice which we are pleased to designate as Law and Equity respectively, neither system capable of giving complete redress to suitors, and neither understood by the practitioners of the other. Long has an incredibly complicated hierarchy of Courts, each jealous of the others, and each exercising a jurisdiction gained by fortuitous encroachment upon the rest, endeavoured to administer these two discordant systems by means of half a dozen distinct modes of procedure; and, what is most extraordinary of all, long were these monstrous arrangements extolled as the perfection of human reason. The complication was far too great for the outside world to be capable of judging whether it were remediable or not; so that the Law itself, and not its abuses, became a synonym for all that is incomprehensible, and especially for all that is most alien to justice. The lawyers themselves have, however, for several generations felt uneasy about the state of their science, but it is not surprising that the amendments hitherto introduced into it by a proverbially conservative profession exhibit little boldness of treatment. To cure the intricacy of the sources of the law, they consolidated here and there a set of statutes; to bridge over the chasm between Law and Equity, they gave one or two little equitable powers to the Courts of Law, while they offered the unknown jury process to the Courts of Equity. To cure the scandal and waste of energy arising from rivalry of Courts and discrepancy of procedure, they did next to nothing.

The Commissions which have been appointed from time to time have indeed effected several useful modifications of detail, and, what is still better, have accustomed the professional mind to the conception of the possibility of some amount of legal change; but none of them till recently have ventured to take a really wide view of a question, or to recommend reconstruction rather than repair in cases where reconstruction is obviously called for. At length, however, the oracles have begun to speak with a less uncertain sound. Thanks to Lord Westbury, there is a chance of the statutes being some day put forth in a satisfactory shape. A Royal Commission which, after mature deliberation, actually reported in favour of an attempt to form a digest of the sources of the law, is with still greater deliberation superintending the preparation of specimen portions of such a digest; and now another Commission has just issued a first Report, dealing with the whole system of the administration of justice, and incidentally with the cardinal question of the fusion of Law and Equity.

This Report of the Judicature Commission is, in truth, a masterly performance. It is not expressed in the conventional language common in such documents. It exhibits little of that studied ambiguity of phrase which is the useful cloak for irreconcileable differences of opinion, or of that half-statement of unpleasant truths which is the habitual resource of third-rate minds. Its recommendations, except with reference to some comparatively unimportant points, are unanimous, and come with all the weight due to the opinions of a body of men selected, without regard to party, merely as being the fittest that could be found to deal with the questions committed to them.

Our Courts are in the highest degree interesting as historical monuments, but they are on that very account most cumbrous machines for the despatch of business. Putting out of consideration the criminal Courts and the civil Courts of inferior jurisdiction, we have, first of all, the three superior Courts of Common Law. Originally chambers or divisions of the great King's Court, assigned for the superintendence of specific matters, each has gathered to itself in the course of ages the portions of jurisdiction which were lacking to it, till at present, with separate histories, the three Courts have almost precisely the same functions. While these tribunals have continued to administer the old law of England (which is also dispensed by their judges on circuit, sitting as Commissioners of nisi prius), the Chancellors, century after century, have built up an entirely different system of law, in the administration of which, in the first instance, they are assisted by the Vice-Chancellors and the Master of the Rolls. By the side of these Courts, but quite independently of them, has grown up a Court of Admiralty, and Courts of Probate and Divorce have been created of late years in substitution for abolished ecclesiastical tribunals. In each species of Courts the mode of procedure is radically different. An appeal from any one of the Common Law Courts lies to the judges of the other two assembled in the Exchequer Chamber. From the Chancery judges of the first instance the appeal is to the Lord Chancellor and his newly-created colleagues the Lords Justices, or to the Chancellor or Justices separately. In divorce cases there is an appeal to "the full Court." Then there is a further appeal from the Exchequer Chamber, from the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and from the "full Court" of Divorce, to the House of Lords, while Admiralty appeals go straight to the Privy Council, and Probate appeals straight to the House of Lords.

Even from so summary a statement as this, it will at once be obvious that our judicial system is curiously defective in organization. It will be remarked that the Common Law Courts, while in almost every point similar to one another, yet preserve a technically independent existence; that these Courts administer a different set of rules, with reference often to the same subject-matter, from those administered by Courts of Equity; that the forms of procedure are perplexingly various; that from most of the Courts there is a double appeal; that the appellate tribunals are ill-contrived; and that there are two Courts of Appeal in the last resort. It will of course be readily imagined that such a state of things results in great waste of power, heavy arrears of business, and a not always satisfactory decision of litigated questions. It was high time that attention should be called to the subject, and Sir Roundell Palmer accordingly, in February 1867, addressed the House of Commons upon our judicial system as a whole; pointing out its faults, advocating the consolidation of the three Courts of Common Law, and suggesting the formation of one Supreme Court of Appeal, for Equity and Common Law alike, upon the model of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In September of the same year, the Judicature Commission was appointed. It now comprises Lord Cairns, who is the chairman, the present Lord Chancellor, Sir W. Erle, Sir R. Palmer, six Judges, the present law officers of the Crown, several other members of the Government, and several eminent barristers and solicitors. These distinguished persons, after deliberating for a year and a half, have agreed upon a Report, which we hope to consider more in detail hereafter, but of which the main features are as follows. The Commissioners were instructed to inquire into "the operation and effect of the present constitution" of all the superior Courts, "and of the Courts of Error and of Appeal from all the said several Courts"; into the "operation and effect of the present separation and division of jurisdictions between the said several Courts"; into the arrangements for holding sittings and assizes; into the division of the legal year, &c., with a view to ascertaining whether any and what changes and improvements might be made "either by uniting or consolidating the said Courts or any of them, or by extending or altering the several jurisdictions," or by altering the number of judges, or "the mode in which the business or sittings of the said Courts or assizes is now distributed"; and further, to inquire into the laws relating to juries. The Report commences with a review of the inconvenient results of "the ancient division of the Courts into Courts of Common Law and the Court of Chancery," and the Commissioners then proceed to record their opinion "that the first step towards meeting and surmounting the evils complained of will be the consolidation of all the superior Courts of Law and Equity, together with the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty, into one Court, to be called 'Her Majesty's Supreme Court,' in which Court shall be vested all the jurisdiction which is now exercisable by each and all the Courts so consolidated." The Supreme Court is to be subdivided into chambers, which may for the present retain the old names of "Chancery," "Queen's Bench," and so forth, but each of which is to possess all the powers of the undivided Court. The procedure in all of the chambers is to be uniform. Every suit is to commence by a "writ of summons"; and the pleadings, which are to be more succinct than those now employed in Equity, and less technical than those which prevail at Common Law, are to be described by the terms "declaration," "answer," and "reply." Trials are to be either by a Judge, by a Jury, or by an "Official Referee." A new Court of Appeal is to be constituted, composed of the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Justices, the Master of the Rolls, three other permanent Judges, and three to be annually appointed by the Crown from the Judges of the Supreme Court. The relations of this new Appellate Court to the House of Lords and to the Privy Council are, as might have been expected, not very clearly defined. The following paragraph may, however, give some indication of the views of the Commissioners upon this point:—"It may hereafter deserve consideration, after experience of the working of the Court thus constituted, whether its decisions may not be made final, unless leave to appeal from them be given, either by the Court itself or by the House of Lords. In the meantime, we recommend that there should be a right of appeal to the House of Lords." A little verbal criticism seems called for by the terminology of the Report. A "Supreme Court," from which there is nevertheless an appeal, is scarcely an accurate expression. Perhaps it is on this account that the Commissioners, in one passage, speak of the Court of Appeal as "a part of the Supreme Court," which is surely another confusion of language. One would suppose that the Court of Appeal should alone be known as the Supreme Court, and that some other name, such as "the High Court," should be discovered for the superior Court of the first instance.

The Report also discusses at some length "the sittings of the Courts" and "Circuits," recommending that the latter should be thoroughly re-divided, and that all the circuit business of the Home Counties should be brought to London. It also contains suggestions for altering the mode of summoning and the qualification of jurors. But these are matters of very secondary importance compared with the proposal for consolidating all existing Courts of the first instance into one new Court, with a new and uniform procedure, where the distinction between Law and Equity would surely, if slowly, be got rid of, and for erecting a new and really strong Court of Appeal, intended to supersede forthwith all existing intermediate appellate tribunals, and destined, one can hardly doubt, to supplant ere long by its superior repute both the House of Lords and the Privy Council.

These suggestions are indeed bold, but they are not made rashly, or by men predisposed to welcome change for its own sake. The present state of things is on the face of it absurd, but laymen have supposed that there must be some good, though to them unintelligible, reason for its continuance. They have now been undeceived on the highest authority. Chancellors and Judges state deliberately that justice cannot be effectively done in the existing Courts, and unanimously propose a sweeping reform which at once approves itself to unlearned common sense. The sages of the law have done their part; it remains for legislators to do theirs, with the support, it may be hoped, of every one who is interested in the due administration of justice, and in the symmetry of our great national institutions.

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

THE debate on the reappearance of the notorious Bill for legalizing Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister is remarkable, not only for the majority by which the second reading was carried, but for Mr. Bright's dictatorial, we had nearly said brutal, speech. Mr. Common-Serjeant Chambers—the gentleman was recently saluted in the House of Commons as an uncommon Serjeant—thought fit to introduce the matter by going over the well-worn ground of the prohibitions in Leviticus, and, in addition to a gross misstatement of Bishop Jewell's sentiments on the subject, he incidentally illustrated his utter inability to understand the sense in which the positive precepts and the prohibitions of the Levitical law have been adopted by Christianity. The final line adopted by the innovators is this:—The Jewish law positively sanctions this particular union; that law is binding on us Christians; the Anglican table of prohibited degrees is quite right in its principle, only in this particular case it is wrong in applying that principle. We only propose to strengthen the binding force of the Levitical prohibitions by removing from the list of Christian prohibitions a union which was sanctioned by the Jewish law. So the advocates for a change in the English marriage law argue. If, then, we are to accept this particular union because it is sanctioned by the Jewish law, it becomes of some interest to know what we are committed to by this revival of Judaism. The Jewish law did not prohibit polygamy; the Jewish law of the levirate, under penalty of ignominy, compelled a man to raise up seed to his deceased brother by taking his widow to wife; and, as we read in the very remarkable narrative of Amnon and Tamar, it seems that a marriage between a brother and sister, probably of the half blood, was nothing impossible in Jewish practice, even in the family of David himself. We think that "the ecclesiastical rubbish" of the innovators, and their arguments founded on the Levitical law or Jewish practice, especially as expounded by Rabbinical doctors, prove rather too much. And, though it would be the very last aspect of the matter which we should have selected for argument, we must say that the Scriptural argument in favour of the relaxation of the prohibition is thoroughly Jewish, and nothing but Jewish. The divines on whom Mr. Chambers and his friends rely have not the slightest notion of the position which Christianity has adopted towards the Jewish law and Jewish legislation. Whether Christianity is right or not in taking this line, it is not for us in this place to say. But it is for us to know what that line is, which is a mere matter of history. Judaism treated the wife much as a chattel; the Gospel proclaimed an older and better law than that of Judaism—that is, the absolute identity of man and wife—the oneness of the two fleshes. By this principle—and in the vast and vague theological disquisitions in which the House of Commons indulged, it was never referred to, though it is the very root and centre of the Christian doctrine—the blood relations of husband and wife respectively become the relations of each other; the wife's brothers and sisters are, by this affinity, the husband's brothers and sisters. Therefore, in marrying his wife's sister, a man marries his own sister. This is neither sentiment nor ecclesiastical rubbish, but the undeniable conclusion which, without exception, the Christian world has inferred from the Christian idea of marriage. Whether it is to simple ignorance, or to the impudence which traffics on popular ignorance, that we are to attribute the fallacy, we decline to pronounce. But when the Marriage Law Reform Association proves with otiose impertinence that a wife's sister is a stranger in blood to her brother-in-law, either that august but anonymous body does not know the difference between consanguinity or affinity, or it is ignorant that there is such a thing as affinity. When we are so triumphantly assured that there is no natural and material consanguinity between a man and his sister-in-law, we ask in all amazement whether anybody out of Bedlam ever thought there was.

But it is not on these grounds that the question ought to be discussed in the House of Commons. As a matter of fact certain marriages are prohibited; with this prohibition have grown up in our social state and domestic manners. It is a simple fact that, the family life of England, sisters-in-law are, for all practical purposes, sisters, even though this intimate union is founded on the spiritual character of the marriage tie adopted by the Gospel. Why should we change this state of things? Because Dr. Miller says "that the parting request of many a dying wife was, that the man should marry her sister." Dr. Miller is, we have no doubt, a very accurate person, but he avoids statistics. We should like to know something of these many dying wives, and these very curious nuncupatory bequests of a husband. As far as our experience goes, many dying wives are not in the habit of recommending their husbands and sisters to break the law; and a second, and what the law of England rudely calls a bastard, family may have attractions in the eyes of Dr. Miller's acquaintance which such matters do not present to the ordinary run of Englishwomen. But if we are to be guided by Dr. Miller's death-bed experiences, let us contrast them with the experiences of life which we get from America, where these unions have recently been permitted. Lord Hatherley quotes an American authority, who says that since these marriages "have been deemed not improper, and even desirable, there has grown up in families a perceptible and painful constraint, the children learning to look with apprehension on their mothers' sisters, and the wives becoming jealous of their influence with their husbands. . . I know," this gentleman adds, "a wife whose health was gradually declining, and in her house was a young and attractive sister . . . as the wife grew weaker, the husband's attentions to this sister increased, and for the few last weeks of her life she was absorbed with the engrossing fear of what she foresaw would, as it did, take place. It made her miserable to the very hour of death." It may be very well in the House of Commons to laugh at the notion of prohibiting sisters-in-law. But, if we examine the facts of middle-class and professional life, we shall often find the home secured, if not grounded, upon the presence of a sister-in-law. The bread-winner is absent all day at his business in office or shop; the wife has her sister an inmate in the house. Deprive her of this sheet anchor of daily life, and she is driven into other associations. An absent husband knows that he is safe enough in all his domestic relations if his wife has her sister at home; but a wife without a female relation at home is exposed to many dangers. Much of our domestic purity which we often talk about, and of which we seldom examine and trace the sources, is to be attributed to the institution of sisters-in-law. And with a change in the law sisters-in-law will become extinct.

Mr. Bright, to be sure, says that he never heard that in the New England States the position of sisters-in-law had been altered by the relaxation of the restriction. Well, we have given proof that this is the fact; and, moreover, he might have heard of it, as we did, eight or nine years ago, when this testimony to the state of things in America was first published by the present Lord Chancellor. And this brings us to say a word on Mr. Bright's speech, which we must characterize as the most insolent and irritating which even he has ever delivered in Parliament. Mr. Bright has never heard of an argument against the relaxation of the law such as an honest and learned lawyer would offer to a learned judge. Possibly this may be true. It is not for us to gauge or to estimate the amount of Mr. Bright's ignorance or knowledge. We have for ourselves not yet got to the conclusion that the whole cycle of human knowledge is exactly conterminous with Mr. Bright's knowledge. Very likely he never heard of any legal argument worth anything against Mr. Chambers's Bill. Mr. Bright may never have heard of such an argument, as he has never heard of a great many other things which still, nevertheless, in spite of Mr. Bright's ignorance of them, do contrive to exist. Now it is a matter of fact—Mr. Bright being ignorant of the fact or not—that the present Lord Chancellor has published a very long and elaborate argument against the relaxation. So, unless we very much forget ourselves, has Sir Roundell Palmer. Lord Campbell's speech against the Bill in the House of Lords has been published. Many eminent retired Judges, as well as Lord Campbell, are or have been members of the Marriage Law Defence Association. There are, therefore, lawyers who do not in this, as perhaps they do not in many other matters, follow the learned Common Serjeant; but Mr. Bright never heard of their opinions, or, having heard of them, chooses to put them aside with contemptuous disdain.

The worst aspect of the matter is that it seems now to be made a mere party question; and we suppose that, under Mr. Bright's agitation, the Wife's Sister question will be made a shibboleth of Liberalism. Such ought not to be the case. In other days Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Sheil were among the foremost opponents of any change. Among members of the present House, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Grant Duff, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Moncrieff, Mr. Walter have hitherto opposed it. The Premier, Mr. Moncrieff, and Mr. Grant Duff did not vote on Wednesday night. It is a social question, not a political one; and, as far as Parliament is concerned, not an ecclesiastical one. The grievance, substantially, is that a man is not free to marry whom he pleases. And if we admit this to be a grievance, there is no reason why a man may not marry his niece, or, for the matter of that, his sister. It would be as easy to say that prohibitions of marriages in consanguinity as well as in affinity are a mere matter of sentiment. There are those to whom Christianity is a sentiment, and morality a sentiment. Earl Russell has pronounced distinctly that the law would remain imperfect if it stopped with legalizing marriage with the wife's sister; and we hope that when Mr. Chambers's Bill gets to the Lords he will repeat this frank avowal, and will also inform us where, if anywhere, he means to stop. That brothers-in-law, and brothers' widows, and uncles and nieces, must be permitted to marry if this Bill passes is certain. To this we must make up our minds, and in the meantime we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that the solid convictions and domestic happiness of the many are to be sacrificed to the caprice, the passions, and the long purses of the few; and because a few rich men—or, for aught we know, a single rich man, for the Marriage Law Reform Society preserves a strict anonymity—have a taste for what the law calls incest, ten thousand homes are to be broken up, and the sanctities of the family, as we have all known them, are to be destroyed. We must add that a significant proof of the unscrupulous character of the tactics of this Marriage Law Reform Society has been made public. Their emissaries, so it is asserted, go about offering long advertisements to any journals which will take up their Bill. The value of some newspaper comments in favour of Mr. Chambers's Bill may therefore be tested by a scrutiny of their advertising columns as compared with their leading articles.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY ON GEOGRAPHY.

THE chief obstacle to any great and sudden change in the course of instruction given in our schools lies quite as much in the conscious ignorance of the teacher as in his aversion to the change itself. No really able man ventures to teach what he does not know; moreover, he does not like to teach what he has not himself seen taught, and so learnt how to teach. To this well-founded reluctance, quite as much as to any conservative tendencies, we attribute the slowness of the progress that the more modern studies have made. A master knows that he is capable of teaching Greek and Latin; he not only knows Greek and Latin, but he has in his own school-boy days seen how they are taught; he knows that he has at his command a number of recognised text-books, and he feels sure that, though he may make a failure with those of his pupils whom nature has not fitted for a classical education, still he can year by year turn out a certain number of scholars who will possess a real and accurate knowledge of what they have studied, and who will be able to keep alive in his school a clear sense of the difference between sound knowledge and shallow pretence. He may be well aware that the classics, after all, are but one branch of learning, and that not all boys are naturally fitted to study them; and that there are other great branches of learning which it is a shame, even to the greatest classical scholar living, to be altogether ignorant of. But at the same time, with that deep sense of the value of sound learning and accurate teaching which is induced by close knowledge, with that dislike of teachers who are ready to teach before they have learned, he may (and perhaps not unwisely) think he would do better by going on in the old rut, and teaching that alone which he can teach well. In our great schools, however, many masters have thought it better to face the difficulty, and though knowing themselves to be but learners, and though painfully aware that they are pursuing but a tentative process, have tried, whilst learning themselves, at the same time to teach their pupils. Classes have accordingly been formed in the more modern studies, and the physical sciences are being taught with more or less success, and to a greater or less extent, in many of the public schools. Nevertheless, all teachers really worthy of the name must be painfully aware of the inefficiency of all instruction that is not, in the first place, based on sound knowledge, and, in the second place, is not imparted on a good method. A man may have great knowledge, but little power of imparting it. The classics have been taught so long that unquestionably a method of teaching them has been unconsciously worked out, and there is a more or less imperfect art of teaching them, even if there is not a science. But this is not the case with the physical sciences. Till lately they can scarcely be said to have been taught at all; and though there are not a few men who have a profound knowledge of them, and some who also know how to impart this knowledge to others, yet, while the former class is but limited in numbers, the latter class might almost be counted on one's fingers. Everywhere, however, throughout the country a demand is being made for instruction in those sciences, and instruction is accordingly being supplied. But it is easy to see that men who have not themselves thoroughly mastered the subject, who have been their own teachers, and who have not therefore learnt the best method of teaching, cannot be expected to do justice to their subject. Had a similar state of affairs happened in France, had a desire sprung up for instruction in some new subject, a trained body of teachers could have been easily supplied. The Minister of Education would have directed the Head of the École Normale Supérieure of Paris to provide at once a capable professor, and to give to the study as many hours a week as was necessary. The students would at first have learnt the subject itself, and then would have learnt how to teach it, and in two or three years there would be coming forth a constant stream of men, not only knowing their subject thoroughly, but also capable of teaching it. In England, unfortunately, we have no such institution—at any rate no such institution adapted to any schools above the lowest. If a Head-master requires some new subject to be taught, he does not know where to go to look for a competent man, and often finds himself compelled to ask some one of his masters who shows some inclination for the subject to get it up as quickly as he can, and to teach it on the best method he can devise. An attempt, however, is being made to remedy to some extent this evil, and to supply on the one hand to the pupil the knowledge he requires, and on the other hand to the master, if not the knowledge of the subject, yet at all events the knowledge how best to impart it. We watch this attempt with great interest, as it may lead to a more rapid spread of sound knowledge of the physical sciences than we could have hoped for.

The managers of the London Institution in Finsbury Circus have, much to their credit, resolved to do what they can to provide sound elementary instruction in the physical sciences, at such a price that it will be within the reach of all but the lowest schools. Professor Huxley, on Monday, April 12, began the first course of lectures. He is to deliver twelve lectures on Physical Geography; the charge for the whole course is but five shillings. The course is adapted for the young, though at the first lecture half the audience was composed of adults. Professor Huxley told them that he should disregard them altogether, as he came to lecture to schoolboys and schoolgirls. Now we regard these lectures as doubly important. In the first place, the pupils of the schools in and round London have an opportunity of studying a subject which is in itself most interesting, but which is generally most vilely taught, under the guidance of a man who is singularly capable of teaching it with clearness and interest. In the next place, the masters of all the schools within fifty miles round can—if they will only make the requisite effort and sacrifice of their time, both of which will be amply repaid—learn how to teach. Both boys and masters who were present at Professor Huxley's lecture must have opened their eyes and ears in amazement to find how interesting a subject of instruction geography may be made. The boys, at all events, must have been astonished beyond measure to find that every word of the first lecture was easy to be understood. The usual elementary text-books of geography, as we all know from sad experience, begin by explaining, or attempting to explain, what is altogether unknown and unfamiliar, and perhaps arrive at last at what is known and familiar. If a child ever learns to point out his native town on a map, or the course of some river he knows, it is in all probability months after he has had to point out the Tropic of Capricorn or the Antarctic Circle. Before he has in any way had brought home to his mind what distance is, or been made to realize how it is that an inch of the map stands for some fifty miles of land or sea, he is told that "at the equator, the earth's circumference is 24,899 miles, and its diameter 7,925; but, owing to the compression towards the poles, the length of the polar diameter of the sphere is about 26 miles less than that at the equator." (Geography for the use of Beginners. By William Hughes, F.R.G.S., p. 2.) While he would with difficulty make out a plan of the very room in which he is receiving his lesson, and would be unable to calculate the number of square feet its floor covers, he has to learn by heart that "the superficial extent of Europe, including its islands, is 3,700,000 square miles." While he could not tell in what direction by the compass he had been walking when he went to the pastrycook's, he is supposed to be capable of understanding that the Feejee Islands are in longitude 178·20 East and latitude 17·0 South, and that Greenwich is on the first meridian. When he begins by studying the separate continents or countries, he has to learn all the facts that can be crammed into him about one before he knows even the outline of the other; he reads that "the Black Sea is connected by the Strait of Yenikale with the Sea of Azov at its North-eastern extremity" before he has even been shown Asia or Africa; and he learns that "the principal towns of Meath are Navan, Kells, and Trim" before he so much as hears of Paris or New York. In fact, every man must feel conscious that, till he began to travel and consult Bradshaw, he had not the least real conception of geography. The first mountain tour a young fellow makes with his map of the district and his pocket-compass must teach him more real geography than he had learnt at all the schools he had attended. We do not feel sure that a schoolmaster could now and then employ his boys' time better than by giving them a county map and a compass, and sending them out to find their way to some spot ten or twelve miles distant, where, of course, he should be found awaiting them with a good dinner. If the district were celebrated for its beer or its cheese, he would no doubt make them try both, and so give them a second lesson in practical geography, by a somewhat minute study of the natural products of the country. This latter lesson would be not a whit less useful, and would remain much longer imprinted on the memory, than any number of pages of the Geography Book learnt off by heart.

Professor Huxley has as yet only given two lectures, so we do not feel sure whether in his course this somewhat practical geography will be included. At all events he began with what was familiar to his youthful audience, and kept to what was familiar; he began his course of lectures with the River Thames and on London Bridge, and not with the terrestrial globe and "the imaginary lines supposed to be drawn upon the surface of the earth." He made quite clear what a map really is—and did not, with the geography books, on the one hand, assume that a child could grasp at once the full meaning of a map, and so requires no explanation as to how a piece of painted paper can in any way stand for a vast country, or, on the other hand, give as explanation that which is no explanation at all. What is a boy the wiser for being told "that a map represents on a flat surface the whole or any portion of a globe"? Professor Huxley observed that his map of the Thames was but a picture of that view which would be seen by any one who mounted in a balloon sufficiently high to see the river in its whole course. He afterwards cleared away that second great confusion which attends all geography, and from which, we will undertake to say, numbers of people even when grown up never free themselves. How many are there who think that the North of a country must, in the nature of things, be at the top of a map, and the South at the bottom; and that the world rises therefore towards the north and falls away towards the south. How many are there who think that there is a real West and a real East, and that a man in the United States, for instance, is in this West not merely relatively to Europe, but absolutely. Professor Huxley was evidently well aware of the great confusion existing in most people's minds about the real points of the compass and the points marked on the map, and was not content with saying that "the top of a map is towards the North, the bottom South, the right-hand East, and the left-hand West," but first made his audience understand (what we will undertake to say numbers of not ill-educated people do not clearly understand) what is meant by North, South, East, and West; and then observed how it is only by general agreement that maps are always drawn in one particular way, with the North at the top and the South at the bottom. We cannot but think that some geographer would do good service if he were to publish a map of the world with all this reversed. No doubt if we saw hanging up on a wall Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope at the top, and Greenland and the North Cape at the bottom, we should feel as if the world were something worse than out of joint, and should experience much the same uncomfortable sensation as would come upon us if we saw the picture of a house hung upside down.

Having made clear what a map is, Professor Huxley led his audience to reflect on the great river pictured in the map, why it exists, and where the water comes from that flows along it. The source is said to be at Thames Head, but the sources are countless, and are all round the basin of the Thames, in the springs that rise at the edge of the hills that enclose it. The springs led him to consider the rain that feeds them, and the origin of rain. Especially clear and interesting was his account of the formation of clouds, rain, snow, and hail—clear enough for a child to understand, and interesting enough for a man to listen to. At last he passed into almost eloquence as he showed how the sea supplies the air with the vapour of water, how the vapour of water passes into rain, how the rain supplies the springs, and the springs the river, and how the river in its turn supplies the sea. "The source of the Thames comes from nowhere; it turns round in a circle." He might have remembered, however, that a thousand years before the Thames was heard of, this truth had been known, and that the Preacher had said "All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again."

In his second lecture Professor Huxley still kept to the Thames and the Thames basin, explaining the terms basin, plain, valley, watershed, &c. It was towards the close of the lecture, however, when he got into the geology of the district, that he really warmed up as he handled the gravel and the lump of chalk that he had lying as specimens on the table before him. Even the lump of London clay was treated with a kind of respect that we can scarcely share in. The action of running water was shown to have been what had rounded the pebbles, chipped off the sand, and ground down the stones into mud. Nothing that was said was perhaps new. The arrangement of the subject was, however, new and surprisingly fresh. He said nothing that was not interesting, and nothing that was not intelligible. His language was as clear as the Thames water doubtless one day will be, and at times his audience must have felt that a certain quiet humour and eloquence may be found even in a lecture on Geography. We can only hope that every great school may send at least one master to attend the course, and that thus a sound and rational method of teaching one branch of the physical sciences may generally prevail. In the name of Isaak Walton and Charles Lamb we must, however, before we conclude, protest against the confusion on Professor Huxley's admirable map of the Thames basin between the Lea River and the New River. The Lea River does not end in the New River, nor does it enter London at Islington.

THE DAY OF DUPES.

On Tuesday evening the forces mustered in the House ready and eager to mingle—horse, foot, and artillery—in the great crowning fight which was to settle once and for ever where the Law Courts were to stand. Long before midnight the belligerents, Sons of the Thames alike and Mother Carey's Chickens, were tailing off in small crestfallen knots, routed by a scooped turnip and a very cheap tallow dip, which Mr. Lowe stuck up and introduced as Inigo Jones. All and every shade of opinion was equally baffled by and disgusted at the device by which the cold-blooded astuteness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer contrived to put them collectively and severally in the wrong. The champions of Carey Street were quelled into silence by the swoop of damnatory figures cruelly rolled out. The clans of Trevelyan who had swarmed into the House fresh from the Olympian revels of the Arts' Society, scornful of lawyers, and proud of the great discovery that a quay was, after all, a very fine site, resentfully felt that they had been taken in their own snare. The men who clung to a façade on the north, and the men who craved for a façade on the south of the Strand, awoke together to the fact that no façade at all, on either side of the Stand, was to be permitted. The promoters of economy drew small comfort from a result which, after all, landed them in an outlay of millions; while the believers in national self-respect groaned at the jubilant proclamation of niggardly flint-skinning over a work which cried for wise munificence. The lawyers were snubbed and humiliated; the dilettanti were coaxed and fleeced; the whole modern generation of believers in progress, practical and artistic, were insulted by the resuscitation of the fragment of a postponed design of a special age of ambiguous taste; those who had some wish that the collective wills of England might be lodged in premises safe from fire, and fortified against worms, were ordered down, and told not to trouble the Court. The irritable race of architects and architects' friends were dared to do their worst; and Mr. Henley was led to the sage conclusion that if the moderate estimates of scheme the first had shown so great a proclivity to inflation, it was in the eternal nature of things that scheme number two would not in the long run prove less dropsical.

We are sent back to the year one again—that is all. Men who have earnestly and disinterestedly laboured to consolidate the Law Courts, and who fancied they had touched land, are again drifting among the cross-currents of the Atlantic. A much-desired reform, striven after by many generations, is now again hustled back into chaos. But Mr. Lowe has not triumphed. He has been but the disturbing spirit; the Demiurge is yet to arise who is to supply the handiwork. Other Budgets will have come and gone, other Chancellors of the Exchequer will have thumped the box and opened out their foolscaps of figures, before the day shall have dawned on which it can be proclaimed from the Treasury Bench that the new Law Courts have been finished and paid for, and are ready to be opened.

As all are now dupes, so all have been accomplices before the fact in their own discomfiture. The original separation of the undertaking from the general and sensible administration of Public Works—in which the Treasury as national employer, and the Office of Works as national architect, combine together—by the creation of an exceptional Commission, has put both the lawyers and the Whig officials, under whom in the Saturnian days of Palmerston the job had been consummated, in a false position. The incidents of the competition, originally due to the same influence, although resulting in the choice of a very eminent architect and in the reasonable anticipation of a very noble pile, were not such as to court minute investigation. The extravagance of site and of money which called for such vast appendices of ground and of grants to the original estimates prejudiced the claims of the locale which had been deliberately selected after a minute investigation; the patent fact of the creation of the Thames Embankment, and the primâ facie appearance, to say the least, that this fact had been evaded, supplied a forcible argument to those whose interest, from every motive, local, architectural, or fiscal, was to throw the whole question into hotch-pot. It was in the power of those who raised the flag on Tuesday to have done something to guard the cause against a coup d'état from the Treasury Bench, but they overlooked their danger. Sir Roundell Palmer forcibly rejected independent help from men of taste and general pursuits, and entrenched himself within the professional lines of ease to the lawyers. Sir Roundell's blunder was that he forgot the danger of being outflanked. Mr. Gregory weakened his centre by the reckless way in which he reinforced his wings. He had constituted himself champion of the Thames Embankment site. But he was justifiably anxious to secure the support of those who, though unpersuaded as to the demerits of the Carey Street site, were yet honestly desirous to recognise the merits of the Embankment, and willing, under the altered conditions of the case, to let the whole matter pass again under review. If he had from first to last of his speech depreciated or ignored the advantages of Carey Street he would have taken up a position—narrow and erroneous as we believe—but consistent and telling in a party fight, such as a Connaught man might well rejoice in. If, on the other hand, he had from first to last made it clear that he appreciated the advantage of the high-level acres between the Strand and Carey Street for a great public building, and had freely told the House that, while he claimed the choice of a noble pile for the Embankment, he refused to let slip the certainty of a noble pile on the other site, he would have secured the sympathy of all who valued the genuine improvement of London above the faction fight of the Law Society and the Society of Arts. But all through his speech Mr. Gregory shifted from one position to another—sometimes towers and sky-line in Carey Street, and sometimes the profitable bid of a perfectly unexceptionable Company, was the burden of his song—and so the song failed to charm its hearers.

The Titanic extravagance of Sir Charles Trevelyan's proposals to move everybody and everything somewhere else, was also a disturbing element in the controversy. The suggestions might have been wise or unwise in themselves, but they were Napoleonic—nay, Haussmannic—and John Bull's philistinism impatiently rejected them, the more so because they came from one whose official antecedents ought, in the vulgar estimate, to have negatived the possibility of original taste. We do not think that the ancillary suggestions involved in this scheme would in themselves hold water, and we are therefore the more sorry that Sir Charles Trevelyan, for whose pluck we have a genuine admiration, should have hampered himself with so cumbersome a camp-equipage.

The sum-total is a surprise from Mr. Lowe, which insidiously contrives to adopt the weakest point of every suggestion, and play it off against whatever else might be commendable in the particular scheme or in any other. The supporters of the site north of the Strand, absurdly called after Carey Street, damaged their own cause when they proclaimed the inadequacy of the large and comparatively regular area which they had originally obtained, and clamoured for "indefinite" extension and enormous concentration of offices at a prodigious cost. Mr. Lowe has snatched his advantage every way from this mistake. He has framed on it an excuse to pitch into the market for railway stations, or any other chance scheme of the share-jobber, a whole area upon the cresting height of London, apt and ready for public objects, imperial or municipal. The friends of the North Strand side and of the South Strand side have been exposing each other's demerits; Mr. Lowe has said there shall be no Strand line at all. He has done worse than this; a main feature of the proposed pile, which tended to make it so big, was the general fire-proof magazine for the wills of the country. A child, not to speak of a Lowe, can understand how inconvenient it is for a people to have its documents and title-deeds scattered up and down in makeshift receptacles—how riskful and how scandalous it is that these receptacles should not be fire-proof. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes advantage of the merely collateral question of roofs and walls—whether the Law Courts and the Probate building should or not coalesce into the same block—to stifle the equitable claim of the public for a safe and ample will depôt somewhere (if only it be within fire-proof walls) with a scoffing reference to Vanity Fair and a blank draft upon an indefinite futurity.

We wonder that even Mr. Lowe's audacity should have presumed to trail the red herring of Inigo Jones's Whitehall Palace along the floor of the House. Inigo Jones, a man against whose ability we should be the last to breathe a whisper of suspicion, was the great architect of an age which had discarded the accumulated and old traditions of national life without displaying the courage to invent a national style for the coming time. He was the follower of modern Italy, and, in obedience to the requisitions of the school whose disciple he was, he prepared a design, grandiose in its completeness, among gardens, and with all its façades fully developed, but cold and flat in its separate features, for the rebuilding of the Palace of Whitehall. Of this rebuilding, the Banqueting Room, now the Chapel—an isolated structure with four sides and only one façade—was the solitary part completed. Mr. Lowe does not ask us to reproduce the Palace of Whitehall, with its beauties and its drawbacks, its regal isolation and successive fronts, upon the Thames Quay. He boasts of carving out a site among the slums, and he then tells the House to plant upon it a barrack, with one show front copied from Inigo Jones, and sides and back as cheap and as ugly as the builders under a grinding Treasury contract can be forced into making the work.

Of the outrage to Inigo Jones's memory we do not complain. We regret the bias of his age while we acknowledge his virile powers, and we are confident that his reputation will survive the towzling to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have it subjected. But there are other reputations which will not so patiently stand being hustled aside and trampled down. Architecture, as most men not at the Treasury know, has shared in the intellectual activity of the age, and the gage was thrown down to its select representatives in the competition for the Law Courts. That competition has terminated in the appointment of a very capable man to the desired work, and he has buckled himself to the task in the spirit of his time and with the good wishes of his contemporaries. To throw over Mr. Street as a man of inventive powers, and to call upon him to draw out a stunted and mutilated reproduction of a fragment of the postponed work of a man whose claim is that he lived more than two hundred years ago, is an insult not only to Mr. Street himself, but to the whole artistic and intellectual public opinion of a very active age, and it cannot fail to be resented and resisted accordingly.

The true solution of the question is simple, and we believe that even Mr. Lowe may be led to apprehend it. The Carey Street site has been bought, and it is large enough for the Courts and their direct offices, though not for the depository of wills and other loose-hanging appendages. Let the Courts then be built on the Carey Street site, of such moderate dimensions as to leave an open area all round, and thus solve half the difficulties, on which so emphatic a stress has been laid, of approaches. The Chancellor of the Exchequer refuses to buy land adjacent to Carey Street for the subsidiary positions. Let him go on refusing. But the wills must be lodged after all, and Mr. Lowe is charmed with the cheapness of the Howard Street property. By all means let him become its possessor, and adorn the Thames Embankment with the public building which common sense says ought to stand betwixt Somerset House and the Temple in the shape of the Probate Office.

OUR BEGGARS.

THE Royal Suburb has had the luck to call the attention of the public to the nuisance of begging. Whether Kensington is infested beyond other districts, or whether the victims of the annoyance are more sensitive there than elsewhere, is a question which the student of metropolitan manners and habits can best solve for himself. The Kensington people say that begging has increased there vastly within the last two or three years; the Poorhouse returns show that the recipients of relief have increased and are increasing; the ratepayers complain that they have no valid voice in the election of the guardians; that a list composed principally of obscure tradesmen's names is sent round once a year to them, and from this alone can they choose the men who are to have the spending of their money; that any information as to the mode and extent of the disbursements is pertinaciously refused by the officers of this august conclave; and they hint at carelessness and mismanagement. Probably there is an equal amount of grumbling, with equal truth, in other parts of London. But Kensington has, for the time, the honour of figuring as the typical refuge of beggars and the purgatory of ratepayers. The Daily News has, in the most spirited manner, despatched a Special Correspondent all the way from Hyde Park Corner, to report on the givers and receivers of alms. From him we learn that, out of town, Knightsbridge is the great resort of mendicants; that the road from Knightsbridge to Kensington is tolerably free; that the space betwixt the Horticultural Gardens and South Kensington is overrun by them; that the long and houseless pathway which skirts the Horticultural Gardens is their favourite haunt; and that ladies in this neighbourhood go out armed with coppers in self-defence. In this account, it is only fair to say, we find nothing exaggerated or set down in malice. It is, indeed, not over-coloured, but under-toned. We believe, for instance, that it would be more true to say that the ladies go equipped, not with coppers, but with sixpences, and that the exact interval between luncheon and the afternoon walk is computed with the utmost accuracy by the tramps. And we can well believe that no more auspicious hunting-ground for such game was ever presented to ambitious mendicancy than is offered by the Queen's Gate walk. It is so long, so lonely, and commands so distant a prospect of pedestrians and policemen, that we wonder why it has not drawn to itself all the beggars of West London. Imagine a long straight pathway of fully half a mile in length, from one end of which to the other the slow and unfrequent approach of the listless policeman can be distinctly seen; imagine a periodical procession of unprotected females bent on the mild pleasures of the South Kensington Museum, or the torpid solitudes of the cheerless and shadowless Gardens; could mendicancy hope for a more benign opportunity, or gather ampler prizes elsewhere? Why, the strongest-minded female that ever regulated her daily actions by the rules of political economy would have her pennies wheedled, whined, or bullied out of her before she had traversed one-third of the dismal road; while the shy, the timid, and the defenceless would pay black-mail beyond the ransom of a morning's shopping. Nor is the stronger sex more secure. A middle-aged gentleman with rheumatic diathesis is not in a better position than the unprotected spinster or the timid girl.

It is perhaps not easy to distribute the blame between the offending parties in these cases. When we speak of offending parties we do not mean the beggars. Beggars are not the causa causans of beggary. If left to itself, this would be still-born. The honours of its development must be divided between the police and the public. The police do not and will not interfere. With that paradoxical interpretation of English law which pre-eminently distinguishes the metropolitan constabulary, they resolutely decline to come between the beggar and his or her victim. Some obtuse persons attribute this inactivity to a foolish misapprehension of their own powers. We acquit them entirely of this ignorance, and prefer to hazard the hypothesis that their abstinence is intended as a deliberate but delicate warning to that large class of persons which cannot be comprehended in the designation of "carriage folk." When Policeman X sees from his distant point of view an unhappy gentlewoman floundering in an impotent struggle with the mingled oaths and obscenity of the squalid wretch who began by appealing to her feelings as a Christian sister, and ends by an imprecation of which she understands the general purport better than the literal meaning, it is not that he doubts his ability to wield the armoury of British law, but that he prefers to seize the opportunity of pointing a moral. What he implies is this—helpless folk who have neither carriages nor footmen should not place themselves in a situation in which they may be bullied, threatened, and frightened. If, knowing the dangers of the highway, they persist in meeting them, it is only themselves that they have to thank for anything unpleasant which may occur.

Although conduct of this kind is hardly warranted by the letter of the instructions from Scotland Yard, it ought not to be condemned as wholly foreign to their sense. We all know what is the main object of all departmental instructions—namely, to shield the department, not to guide its officers. Doubtless the heads of the police recognise in the grim irony of their subordinates an effective agency towards the attainment of the objects for which they are appointed. It is only to be regretted that the people who exemplify this treatment have so little appreciation of irony and profit so little by experience. At the same time it must be confessed that when people do pay for a police, they are to a certain extent justified in the belief that it ought to protect them from annoyance on the Queen's highway. Their indignation at an imputed neglect would be juster than it is, if they were not themselves accessory to the injury of which they complain. But they are so to an extent which they hardly realize in their own minds. Whatever the police may do or leave undone, it is beyond question that a very great number of people, who are not exposed to menace or importunity, do encourage and foster mendicants by their indiscriminate largesses. They do this under the influence of a sentiment which is not so bad as to deserve reprobation, nor yet so good as to be accounted virtuous. It is a sentiment compounded, in part, of benevolence, and, in a greater part, of indolence. Those who are impelled by it are aware that there is a good deal of distress in the world, and they wish to relieve it. But they are too idle to hunt it out, to dive into its hiding-places, and explore its depths. It does not chaunt its tale in the streets, or come forth to flaunt its rags and tatters before the public gaze. It suffers, pines, and dies in back attics or damp cellars; it eludes the observation and wearies the patience of fashionable charity. But while it shuns observation itself, its parasitic mimic seeks observation and profits by it. The accents of grief, the garb of poverty, and the hollow voice of famine are quickly simulated by the tribe which has resolved to live on imposture and credulity. That otiose charity which satisfies its conscience by gifts of money finds in the mendicant tricksters of the streets ready recipients of its indiscriminate bounty. Nor is the example which it thus affords neglected by a less wealthy class. The Daily News is perfectly right when it says that respectable artisans, themselves distressed, and almost on the verge of indigence—and it might have added, poor servant-girls and charwomen—are amongst the most constant and persistent almsgivers to professional beggars. Thus from two very opposite classes—from those who have a sentimental sympathy with suffering with which they must remain practically unacquainted, and from those who dread the possibility of similar suffering themselves—the cunning simulators of unmerited misery obtain a pretty and an easy livelihood. They have as little scruple in whining their piteous complaints into the ears of the industrious poor as in dunning with their importunity the impatient attention of the unconvinced but unresisting rich. Between the two classes, the profession thrives and grows apace.

It is, we fear, useless to dilate upon the mischiefs of its growth. No one nowadays is the better for being lectured. Least of all will people be the better for being lectured on what many of them, perhaps justly, consider to be their principal virtue. The precept of almsgiving, being the only Christian precept which has lost most of the applicability of its original inculcation, is cherished with superstitious reverence by people who are very indifferent to other virtues of the Christian faith. And it certainly has its recommendations. Its exercise is so easy, costs so little trouble, and is rewarded by that pleasurable accompaniment, "the poor man's blessing." There are, we believe, a vast number of middle-aged people of both sexes who actually go to bed every night much happier because they have bought twopennyworth of blessing from scamps who, if they had been justly treated, would have cursed more heartily than they blessed. With these people it is useless to reason. But there are others, equally instrumental in fostering this great nuisance, who may perhaps condescend to reflect on the actual wickedness of their conduct. They must see—if they are not blind and stupid—that they are encouraging lies and a race of liars. They must see that, in proportion to the threepenny and sixpenny pieces which they fling broadcast, they multiply the spawn of beggars and impostors. Where there is so lavish an outpouring of money there will be an equally large body of ravening loafers. As they increase, so will the alms increase also. The tribute and the plunderers will react on each other. Both will be so much taken away from industrial labour and profits. The alms will be withdrawn from the great capital fund of the country; their receivers from the great body of the labouring population. That which should have set in motion the ingenuity, skill, and industry of thousands will be absorbed in pampering a tribe of greedy, lazy, and unproductive drones.

Let it not be forgotten that two million pounds sterling are annually spent on the public charities of London; and that at least three millions more find their way into the hands of the London poor in some shape of alms. It cannot but be that, through chance, mismanagement, and wilful folly, a large portion of this vast sum is clutched in successive doles by the same professional beggars. They get their bed in one ward and their supper in another; their dinner at one kitchen one day, and at another the next day; clothes and money from one society, money and victuals from another; and again money from the heedless pedestrian in the public streets. And who is the better for all this? The recipients? They become more squalid, more degraded, more shameless than ever. The parishes? They have the same number of importunate paupers, and of silent uncomplaining poor, as ever. The country? So much capital is taken from productive work and expended in corrupting the industrious poor by reckless and profligate prodigality. If no other scruple arrests the precipitation of misguided liberality, let almsgivers only see how grave is the temptation by which they are trying the natural independence of the hardworking and the honest. An army of hereditary mendicants may be dealt with by the law and the police. But what power or what law will restore the lost independence and virtuous pride of the labouring poor? It is not too late even now to arrest the evil that is setting in. In one suburb of London a local Mendicity Society has routed the aggressive vagrants that once plundered it. Let the same plan be tried in other suburbs—or, better still, let the Metropolitan Mendicity Society establish its branches in outlying parts—and the money which is now spent on sapping virtue and corrupting industry will be saved for the encouragement of honest work, and the diligent relief of proved and unmerited distress.

THE SCOTTISH LION ROARS.

THERE appears to be no limit to that tampering with ancient bulwarks of the Constitution of which Conservative orators so eloquently and unavailingly complain. At the moment when the Act of Union between England and Ireland is menaced by unscrupulous politicians, a cry is raised that the Act of Union between England and Scotland is in equal danger. It is true that the tendencies of these two movements of aggression are different, since it is sought to distinguish Ireland from England as regards religion, whereas the complaint is that Scotland is being merged in England through disregard of that provision of the Act of Union which requires this island to be called Great Britain.

We regret to have to say that the grievance of our Scottish fellow-subjects appears to us to be utterly beyond remedy. Poets, orators, and historians all feel the same invincible necessity of adopting a compendious phrase, and thus they all say "England" where they ought to say "Great Britain and Ireland." It is true that Scottish patriots insist only on the words "Great Britain," but it would be difficult to give any reason except convenience for using those words and omitting "Ireland." There is a society in Glasgow which devotes itself, under the patronage of St. Andrew, to maintaining the rights and privileges of Scotland, and if any speaker or writer of note uses "England" where it is considered that he ought to use "Great Britain" he receives by post a copy of a pamphlet which imputes to him a deliberate attempt to defraud Scotland and Scotchmen of their historical position and treaty rights. It may, indeed, comfort the English recipients of this pamphlet to remember that their delinquency is shared by eminent natives of the country which they are accused of "swindling" out of its existence. Thus the late Sir Archibald Alison was called to account for his misuse of "English" for "British," and he was obliged to offer the poor excuse that "the long study of foreign writers" had led him into error. The foreign writers who use the objectionable words Angleterre and Anglais are, happily for themselves, beyond the reach of the penny post. It is odd that Frenchmen, when they mean to be abusive, prefer to use the word Albion, sometimes prefixing to it the word perfide; whereas "Albin" is the designation which the Gaelic inhabitants of Scotland use for their own country. It is probable that the Society of St. Andrew could hardly maintain that the appellation "British" is more justly applicable to their countrymen than "English," and to call themselves "Great British" would move irreverent auditors to laughter. The word "British" cannot, indeed, be properly applied to Scotchmen unless it be assumed that the chief element of the population of the country is the same that is found in Wales. Far be it from us to embark on the sea of controversy which must be traversed by those rash persons who inquire into the origin of the Picts and Scots. But we may venture to suggest that the Romans gave the name "Britanni" to the people of this island in a careless way, without troubling themselves to observe whether they comprehended under it one race or several. The identity of the Britons with the Picts is not satisfactorily demonstrated by reference to the fact that both peoples painted their skins blue, because we have not the slightest doubt that they would have used red and yellow, at least in spots and stripes, if they could have obtained them. So far as we know anything about our own origin, it seems that "British" is the least appropriate designation that could be given to us; and we should think, if on such a subject we are permitted to think at all, that it is still less appropriate to the Scotch. But there is a saying that it is a wise child that knows its own father; and the Scotch are very wise, so perhaps they do know their origin. It is strange, however, that one portion of the Scottish nation should habitually call the other portion Saxon, which for the present purpose may be taken to be synonymous with English.

> While on yon plain
> The Saxon rears one shock of grain, says Roderick Dhu, looking from his highlands upon the valley of the Forth. It has been the fashion lately to talk of the "Anglo-Saxon" race, and we believe that Americans prefer the word to "English," perhaps because it is rather bigger. But the people who use the word "Anglo-Saxon" mean by it, rightly or wrongly, "English." It would not be surprising if Americans preferred a word which carried in it reference to more than one of the races to which they owe their origin. But it happens that no such word exists. The word "British" is not such a word, and, besides, Americans are apt to use that word when their sentiments towards the old country are unfriendly. Thus an American skipper in the first years of this century would always call an English man-of-war, that overhauled his cargo in search of contraband, a "Britisher." The truth is that every single word that can be suggested to distinguish the people of this island is equally objectionable, and we can no more use two words habitually where one would do than we can say "telegrapheme" instead of "telegram." And besides it would be simply grotesque to talk of the Great British nation, government, flag, or army.

These considerations are wholly thrown away upon the Society of St. Andrew. The laureate who wrote

> Norman, and Saxon, and Dane are we, has doubtless been supplied with a copy of the pamphlet which now lies before us, and has been requested to introduce into the next edition of his poem an exhaustive enumeration of the various races which have helped to populate this island. The Pictish or British, and the Scottish, elements are equally aggrieved at being represented as non-participants in the welcome of the Princess of Wales. Nor will it avail the poet to allege the supposed exigencies of his art, for an earlier poet contrived to introduce into his epic a complete catalogue of all the Greek States that sent ships to Troy. And it will be equally hopeless for him to rely upon the example of a poet, bearing a Scottish name, who prophesied that for that poet would come within the category of persons to whom are offered in this pamphlet the alternative characters of "renegade, coward, and fool." We admit that Scotchmen may feel aggrieved when their distinguished soldiers are spoken of as they were by Sir Archibald Alison as Englishmen. And we are ready to substitute the word "British" for "English," as far as possible, in that connexion, protesting at the same time that we do not see that the former word is more suitable than the latter. But a difficulty arises when we come to speak of military services in which Irish as well as Scottish soldiers have borne part. So far as we know, Irishmen would be as little pleased to be called "British" as "English." If one name only is to be used, it must be that of the senior partner of the firm. As Mr. Bright said, when Mr. Burns, the author of the pamphlet, assailed him, "custom and convenience are in many things omnipotent." Mr. Bright thought that custom and convenience would beat Mr. Burns, but we doubt that. He seems to us the most persevering character that we ever met with, and we should certainly predict his success in any other pursuit than that to which he has devoted himself. He attacked Lord Palmerston for a speech he mad in 1853, and "kept pegging away" at him during the remainder of his life. He supplied the Queen with a copy of one of his early pamphlets on this subject, and he finds in Her Majesty's diary of her life in the Highlands proof that it had had the desired effect. She writes that she received news of the death of "England's, or rather Britain's, greatest man," the Duke of Wellington. As Mr. Burns himself says, he has been instant in season and out of season on this subject. He has addressed letters of remonstrance to all the public speakers of his day. His controversies with the London newspapers have been endless. Mr. Tennyson must have had a hard time of it from the hour when he lamented the Duke of Wellington as "England's greatest son" to the hour when he excluded the Britons from any share in the welcome of the Princess of Wales. If any person doubts the importance of what have been called sentimental grievances, we advise that person to peruse this pamphlet. Mr. Burns expected some years ago that some redress for Scottish wrongs would have been offered by a Conservative Government of which the late Earl of Eglington was a member; but the Conservative Ministers prudently confined themselves to acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Burns's communications. Sir John Pakington unluckily forgot to read them, and coming, two years afterwards, to Glasgow, declared, after visiting the dockyards, that "no country but England could show such a sight." Mr. Gladstone has undergone a regular course of treatment during many years by Mr. Burns, and the result was that in a speech at Liverpool, in 1865, he spoke of "that political belief which is common to us all as Britons." If we had read this passage without Mr. Burns's comment, we should have supposed that Mr. Gladstone was endeavouring to propitiate his Welsh neighbours. In an early stage of the correspondence Mr. Gladstone had suggested that the use of the term British might perhaps be offensive to the Irish, whereupon Mr. Burns enclosed a pamphlet in which this suggestion is treated as "hypocrisy and humbug." We gather from this pamphlet that Mr. Burns considers that the ancient inhabitants of the three kingdoms were all Celts, and therefore they might all be called "Britons," as a sufficient distinction from any Teutonic interlopers. But upon this view of history, the Irish ought to be content to be comprised within Great Britain, whereas their Act of Union constitutes a United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The term "Greater Britain" has been appropriated elsewhere, or we should suggest that by way of solution of the difficulty. It is lucky that the Irish have, or think they have, more substantial grievances, or else there would be a Society of St. Patrick as well as of St. Andrew, and English journalists would be badgered out of their lives whenever they had occasion to speak of the joint property or history of the three nations. The Scottish Lowlanders are of course at liberty to assert that they are Celts if it so pleases them. We would dispute with no man, and least of all with a Scotchman, about his pedigree. The Society of St. Andrew may, if they choose, declare that they are Britons, and paint themselves blue by way of confirmation of their words. It is not our business to contradict them if they go further, and proclaim that the original Irish race are Britons like themselves. But it is rather hard upon the descendants of English settlers in Ireland that the victors in a long strife should be absorbed into the body of the vanquished. The Irish Protestants are apprehensive that the confiscation of their lands will follow the disendowment of their Church, and they are now further threatened with the obliteration of their history.

The meteor flag of England

THE FRENCH GALLERY.

THIS Sixteenth Exhibition of French and Flemish pictures brings the history of contemporary art upon the Continent down to the present moment. Some few of the works we may have seen before either in France or in Belgium, and the landscape by Troyon was painted twelve years ago. Other pictures, such as "The Fellah," by M. Landelle; "The Birth of Venus," by M. Cabanel; and "The School of Vengeance," by M. Alma Tadema, are more or less replicas, but may be no worse on that account. The whole collection should be accepted as a digest or kind of English edition of Continental schools. Within the same space it would be hard to bring together a greater number of leading men or representative works. The general effect, notwithstanding some few signboards supplied as heretofore by M. Schlesinger, is that of balance, tone, and quiet keeping—aspects which, from the first opening of the Gallery years ago, came to the true artistic eye in grateful contrast to the glare and obtrusive crudity of our English galleries. These foreign pictures, then, as often as they appear among us are greeted gladly; they display new phases of art; they manifest aspects of nature of which the eye has not become weary. Above all, they are conspicuous for knowledge and skilful treatment.

We cannot but remember that within this room have been exhibited "Francesca di Rimini" and the "King of Thule," by Ary Scheffer; the "Hemicycle" in replica, and "Lord Strafford," by Delaroche. Such noble works gave proof of the elevated range of thought reached by the French school. It now cannot but be felt that the "Birth of Venus," by M. Cabanel, is a falling away from intellectual standards. We do not wish to be prudish. Any one who has not got beyond the point of being shocked by the nude female form confesses that the pure sphere of art is still above his habit of mind. And we freely admit that this "Birth of Venus" possesses rare qualities; that the flesh is pearly, that the figure floats lightly on the waves, and rises as a vision of beauty from the sea foam. Lovely too are the Cupid-like creatures that dance on the wing as butterflies. Yet of all the Venuses we have known, whether in marble or on canvass—whether it be the Venus de' Medici or of the Capitol, or Titian's Venus in the Florence Tribune—this figure by Cabanel is the most voluptuous, not to say licentious. Artists of all times naturally strive to give expression to their highest conceptions of beauty, and our objection to this Parisian Venus is simply that the conception is low. It was considered a sign of the debasement of manners under the Roman Emperors that the ideal of the Greeks, the pure type of beauty, the symbol of love, became identified with courtesans. And this is precisely the reading of the character given by M. Cabanel; yet this same M. Cabanel has been created officer of the Legion of Honour, and he received the grand prize in the Universal Exhibitions of 1855 and 1862. It is hardly possible to give greater emphasis to the statement that since Ingrès, Flandrin, Delaroche, and Ary Scheffer, the arts in France have suffered serious decadence. They have fallen from classicism through romanticism down to voluptuousness; they are severed from the intellect and the religion of the nation; and they answer the ends of the ruling dynasty sufficiently well if they do but pleasantly divert the minds of the people from weighty matters and more serious thought.

Neither do the prevailing phases of French art appear in a more favourable light when we pass from M. Cabanel to M. Gérome, a painter who for genius, though misdirected, is by common consent second to none now living. Yet can it be that the great Gérome is human? Have not his works sometimes been inhuman? Is there not in his matchless productions an absence of the finer traits of our common humanity, such as mercy, conscience, and the sense of responsibility? M. Gérome has, in fact, taught us to look always for a devil lurking in stealth somewhere. Even now a poor "Marchand de Tapis" cannot sell a rug without the intrusion of a fiend who is made to howl from a corner at the passers by. In short, Mephistopheles, after the Goethe type, with a leer in the eye and a cold shudder in the touch, looks over the shoulder of M. Gérome while he paints. This "Marchand de Tapis" has been produced for the sake of the carpet. The composition is awkwardly out of balance, and the colour somewhat opaque and heavy. Next as a master-work, though in a different way, may be noted "Napoleon I., 1814," by Meissonier. The picture, strange to say, was exhibited in January last, at the Royal Institution, by its owner, Mr. Ruskin, "in illustration of the relations of Flamboyant Architecture to contemporary and subsequent Art." This amazing achievement, supposed to represent in money value 1,000*l.*, received from Mr. Ruskin, in a printed appendix to his most eloquent lecture, the following depreciatory and somewhat unintelligible criticism:—"Realistic art of the lower school, but consummate of its kind. Look at it with the lens. Showing the relation of the disturbed and dramatic manner of modern art to the disquietude of National Character." We must confess that this disturbed manner is not very obvious in the stern resolve and imperturbable bearing of Napoleon; neither does the "disquietude of National Character" seem to be of much concern to the war-horse that carries the great and ponderous Emperor. This work, notwithstanding criticism, remains truly grand. It was said, if we mistake not, of Michael Angelo that he could have carved a giant on a cherry-stone, and so Meissonier can on the scale of miniature impart large significance to history, and within the compass of a few square inches shadow forth the destinies of empires. Mr. Ruskin, in the words already quoted, adds weight to what we have ventured to say on the decadence of French art; yet this picture of Napoleon I., though "realistic art of the lower school," is consummate after its kind; the slightest touch could not be changed without abatement of its perfections.

An earnest naturalism has taken firm hold of some few painters—a naturalism which has too much of dignity to be low, too much of human sympathy and truth-seeking to fall into frivolity.

M. Brion and Madame Henrietta Browne are, in the Gallery, favourable examples of the class. The former we never remember to have seen to better advantage than in "Family Worship, Alsace," though we are not unmindful of another scene in Alsace, "Les Pèlerins de Sainte-Odile," selected from the Musée du Luxembourg for exhibition in the Champ de Mars. The International Jury measured M. Brion's deserts by a second prize, similar faint praise having been given to Mr. Nicol, of our Royal Academy. Thus M. Brion, known for "genre et paysage," though Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, has scarcely risen to a first rank. Yet this his latest work won deservedly, in the Salon, the "grande médaille d'honneur." It is solemn in sentiment and subdued in tone. The picturesque peasants, more good than beautiful, listen reverently with bowed heads to the old man who expounds to them the Scriptures. Breadth of shadow, and here and there access of light, together with deep, broken tertiary colours, bring the picture into keeping with the pervading thought. Thus M. Brion has risen out of rustic genre into the pure region of religious emotion. Madame Henriette Browne struck, even from the first, like chords of the affections. Every figure she paints is something more than a study of form and colour, though the quality is pure, and the texture and tone transparent and lustrous. For example, how simple, broad, firm, decisive in handling and modelling is her "Seminarist." Yet over and above any mere technical excellence stand thought, as planted upon the brow; resolve, giving firmness to the lip; repose, shadowing the eye in meditation. Other artists appear in this Gallery who, with more pretence, fall far short of this simple excellence. M. Bouguereau affects a certain soft refinement as acceptable to English connoisseurs, but the face is wax, not flesh; the figure in his "Corn Field" is the artificial model of the studio, not a healthful, honest peasant girl. In like manner, neither for nature nor art is M. Landelle's "Fellah," an Egyptian water-bearer, to be valued. The figure may possess a certain statuesque pose and grace in line, a result laboured to feebleness, and smoothed down into commonplace generalization; the colour, too, and manipulation are opaque and spiritless. It is curious to observe the style which is considered best suited to the English market. We even fancy that M. Breton and M. Israels mitigate rude naturalism and impressive desolation out of consideration for our weak susceptibilities. These artists appear in London less strong than in Paris or Holland. Nevertheless it is no small privilege to behold, without the trouble of crossing the seas, two such works as "In the Hay Field," by M. Breton, and "Premiers pas qui coûtent," by M. Israels. Works like these have qualities to which our English painters are still strangers, notwithstanding the reciprocities of late established between rival national schools.

French, Belgian, and Dutch schools surrender much of their national differences when they betake themselves to genre, and concentrate their powers upon small interiors and trivial domestic incidents. The name of these painters, now scattered over Europe from St. Petersburg to Naples and Madrid, has become legion. Of course only the best known, such as Frère, Duverger, Meissonier, Toulmouche, Madou, and Willems, find place in this small and select collection. Of M. Édouard Frère nothing remains to be said, save, perhaps, that of late he has fallen off. His pupil, M. Duverger, too, has scarcely changed his style for the better since he painted that simple and lovely little picture, "The Village School," one of the purest gems in Mr. Ruskin's collection. Yet "The Empty Cradle," in the French Gallery, notwithstanding the exaggerated and spasmodic sentiment into which M. Duverger now degenerates, is very perfect after its kind. The execution indeed we think better than that of his master in "Reading made Easy," for M. Frère has lost the exquisite quality of his handling; in seeking to be soft and bland he has grown hesitating and vague. We pass from the walks of humble life when we approach M. Toulmouche and his "Pleasures of Imagination." We here seem to recognise somewhat of the refinement and affectation of Greuze, an innocence touched by fatal consciousness, shadowed by approach of evil, ready to bend gracefully to temptation. French artists of this class suggest a thought by the faint shadow of a shade, a rising emotion reaches the surface in a gently undulating line. Yet "Pleasures of Imagination" may be wholly unobjectionable; the colour is refined, even weak; the handling delicate, certainly not strong. Close by hangs M. Heilbuth's "Watteau," a caprice and a frolic; by the same artist, too, are a couple of portraits dashed off in bravura fashion, as negligent of form as of finish. That of Mrs. F. Lehmann has no art qualities to justify the assumption of a defiant indifference which might befit a genius such as Rembrandt or Velasquez. Mr. Millais tried this kind of thing with better success, both as to colour and the modelling of form. When last we encountered M. Heilbuth he was still dancing attendance upon Cardinals while alighting from their carriages to air themselves on the breezy brow of the Pincian Hill. This evidently was his vocation.

We will now for a moment leave France, and turn to the Low Countries, represented by leaders such as Madou, De Jonghe, Willems, and Bisschop. Artists and others studious of distinctive styles will scarcely fail to mark in "Forty Winks" the unsophisticated naturalism, the firm bold hand, of M. Madou, an artist whose honest merit has won him the rank of "Chevalier of the Order of Leopold." If M. Madou may claim to be the modern Teniers, with equal right can M. de Jonghe and M. Willems plead for recognition as the living representatives of Mieris and Terbourg. These two artists, however, by taking up their residence in the French capital, have contracted Parisian habits; thus their brilliant pictures "de toilette" and "de société" have become a pleasing compromise between French and Flemish styles. It is notorious that no one can match a satin with M. Willems; indeed the "Rival Pets" almost throw into shade Terbourg's "Satin Dress." Again, it is long since we have encountered any work more consummate for treatment than "Recovering" by M. de Jonghe. This artist, unlike M. Willems, does not care much for surface gloss or high finish. And surely nothing can be more skilful than the management of the black shawl used as a foil to the yellow and the white of the bed. The general cast of the drapery implies knowledge; nice distinction is made between the folds into which the diverse materials of linen, silk, and lace fall and dispose themselves. The black lace shawl may, for measured symmetry yet loose accident, for transparency yet substance, be quoted as a feat of a well-directed pencil. We may be expected to say a word for M. Koller's "Faust and Marguerite." The style combines John Van Eyck and Baron Leys, with the smooth surface of porcelain pictures manufactured in Dresden; and thus the work will have its reward. M. Bisschop, a Dutch artist, "Chevalier de l'ordre de la Couronne de chêne," comes closer to nature than M. Koller, though he too looks through the coloured spectacles of old Flemish painters, who generally, it would seem, were rather dim of vision. "The Lovers' Quarrel" is M. Bisschop's best work. The picture shows greater range than "La Prière interrompue," exhibited in the Dutch Gallery of the Paris International. M. Bisschop does not wish to sell his birthright or forswear his nationality. Cuyp, Vander Helst, and Rembrandt, as seen to this day in the galleries of the Hague and Amsterdam, have been the companions of his study. The analysis of the picture now before us would bring out instructive results as to the juxtaposition and contrast of colour, as to breadth, concentration, and brilliancy of light, shade, &c. The master-work of De Hooge, recently acquired by the National Gallery, may be studied with advantage in relation to present manifestations of the Dutch School. Our English painters have much to learn from such works, whether ancient or modern. Reynolds said that Dutch pictures were grammars of art.

The English are loth to believe in foreign schools of landscape, partly, doubtless, because they cherish the faith that no people can paint nature as well as themselves; and we cannot but think that this egotism may be intensified by the present collection, especially as the masters shown are not in full force. Rousseau, Dupré, Lambinet, Diaz, Corot, are names as much revered on the Continent as Creswick, Linnell, Danby, or Turner in England; yet though the examples here given may be sufficient to indicate generic styles, they do not justify individual reputations. M. Rousseau, pronounced most erroneously by an international jury to be the first landscape-painter in the world, here dwindles down into a third rank. Again, we cannot but say that M. Lambinet, one of the chief men in France, has now reached his decadence. And then we come to M. Corot, a landscape-painter who inspires a kind of worship among the chosen and qualified few, though perhaps in England we are scarcely yet prepared to accept this eccentric Frenchman as the high priest of nature. M. Corot's greys are nicely modulated, his tones faultless in relation as an English November morning. Yet this complexion of landscape is perhaps not the most grateful to Englishmen, who cherish the prescriptive Linnell conflagration sunset as the phase of nature in most felicitous antagonism with the washed-out greys of domestic life. Therefore it may be long before a public is found for M. Corot's peculiar mixture of chalk, charcoal, and water. We must hasten to a conclusion. Between M. Clays—the delicious marine-painter of Belgium—and our own cool Mr. Cooke, comparisons certainly not odious to either might be drawn. Mr. Cooke is the better draughtsman; M. Clays the finer colourist. Passing on to animal-painters, we may observe that the country which has bestowed infinite honour upon Sir Edwin Landseer is naturally apt to do less than justice to all other painters of sheep, deer, horses, and cattle. The few Englishmen, however, who may have made acquaintance with M. Troyon will be glad to come once again in contact with a late though somewhat debilitated landscape by this famed French animal-painter. M. Schreyer, a more recent growth, should be appointed painter to the Society for the Suppression of Cruelty to Animals. We incline to think that M. Schreyer may yet settle down into the repose which befits a great artist. Yet "The Halt by the Road," which comprises horses beyond honourable service in a London cab, makes pathetic appeal to sensitive nerves. We close with congratulations to the skilful manager, who feels to a nicety the pulse of his public. Specially fortunate is it that the catalogue did not absolutely exclude the name of Bonheur. If a Rosa could not be got, then of course the next best thing was to secure a Juliet or an Auguste, names which may yet enhance the family renown. Some credit is due to the Director for having studiously secured every accessible painter who might bring to the English public a new or an agreeable sensation.

NEWMARKET CRAVEN MEETING.

THOUGH the racing in the Craven week was comparatively uneventful, there was excitement enough in connexion with the leading favourites for the Two Thousand and the Derby to atone for any dulness that might have been experienced on the Heath. It is unnecessary to say that the best public performers of last year were, beyond all question, Belladrum, Wild Oats, and Pero Gomez. Opinions were much divided as to the comparative merits of the two latter, who ran a dead heat for the Criterion Stakes, and each had a large body of enthusiastic supporters; but all collateral running tends to show that Belladrum's achievements last year were quite unrivalled, and that, had he come to the post for the Two Thousand fit and well, he must have had very little to fear from any of his antagonists. The fatality, however, that for years past has visited Mr. Merry's three-year-olds has not been wanting on this occasion. At least it is impossible to explain all that has happened in connexion with Belladrum without taking for granted that he has been the victim of some casualty that renders his chance for either of the great three-year-old events hopeless. Whether his wind or his legs are affected it is impossible to say with certainty, for the horse is guarded with the utmost care, and no authentic information can be obtained; but we do not believe that his owner would, by his silence, give consent to the hostility directed against his horse, unless that hostility were justified by the actual circumstances of the case. And if that justification exists, all that we can say is that the sooner the pen is put through his name the better. The case of Wild Oats stands on a different footing. The Wild Dayrells have been singularly unlucky as three-year-olds, and good judges have all along doubted whether Wild Oats would stand training. His leg, which has for weeks given his trainer considerable anxiety, gave way in the early part of last week, and a notice to that effect, signed by the Duke of Newcastle, was posted. The notice stated further that, in the opinion of his trainer, it was almost impossible to bring Wild Oats to the post for the Two Thousand Guineas, but that, the Duke of Hamilton being abroad and having given no authority on the subject, no further steps could be taken. Of course, after this public notification, the horse cannot be allowed by his owner to start for the Two Thousand, and he will no doubt be scratched as soon as the Duke of Hamilton can be apprised of what has happened. While on this subject we must remark, as the Duke of Hamilton's exclusion from the Jockey Club has been commented on in many quarters with much indignation, that an owner of race-horses who apparently cares so little about the interests of the sport as to absent himself on the eve of one of the most important events of the year, for which his representative is a great public favourite, without leaving any instructions for the guidance of those entrusted with the management of his stable, is hardly likely to be a valuable accession to the supreme council of the Turf.

The Craven week thus witnessed the downfall of Belladrum and Wild Oats, and in addition was distinguished by the reappearance of the third great public performer of 1868. And if Pero Gomez had failed to sustain his reputation, the unprecedented event would have happened of all three leading favourites being overthrown in a single week. The Biennial for three-year-olds was in truth the race of the week, and though in former years moderate horses, like Kangaroo and Ceylon, have carried it off, the calibre of the competitors this year and in 1868 was very different, and such as to elevate it into an event of first-class importance. Last year Blue Gown and The Earl met for the first and only time, and the Derby winner was accidentally defeated by a neck. This year Sir Joseph Hawley challenged again with Pero Gomez, and won by a similar distance. Only six ran, and of those Tenedos cannot be thoroughly trained, and Amazone and Cicely had no pretensions to compete in such company. The battle was between three—Pero Gomez, Ryshworth, and Duke of Beaufort. Pero Gomez whipped round just as the flag fell, and lost quite two lengths start. The race was run at a slow pace, so much so that they were all in it at the Bushes; but it was evident that Pero Gomez could have gone to the front at any moment, and indeed appeared to be kept back with difficulty from doing so. Ryshworth was done with in the Abingdon bottom, and the issue was left to Duke of Beaufort and Pero Gomez. The Duke had a slight advantage half-way up the hill, but Wells was merely waiting on him till the proper moment, and directly he let out Pero, his superior stride told, and though Duke of Beaufort ran stoutly and gamely, he had not the ghost of a chance of overhauling his antagonist. Whenever a race is won by a neck only there are naturally various and conflicting opinions, and the balance on this occasion was decidedly not in favour of the winner. Pero Gomez, indeed, found but few friends among the Newmarket critics, who, we should say, prefer that which pleases the eye to that which is efficient for sound honest work. Now Pero Gomez is no beauty. He is a common-looking horse, decidedly, with straight shoulders, and drooping quarters, and very upright pasterns. But if he is not lovely to look at, he is an unmistakeably good one to go. He runs generously and gamely, and is a horse of perfect temper—in itself no slight recommendation. He could have left his horses at any moment in the Biennial, despite his bad start, and we think that he won with the very greatest ease, though the verdict was only a neck. He can be made some pounds better by the Derby day, and we think he is almost certain to beat Duke of Beaufort wherever they meet, though Mr. Brayley's horse also is susceptible of improvement, but not of so much as Pero Gomez. As for Ryshworth, we would never trust a bad-tempered horse. He was, it is true, quite unfit to run, having only been in work for a few weeks; and he will no doubt be quite a different horse at Epsom, as far as condition goes. He is also a fine mover, and perfectly sound; but he has a lively recollection of those two severe struggles with Belladrum last year, and we doubt whether he will exert himself to struggle again on any future occasion. One could not help remembering, after looking at the good fight made last week by Duke of Beaufort, with what simple ease Belladrum cantered away from him last autumn, Mr. Brayley's horse—though well, and trusted by his owner—never being able to extend Mr. Merry's champion; and we are still of opinion that, with all his weight, Belladrum would as nearly as possible have won the Middle Park Plate. Such reflections are useless now, however; and it only remains for us to express our belief that Pero Gomez passed through his ordeal last week quite satisfactorily, and is fully entitled to the position he holds as first favourite for the Derby.

We must now glance rapidly at the general racing of the meeting. Next to Pero Gomez, Martinique was the most distinguished three-year-old performer. Beating Abstinence was no great feat, because the Duke of Newcastle's filly is out of all form; but in the Column Stakes she made very short work of Crocus, thus reversing last year's running. Martinique is wonderfully improved, and runs either much more stoutly or with much more confidence than last season. It is true she nearly lost the Column Stakes, but that was not her fault. Snowden evidently never thought of any danger from Toison d'Or, and eased Martinique when Crocus was beaten; and, Fordham coming with a tremendous rush, he had to set her going again, and we were pleased to see how gamely she responded to the final call. Badsworth won two races on the second day of the meeting, but Provider, who has been running all the season, was the best he had to beat. Martinique's stable-companion, Tasman, was much talked about both as her superior and as a likely candidate for the Two Thousand; but his public essay was particularly unfortunate. He was pitted against Prince Imperial, over the easy Ditch Mile, which, if anything is, is within the compass of a roarer; and being obliged and at the same time unwilling to make his own running, made it so ineffectually that he could never get far enough away from Prince Imperial, whose fine turn of speed was serviceable at the finish. Under different circumstances Tasman could not have lost; but in any case his pretensions are not above second-class. King Cophetua won a race at last, giving 24 lbs. each to Vladimir and Vanichka, but he had to be driven along the whole way to come in first by a head. Some people called it nervousness on his part; to us it seemed hopeless currishness, for he is a good galloper, but he will not go the way he is wanted. The only four-year-old race that need be mentioned was the Biennial, from the Ditch in, and out of sixty-two entries only four could be found to take part in the contest. On this text the decriers of modern racing will undoubtedly enlarge. Moreover out of these four, one, King Alfred, was quite unfit, and another, Phœbus, quite outclassed. The race lay in fact between Blue Gown and Blueskin, the latter being in receipt of 7 lbs., but few thought it would be more than a canter for Blue Gown. Weight will tell, however, over so severe a course, and in addition Blueskin is perfectly at home over it, and is also the greatest sticker in training. He was beaten at the distance, but coming again, Wells was obliged to ride Blue Gown hard in order to get him in first by a head. Blue Gown certainly experienced some loss of reputation by this hard-won victory, and perhaps he is not after all partial to so long a distance; yet he ran, when in difficulty, with the greatest possible gameness, but for which he must have been beaten, as Blueskin was first in the very next stride.

The two-year-old racing of the week showed the early runners of the year to be still invincible, Stephanotis winning two races, and Elferon and Atlantis one each. But undoubtedly the best two-year-old winner of the week was Lord Stamford's Normanby, by Thormanby out of Emily, who is good-looking, a good mover, and having improved already vastly since early spring, will very likely improve still more. With good luck he will hold a distinguished place among the two-year-olds of 1869. Baron Rothschild also has two very promising youngsters in Moonstone and the filly by King Tom out of Blooming Heather, who will be getting into form when the precocious winners of the early prizes are stale and jaded. Elferon, for instance, is evidently getting tired of such constant work.

Of the handicaps we need only mention one, the Newmarket Handicap. There was a fair field of a dozen, of better class than usual—Lancet, Alpenstock, Gondolier, Restitution, Cecil, Mariner, Géant des Batailles, and Curio being the most noteworthy. The easy victory of Lancet was not a little surprising, considering her recent defeats and the amount of work she has done this year; but distance is evidently no object to her, as, in addition to the races she has run, she was tried with Blueskin from the Ditch in at the beginning of the week, and neither the horse nor the mare was any the worse for the exertion. Though the distance of the Newmarket Handicap course has been reduced from a mile and three-quarters to a mile and a-half, the really severe part remains intact, and the absence of a quarter of a mile on the Flat is a matter of no consequence. Only Lancet and Alpenstock were left with any chance at the top of the Cambridgeshire hill, and though the latter ran gamely enough, he could not concede 10 lbs. to the mare, who won by two lengths with plenty in hand. We will not say much about the respective positions occupied by the remainder, as, with the exception of Géant des Batailles, it is not absolutely necessary to believe that, under the circumstances, they hurried themselves very much.

REVIEWS.

GILDAS.*

IT is not the least among the many merits of Dr. Guest, in his treatment of our earliest history, that he has had the courage to acknowledge the merits of Gildas. Few contemporary writers have been visited with equal severity by later historians; even those who, like Dr. Lappenberg, set aside the absurd doubts thrown recently on his authenticity, lavish their censures on his ignorance of the Roman rule, his rhetorical exaggeration, and the provoking haziness of his description of the Great Conquest, which from its title would seem to form the theme of his book. It is difficult indeed not to feel some disappointment when we compare Gildas with the contemporary Provincial who has preserved for us the annals of the Conquest of Gaul. In Gregory of Tours the old world jostles roughly with the new, but in the very confusion and disorder of the story we feel the confusion and disorder of the time. The weak, clever subtlety of the Roman, the fierce childish passion of the Frank, the crash of the old administration before the irresistible march of the conqueror, the concentration of all moral life and energy in the Church before which he bowed, form the bold outlines of a picture which finds no parallel in the liber querulus of Gildas. But, in truth, the historic value of Gildas lies in the contrast between the two works. The Bishop of Tours is the representative of a new France which has sprung out of conquered Gaul. He owns the barbarian as his master. He describes his marches, his victories, his murders, his greed with a subject's interest. The bitterness of the Conquest is already past. The fusion of the two races has already begun. The tongue and the laws of the Provincial not only remain his own, they are threatening to become those of the Frank. The religion of Rome has superseded the faith of Woden and of Thor. There is a confusion of peoples and languages and ideas in Gregory's work, as picturesque and as significant as the confusion of the consular insignia with the Teutonic axe in Chlodewig "the Patrician." But no British neck had bowed before the English invader, no British pen was to record the conquests of Hengist or of Cerdic. Slowly, stubbornly, the Provincial of Britain had retreated before the sword of the conqueror, but across the burnt and harried border of the two races the Englishman remained as strange to him as he had been in his Schleswig home-land. To Gildas, a century after their landing, his foes are still "ferocissimi illi Saxones, Deo hominibusque invisi," "dogs," "barbarians," "wolves," "whelps from the kennel of barbarism." Their victories are victories of the powers of evil, chastisements of a divine justice for national sin. Their ravage, terrible as it was, was all but at an end; in a century more, so old prophecies told, their very hold on the land would be shaken off. The prophecy is the first outbreak of that undying hope of the Celt that survived through ages of slavery and death. But of submission to the invader, of intercourse with the barbarian, there is not a word. We hear nothing of their fortunes, or of their leaders. Across the border Gildas gives us but a glimpse—doubtless he had but a glimpse himself—of "forsaken walls," of shrines polluted by heathen impiety. Such a silence is of course disappointing enough to the children of the conquerors, eager to learn something of the deeds of those fathers who made the land their own. But in itself it is of the highest historical significance. It is just because Gregory could write the story of Chlodewig or Frédégonde that the temper, the tongue, the laws of his own Gallic province have superseded the temper, the tongue, the laws of the Frank. It is because Gildas, like his race, met his conquerors with nothing but defiance, that the tongue and the law, not of Gildas, but of those conquerors, remained the tongue and the law of after Englishmen.

Hardly less historical significance is to be found in the strange tone which Gildas adopts towards his own countrymen in the strange caricature which he gives of their history. Certainly all trace of authentic tradition has disappeared when the Roman wall and the fortresses of the Saxon shore are represented as parting gifts of a benevolent Empire to its unworthy subjects, when the trembling Britons are pictured as being dragged from the wall by the hooked weapons of the Picts. But, in fact, nothing shows better the tremendous rift made by the English Conquest in the traditions of Britain than this strange sketch of the history that preceded it. The very promise to give some account of Imperial Britain is qualified by a "quantum potuero." What he does give comes, he tells us plainly, "not so much from native writings or written memorials, for if any such existed they have been burnt or carried off by those who have fled into exile—at any rate they are not to be found—as from accounts brought from over sea (transmarina relatione) which frequent interruption of intercourse leaves obscure." In this disappearance of all authentic history, the past took its colour from the very misery which Gildas saw around him. The ruin, the defeat, the feud and bloodshed of the wrecked Province were contrasted with the golden age of a fancied past. Rome became all the dearer as she faded into the distance. Men still clung, as Gildas clings after a century of severance, to the tone of the Provincial. In them, as in him, the Empire had become a religion; it could not err. The very sufferings of the deserted provinces are their crimes. The one chance of preservation in the midst of chaos is to cling to the relics that are left of the old "Ordo" of the Roman rule. If in the traditions of the Conquest we are to see, with Dr. Guest, the contest of a Roman with a British party in the first struggle with the Jute, we must look to the words of Gildas to recall for us the temper of the Provincials under Ambrosius, and to enable us to realize by contrast something of the tone of Vortigern and their opponents. Of his British countrymen, of their "levity," of their "ingratitude," Gildas speaks as bitterly and as contemptuously as Swift would have spoken of the Irish under British rule. The first advent of the Imperial eagles seems to him like the arrival of some irresistible destiny, parendi leges, nullo obsistente, advexit. When the Province revolts, it is "a treacherous beast"; when the legions hasten to subdue it, it is to wreak the Imperial vengeance on the "deceitful fox-cubs." Over the panic of the Britons before the Roman attack he exults as an Orangeman might have exulted over the Irish panic at the Boyne; "ita ut in proverbium et derisum longe lateque efferatur, quod non Britanni sunt in bello fortes nec in pace fideles." There is all the "ascendency" tone in his description of the rule which followed on the Roman Conquest, but not even an Ulster squire could have spoken with such a glow of triumph over the miseries of his fellow-countrymen as this Provincial. He reminds them of their serfage, of the whips that scored their backs, of the yoke that pressed down their necks, how the name of "Romania" had all but superseded that of Britain, how every coin and medal was stamped with the triumphant image of the Cæsar. In the actual politics of the Empire Gildas is the most unflinching of legitimists; Maximus is a mere usurper, his accession a mere rebellion, his fall a just punishment for his impiety. The outburst is all the more significant if, as we rather gather from his own incidental phrases and from the Welsh traditions, the elevation of Maximus first re-aroused the hopes of the conquered races. But with Gildas it is this "illegitimate tyranny" that brought about the ruin of Britain; the inroads of the Picts and Scots only gave him occasion for new insults over the "rebels," for new eulogies of the Empire. He triumphs over the ruin of the Province, over her ignorance in arms, the humiliation of her appeal for aid, the despatch of her "queruli legati" to Aetius. Rome, on the other hand, plays the part of the long-tried but forbearing Mother-country, hurrying again and again to the rescue, scattering their foes, protecting them with fortresses, withdrawing indeed at last, but withdrawing with an imperial dignity. It is, as we have said, a strange caricature, but it gives us faithfully enough the aspect which history took in the later Roman tradition, the story which would have reached us had the Empire won.

In the description which Gildas gives us of the period which intervenes between the earlier Pictish inroads and the coming of the English we are at once on historic ground. Vague as the story is, it is very different from the merely ideal picture of the Empire which preceded it, and it has been ably vindicated of late in the researches of Mr. Skene. But for directly historical purposes the most valuable portion of the work lies undoubtedly in the three sections which give us the British tradition of the Conquest of Kent. With Dr. Guest we are "not ashamed to confess" that the story carries with it our "entire belief," but the story must be read as it is written, and not according to the preconceived notions of readers. Taken—and it has very commonly been taken—as a general account of the conquest of Britain, it is no doubt a mere piece of vapid rhetoric; but, not to dwell on the entire misconception of the nature and duration of that conquest which is involved in such an assumption, the notion itself is without the slightest countenance from the narrative as it stands. The story of Gildas is the simple story of the earlier war in Kent, the arrival of the Jutish chieftains at the summons of the Council of Britain, the disputes over their claims for pay and rations, the reciprocal threats which ended in war, the first terrible sally of the new settlers from Thanet, the revival of courage among the Britons, the victory which checked for awhile the progress of the conquerors. It has hardly been noticed with what accuracy all technical terms are used throughout this narrative, and yet no better test of the authenticity of a work is to be found than in its use of technical terms. It is hardly possible that the forger of a later age could have known of that peculiar stage of the provincial government which finds its only analogy in Gaul, but which a single phrase of Gildas sets simply before us:—"Tum omnes consiliarii unà cum superbo tyranno Gwyrthigerno Britannorum duce cæcantur." In the withdrawal of the directly Imperial rule, the provincial council, which under it had only a consultative power, became necessarily the one source of authority, but the administrative titles, and doubtless the forms of administration, remained as before. How soon the sense of this was lost we see from the change of the "dux," in later versions of the story, into the King. The claims of the new-comers on their settlement in Thanet are described with the same technical colour, "impetrant sibi annonas dari," and on the grant of these supplies in kind, "queruntur non affluenter sibi opimenia contribui." Threats followed complaints, and the "Eastern Fire" was soon blazing across the breadth of Kent "from sea to sea." To Gildas, as to his contemporaries, the most terrible feature of the inroad was one which we are apt to forget—its heathen character. In striking contrast with what happened on the Continent, the sword of the invaders seems to have been especially directed against the clergy. They appear to have taken refuge in their churches, and to have rushed out as these were set on fire, to find death on the barbarian sword. No passage better illustrates the style and the historic value of Gildas—

Ita ut cunctæ columnæ crebris arietibus, omnesque coloni cum præpositis ecclesiæ, cum sacerdotibus et populo, mucronibus undique micantibus ac flammis crepitantibus, simul solo sternerentur, et miserabili visu in medio platearum ima turrium edito cardine evulsarum, murorumque celsorum saxa, sacra altaria, cadaverum frusta, crustis semigelantibus purpurei cruoris tecta, velut in quodam horrendo torculari mixta, viderentur.

For the moment the people were panic-stricken; some, overtaken in their flight, were butchered "in heaps;" some fled over sea; others, overcome by hunger, surrendered to become serfs of the conqueror. The passage is so valuable in its bearing on the question of the extermination of the Britons that we quote the words:—"Alii fame confecti accedentes manus hostibus dabant in ævum servituri, si tamen non continuo trucidarentur, quod altissimæ gratiæ stabat in loco." We can hardly doubt that the terrible tale of massacre and exile is the same tale as that told by the English chronicler in the two meagre entries that commemorate the victories of Aylesford and Crayford. But no English record remains of the national reaction which, headed by the fugitives who had taken refuge among the cliffs of the Saxon shore, from Richborough to Pevensey, soon in a decisive victory swept back the invaders to Thanet. It is here that the book abruptly breaks off. From that time to the great battle of Mount Badon victory wavered from the one side to the other; from that overthrow stretched a long period of peace.

THE FIFTH LETTER OF HERNAN CORTES.*

THE figure of Hernan Cortes stands out in noble and pleasing relief among the early records of Spanish conquest and dominion in the New World. His name may have suffered in vulgar estimation from its juxtaposition with those of filibusters or coarse and ruthless adventurers like Almagzo and Pizarro. The impartial voice of the historian, however, and the still more emphatic evidence of his own despatches and achievements, combine in securing justice for Cortes as a man of rare breadth of intellect, great powers of statesmanship, and a liberality of spirit vastly in advance of his age. Mr. Prescott has done much to set in its true light the great work compressed into so marvellously brief a space by Cortes' energy and daring. Mr. Helps is only at a loss whether to compare him most nearly with Cæsar, with Augustus, or with Charles V. Of late years the publication of much important and interesting matter long kept back from the light has brought forward this hero to tell as it were from the tomb the tale of more than one unknown or forgotten episode in a career of brilliant courage and adventure. One of the least understood or appreciated of these passages in the life of Cortes was his wonderful expedition to Honduras. The letter containing the record of this romantic and daring, but skilfully planned and eventually fruitful, exploit was known to have formed the fifth of a series of despatches written by Cortes to the Emperor Charles V. This, however, together with the first, which gave an account of the hero's landing at Vera Cruz, had long been missing. Robertson was the first to suspect that they might probably be found amongst the archives at Vienna, Charles having been in Germany when one of them at least reached Europe. Such turned out to be the case. In a manuscript volume in the Imperial Library an attested copy of the first letter was found, of which that diligent historian forthwith published an abstract among the notes and illustrations to his History of America. Along with it in the same manuscript volume was Cortes' fifth letter, or Carta quinta de Relacion, which was printed for the first time in 1844, in the fourth volume of the Colèccion de Documentos inéditos para la Historia de España. The first letter had previously appeared in the first volume of the same series. Both have since been reprinted, first by Don Enrique de Vedia, in Ribadeneyra's Biblioteca de Autores Clasicos, and subsequently by Don Pascual de Gayangos, of the Spanish Academy. Doubts have been entertained concerning the earliest of these letters. Though signed with Cortes' name, it appears to have been addressed to Charles V. by the Justicia y Regimiento, or municipal corporation of Vera Cruz. A separate, and probably fuller, report it is thought likely must have been sent from the conqueror's own pen, in accordance with his known habit and bent of mind. It was the opinion of Gonzalez Barcia, who was the first to reprint the second, third, and fourth letters, that this independent despatch of Cortes was no other than the one suppressed by the Council of the Indies at the request of Pamphilo de Narvaez, or that which Juan de Flores took from Alonso de Avila. No such doubts, however, attach to the fifth letter, the most valuable of all in a geographical point of view, if not for the interest kindled by its tale of hazards and adventures, or the light it throws upon the mind and character of the narrator himself. The Council of the Hakluyt Society have done well, in our opinion, in including it in the list of their publications; and they have been fortunate, or rather let us say judicious, in their choice of a translator, the editor of the original text of the Cartas de Hernan Cortes al Emperador Carlos V. (Paris, 1866). The second, third, and fourth letters had been translated by an American writer, Mr. George Folson, in 1843; but M. de Gayangos is the first, as far as we know, to turn into English the curious despatch before us. His version is marked by clearness and freedom, and though we have not the original at hand as a means of verification, the scholarlike style of the translation gives us thorough confidence in its fidelity. A concise but clear introduction puts us in possession of the chief points connected with the bibliography of the subject, together with the causes which led to the expedition.

Cortes, it is well known, shared the idea, then common with his countrymen and many of the leading men of adventure, that a strait was to be found connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the latter being no other than the famed Indian Ocean. "Most of all," he writes to the Emperor, in his tercera Relacion, "do I exult in the tidings lately brought me of the Great Ocean; for in it, as cosmographers and those learned men who know most about the Indies inform me, are scattered innumerable isles, teeming with gold and pearls, abounding in precious stones, as well as in spices, and where I feel confident secrets and admirable things may be discovered." And again, in 1524, he writes, "Your Majesty may be assured that, knowing as I do how much you have at heart the discovery of this great mystery of the seas, I shall postpone all interests and projects of my own—some of them of the highest moment—for the fulfilment of this great object." No sooner had he entered Mexico the second time than Cortes fitted out two expeditions which, after reaching Mechuacán, penetrated to the borders of the Great Southern Ocean, even bringing back gold and pearls from the Gulf of California. Another exploring party pushed along the southern coast as far as Florida. A third and larger squadron was next despatched under Christoval de Olid, a brave officer, with orders to form a settlement at Honduras, and thence to cruise along its northern shore towards Darien, in quest of the mysterious strait. Olid, however, proved unfaithful, and on reaching the Havannah declared himself, under the promptings of Velazquez, the bitter enemy of Cortes, independent of his chief. On hearing this, Cortes despatched forthwith his kinsman, Francisco de Las Casas, with a small force in three vessels, with orders to seize and bring back the rebel. Las Casas, having been wrecked upon the shore, was thrown by Olid into prison. Aided, however, by Gonzalez Davila, another victim to Olid's tyranny, a plot was raised by Las Casas which ended in Olid's being seized, tried by court-martial, and beheaded at Naco. Meanwhile Cortes, having no tidings as yet of the death of Olid, resolved to go in person to Honduras, not only with a view to restoring his lost authority, but with the hope of realizing his darling vision of an inter-oceanic communication. On October 12, 1524, he left Mexico on the expedition described in the graphic despatch before us. The leading outlines of the journey have been pursued by many historians, and most recently by Mr. Helps. But there is a vigour and a reality in the hero's own simply-told tale which gives an interest to every detail. To verify throughout the spots visited by Cortes in this marvellous march through almost impenetrable forests, swampy plains, or lofty mountains, seems all but a hopeless task. Mr. Prescott, after examining the best maps of Spanish, French, and Dutch geographers, could identify no more than four or five of the places indicated by Cortes. The diary of his stout-hearted lieutenant, Bernal Diaz, gives us little additional help in this respect. M. Arthur Morelet, an enterprising French traveller, who, about ten years ago, traversed a great part of Cortes' route, either failed to recognise the landmarks indicated by him, or was without knowledge of his letter. The difficulty of representing or identifying in writing the local proper names is a main element in the problem, enhanced as it is by the fact of the record being written after an interval during which the names of Indian localities and chiefs may have escaped the writer's memory. The small village of Los Tres Cruzes, near Palenque, retains in its name some traces of his visit. We know also that he crossed the Sierra de los Pedernales by a dangerous pass, to which he gave the name of Puerto del Alabastro, and after a march of five days reached a large lake, which could be no other than the Laguna de Peten, otherwise called Itza, in the country of the warlike Lacandones. The ruins of the "teocallis," or native temples, here long marked his passage. Beyond the sites of the two towns of Naco and Nito, where the miserable relics of the former expeditions were found, little else of the route, which extended over a thousand miles, can with certainty be determined. It must have led the explorers more than once over the Rio de San Pedro, and perhaps, too, across the Uzumazinta, over one of which rivers Cortes speaks of a bridge having been thrown 934 spans in length. Native writers speak of some of these bridges being long known as Las Puentes de Cortes, though they neglect to specify their exact sites. Of the engineering skill, no less than the chivalrous spirit, patient courage, and powers of command exhibited by Cortes, through all the perils and hardships of this march, we can hardly form too high an estimate. Of his own prowess, he seems indeed all but unconscious throughout. It is the hand of Providence that extricates him from the most desperate straits. "It was after having previously commended our souls to God" that "we threw," he writes, "a bridge over a morass three hundred paces in breadth." Over these terrible morasses, from the depths of which nothing could be seen but the patch of sky over their heads, his slender party constructed within the space of about twenty leagues no fewer than fifty bridges for the passage of men and horses. His entire force at starting consisted of "ninety-three horse, besides crossbowmen and arquebusiers, and thirty and odd foot, making in all a total of 230 men." From Bernal Diaz we learn that Cortes' little force—which he raises to 250 fighting men, including Guaçacualcan and Mexican settlers—was supplemented by a butler and steward, several musicians, dancers, jugglers, and buffoons, besides the leader's personal retinue of several pages, young men of family, amongst whom was Montejo, the future conqueror of Yucatan. Cortes also enjoyed the society and aid of his famous mistress and interpreter Marina, concerning whom his own narrative keeps silence. A map furnished to him by the people of Tabasco and Xiculango enabled him to prosecute his route through the province of Çupilco to another called Çagoatan, where the provisions came to hand which he had, with much forethought, arranged to meet him. They had been forwarded in a great caravel to the mouth of the Tabasco river, and sent up the stream in native canoes. The natives, as a rule, fled at the approach of Europeans, burning their dwellings, and what Cortes terms their "mosques," even getting drowned as they crowded to cross the river, till reassured in part by his friendly overtures. He seems to have shown tolerance, with much earnest zeal, in pointing out to the Indians the errors of their idolatry, and the truth of the Catholic faith, but against cannibalism he would observe no quarter:—

It happened, however, that a Spaniard saw one of the Indians who had come with me from Tenuxtitlan eating a piece of flesh taken from the body of another Indian, whom he had killed on entering Iztapan. When the case was reported to me, I had the Indian arrested, and there, in the presence of the chief, had him burnt alive, for having slain and afterwards eaten of his fellow-creature—an abomination which your Majesty, and I myself in your royal name, have repeatedly deprecated, ordering the people of those parts to abstain from it. I therefore made the lord understand that if I punished that man with death, it was because, in disobedience to your Majesty's commands, he had slain and afterwards eaten of the flesh of his fellow-creature. That my wish was that nobody should be hurt, having been sent to those parts merely for the purpose of protecting them and taking care of their property, as well as showing them the way of worshipping one only God, who is in heaven, Creator and Maker of all things, by whose will all living creatures are governed. In order to do this, they were to relinquish all their idols and their abominable rites, because they were nothing more than lies and deceptions of the devil, who, being the sworn enemy of mankind, had devised those and other similar arts to ensure their perpetual damnation in the midst of horrible and everlasting tortures. That the devil was thus trying to lead them away from the knowledge of one only and true God, shutting them from the path of salvation, and preventing by all means in his power that they should partake of that glory and blessed happiness awaiting those who believe in God, in an abode of everlasting bliss, which the devil himself had lost owing to his disobedience and malice.

At one point, where all progress was barred by a wide and deep lagoon which it would have taken twenty days to round, the idea of a retreat gained so much ground among his Spaniards that they "almost dared," Cortes writes, "to whisper it in my presence." The hero's resource here lay in the Indian chiefs, whom he so inspired with his energy, combined with promises of reward, that they "agreed to work viribus et posse" at a bridge, over which in less than four days the whole of the men and horses passed. So solidly built was it, the writer boasts, that he had no doubt "it would stand upwards of ten years without breaking, unless it was burnt down." It was formed of upwards of one thousand beams, the smallest of which was as thick round as a man's body, and measured nine or ten fathoms in length. The construction was mainly due to the skill of the native engineers. "I can assure your Majesty," Cortes confesses, "that I do not believe there is a man in existence capable of explaining in a satisfactory manner the dexterity which these lords of Tenuxtitlan and the Indians under them displayed in constructing the said bridge. I can only say that it is the most wonderful thing that ever was seen." Cortes' despatch displays throughout his enlightened sense of the capacity, the bravery, and the loyalty of the native races, and his belief that by mild and just treatment they might be firmly attached to the Spanish rule. It is with regret that we find him on his return, while still in the monastery where he stayed six days, "until he had confessed all his sins," superseded by virtue of the royal mandate in charge of Ponce de Leon. Here the narrative ends with a manly assertion of the writer's loyalty and fidelity, as well as an indignant denial of the charges of rapacity and malversation brought against him by his enemies. In a characteristic passage, not without a tinge of irony, "from fear that His Majesty might imagine that he asked too much in order that his proposition might be rejected," he undertakes—"though the sum was hardly sufficient for his decent maintenance at Court"—to be contented with ten millions of reals of yearly revenue, surrendering to the Emperor everything he possessed in the New World. We know too well what treatment awaited the man who had enriched the Spanish monarchy with the fairest of its colonial possessions. It is a sign of the dogged resolution of Cortes that we find him closing his letter, dated at Tenuxtitlan, September 3, 1526, with the announcement of his having just started another expedition to the country he had already so laboriously traversed, in the full assurance of having shortly to apprise His Majesty of the triumphant discovery of the all-important strait. As a record of human prowess and daring, no less than a contribution to our knowledge of geography, this curious letter deserves to be read with close attention.

COUNT TELEKI.*

THE author of this volume tells us in the preface, which is dated from the Junior Carlton Club, that he has acquired his information about Jewish life from a very charming lady, the daughter of a French Hebrew banker, "who had completed her Judaism by embracing Christianity," and that its amount and kind are such as to make it, if published, "of some value both to the Biblical student and general reader." It is not very easy to pronounce what may be of some value to the general reader, because, as the proverb reminds us, there is no disputing about tastes. But if any "Biblical student" should be unfortunate enough to take up the book in expectation of gaining some valuable knowledge, he will be wofully disappointed. There are two ways in which the anonymous writer, who under a seemingly feminine sobriquet hails from the Junior Carlton, might have conveyed his information, supposing it to be worth conveying at all. The most obvious method, and certainly the most convenient for Biblical students, would have been to write a treatise on Jewish customs and ceremonies embodying the results of what his fair informant had communicated to him; or, if he was bent on soliciting the attention of "the general reader"—and we certainly cannot wonder at his despairing of any more select audience—he might have worked his facts into a tale, or series of tales, as Madame Romanoff has done in her Sketches of the Greek Church. And this is what "Eca" possibly imagines that he has done. What, however, he has really accomplished is to write a third-rate sensation novel in one volume—we are anxious to mention at the outset its sole redeeming feature—with alternate chapters on the principal festivals and services of the Jewish ritual intercalated sandwich-wise between harrowing accounts of hair-breadth escapes from mad bulls, French conspirators, and runaway horses, and rambling disquisitions on things in general, including Father Ignatius's last sermon, and the newest slang of the Turf, apparently picked up second-hand in the smoking-room of the Junior Carlton. Even in the same chapter we oscillate with perplexing rapidity between Colenso's objections to the Pentateuch, which are very summarily disposed of by the Chief Rabbi, and the prospects of the next Derby; and the hero and heroine—the latter being "a faint attempt to describe" the French banker's daughter, only she does not "complete her Judaism by embracing Christianity"—mingle the passionate utterances of their mutual love, usually clenched by three "et ceteras," with discussions on the "character and work of the Messiah" who is yet to come. The style is in strict congruity with the substance of the book. Thus we learn that Finsbury Square "looks like an oasis of uninhabitation;" and again, in reference to the religious liberty enjoyed by Jews in England, we are told that, "though prejudiced against his race with a rapidly dying-out prejudice, a Jew was free to obtain all honours in the different professions of the country." The writer probably means that, though the English people were prejudiced against Jews, they allowed them full civil equality; what he has said is, that they allowed it to such Jews as were prejudiced against their own race. Indeed his notions of language and grammatical construction lead us to fear that neither Johnson nor Lindley Murray is to be found in the library of the Junior Carlton. When the hero, Count Teleki, "drove out, it was impossible not to regard the handsome young man, in his well turned-out dark green phaeton, high-stepping bays, and quiet groom, in the dark chocolate livery of the Telekis, seated behind, with arms folded, placid as a Stoic." Whether the handsome young man or the quiet groom was placid as a Stoic we will not pause to inquire; but to us it is so "impossible" to understand how to regard any young man, handsome or not, "in high-stepping bays and a quiet groom," unless the bays had swallowed the young man and the groom swallowed the bays, that we give up the sentence in despair. When we are told, just after this, that "shyness may be called the sea-sickness of society," we are almost tempted to suggest that its absence may, in some cases at least, be called the sea-sickness of aspirants to authorship. It would be unreasonable, of course, to expect the various characters of the tale to talk better grammar than the narrator. Still, as we are expressly assured that "no more erudite scholar existed among his race" than the Rev. Dr. Hermann Bauer, the Chief Rabbi of the Jews in Great Britain, it is a little startling to find him just afterwards informing Count Teleki that "here (in England) we are met as a fellow man and a brother." It is gratifying to know, however difficult it may be to construe the statement, that even to the most lax of the Jews "there was one solemn day at which he would have been horrified had he neglected it." Whether he would have been horrified at the day, which is the meaning of the words, or at the neglect of it, which the context seems to imply, we cannot venture to pronounce.

The curiosity of our readers about Count Teleki will by this time be almost satisfied. Of Jewish "customs" they will hear exceedingly little, but they will find a tiresomely elaborate description of the principal ceremonies of Jewish worship, containing, however, very little that is not familiar even to "the general reader," or that might not easily be ascertained from the Old Testament, or from works readily accessible to every one, or from visiting a synagogue. Such scraps of information as alone are really new, and therefore of any interest, must be sought for like so many needles in a very large bundle of hay. Nor can the information always be relied upon. It is given as a striking instance of the special "boldness and carelessness of British Jews" that they talk, laugh, and discuss matters of business in the intervals of the synagogue service. Any one who has happened to visit the old synagogue of Prague, the most venerable and venerated shrine of Jewish worship in Europe, will know that this habit of talking between the alternate verses of the chant is no peculiarity of Jews in Great Britain. It is, in fact, their universal practice, whatever it may betoken of religious coldness. It is certainly curious, if true, that the general feeling of Orientals survives among the modern British Jews, and that one main reason why Jewish parents are so anxious for male issue is that no female can offer the appointed prayers for them when dead, and that in consequence they frequently adopt sons if they have none of their own. The following form of private devotion, which, we are given to understand, is recited every morning by pious Jews, is also a curiosity in its way:—

Bless the Lord, O my soul: O Lord my God, Thou art very great; Thou art clothed with honour and majesty; who coverest Thyself with light as with a garment, who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain. Behold, I prepare my body to cover myself with a commanded covering for the only sacred and blessed name and His Sh'chinah, with fear and love, with perfect unity in the name of all Israel. Behold, I come to cover myself with a vestment of fringes, to perform the precept of my Creator, as it is written, "That they make them fringes in the borders of their garments, throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of their borders a riband of blue." For blue is like the sea, and the sea is like the sky, and the sky is like the throne of glory; and as I am covering my body with fringes, so may my soul, its 248 members, and its 365 veins, be covered with the light of fringes which amounts to 613; and just as I cover myself with a talith in this world, so may I merit a Rabbinical mantle and a beautiful talith in the world to come, even in the garden of Eden; and may my soul, body, spirit, and prayer, be delivered from the external ones on account of the precept of the fringes. And may the talith spreads his wings over them, and save them; "as an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over the young." I come, therefore, to increase sanctity amongst the celestials, and to purify all wickedness and all blemishes that I have committed with my eyes, hands, and body, in this world.

It is explained that the number 613 refers to the 613 precepts of the Pentateuch, of which the most important are these three—phylacteries, fringes on the corners of garments, and the sign on the doorposts; the 248 members of the body correspond to the 248 affirmative precepts of the Law of Moses, and its 365 veins to the 365 negative precepts of the Law. The information given by the learned but ungrammatical Dr. Hermann Bauer to Count Teleki about the present condition of Jews in England would be more interesting but that it contains little that is not already known. The Chief Rabbi complains that "we are Christianizing our Judaism," and exemplifies this in several points of detail:—

"True, my son. Here you will see that in many of our communities the mode of Christian working them has been introduced. We have opened Sabbath schools and infant schools, like the Christians. We employ Scripture readers, cottage lecturers, and tract distributors, like the Christians. In many of our synagogues you will see pulpits and organs, and hear sermons in the vernacular tongue, and singing, like the Christians. We have adopted the title of the Christian clergy and their dress. All this is new.

"The constant intercourse with Christians, the influence of Christianity, is sapping the very foundation of our faith. Let us, as liberal-minded men, as scholars, not as bigots, read and examine, and inquire into the doctrines of Christianity—nay, let us borrow from it what we would think beneficial to our interests, as long as it does not militate against our holy creed. But we have not done so. We have gone beyond. We have touched pitch, and have defiled ourselves. My dear Count, see whether I am not speaking the truth after you have visited our people here."

"I regret to say that I have heard that the Hebrews in Great Britain exhibit great carelessness in religious matters," said Teleki.

"Great carelessness. In fact, many of the British Jews hardly know what Judaism is or commands. They send their children to Christian schools—to Eton, to Harrow, to Rugby; to Christian universities—to Oxford and Cambridge. They associate with Christians on terms of forbidden intimacy, dine with them, and some marry them. They are eager for civil offices in the State, entertain men of high birth at their tables, and are by them entertained, scorn the severity of our ceremonies, and in fact are Jews but in name."

It appears also that there is a schism among them, and that a Dissenting Synagogue has been opened in Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, where many unauthorized and rationalizing innovations are adopted.

But it is evident that "Eca" relies chiefly on his intermediate chapters for securing the ear of "the general reader." And it must in fairness be admitted that here his range of subjects is general enough. He is equally at home in the gilded saloons of the West-end, where "those acquainted with these matters say there are three women who know how to entertain and sixteen men who know how to dance"; and in the Sunday Rag-fair in Houndsditch, which "is about the best preparatory school for hell I know of in our metropolis, and my experience is not a limited one." It is, he remarks, "an agreeable idiosyncrasy of the polished members of the Stock Exchange" that any stranger who ventures to penetrate its sacred precincts is immediately set upon, knocked on the head, and otherwise maltreated. We think we have heard something like this before; but there is indisputable novelty in his graphic account of Count Teleki's encounter with one of these big bullies, who gets the worst of it in the end, as we gather from the following not very intelligible description of his fate:—"Uttering a howl of agony, a blood red equator divided his globe-like face, he rushed upon the Count like a madman." It is the first time we ever heard of equators, of whatever colour, uttering howls. For those who are on the look-out for a rich harvest of sensational surprises, we may add that this scene in the Stock Exchange, where Count Teleki very nearly comes to an untimely end, is not an exception, but an illustration of his career throughout the book. In the same chapter he is almost murdered by the Protestant mob who had assembled to hustle Father Ignatius in Lombard Street. In another chapter he only saves himself and the heroine from imminent peril of death by piercing a mad bull through the eyes with "an unusually long and sharp pitchfork," while in the next his life is again miraculously saved by his chesnut leaping clear over "a chasm of at least thirty feet wide." In one more passage which seems to indicate the author's estimate of the position of the Paris Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, there may possibly be a latent vein of irony, though we dare not vouch for the fact. Count Teleki is awaiting an audience with the French Emperor, who, as the Minister of the Interior informs him, "is at present engaged with the first man in Europe." The Count is vainly trying to guess who this first man in Europe is, when the Minister condescends to enlighten him:—

"Ah, but you will never guess! I will gratify your curiosity. It is the Paris correspondent of the Gushing Cadger, the first and greatest newspaper in England. I thought that would astonish you! A wonderful man! He has the entrée of the most exclusive coteries. Where you and I are never admitted—though we both perhaps flatter ourselves that we know the Paris world—he is the most intimate guest. Crowned heads call him by his Christian name. The women adore him—la jeunesse dorée here swear by him. He knows the most sacred secrets of every embassy—even treaties before they are entered into. He is the most omniscient and ubiquitous being in the world. I believe he is inspired. Not a political event occurs in Europe or has occurred—c'est un homme âgé—without him having prophesied it in his paper. He advised Bismark on the North German Confederation, wrote severe letters to the Emperor of Russia on the Polish question, foretold the fate of Maximilian in Mexico, recommended the Austrian policy in Hungary, suggested the great movements in the late Spanish revolution—in fact, everything. He now passes his time in controlling the different European and Asiatic courts, and the movements of Garibaldi, in being the arbiter of fashion at Paris, and advising the ministers and ambassadors here. And to think that such a man should condescend to write for a penny paper! Who after this can say man is proud! Ah, here he comes."

The door half opened, and a voice said—

"Well, take care of yourself—you have a bad sore throat; fishy thing that, this weather. Ta! ta!" and a gentleman issued from the Imperial apartment into the antechamber where the Minister and the Count were standing. He approached the Marquis—"Mon cher, how do!—how do! Glad to see you. Napoleon is looking infernally seedy. I've just been telling him that trying Banting doesn't do at his time of life. What he wants is plenty of horse exercise and good nourishing diet, instead of living like a hermit. Trying experiments on one's constitution after one's forty doesn't pay. So you didn't take my advice about the Jura elections. I gave you every information, told you everything what to do, but you wouldn't take it; consequence is, the Government were defeated. Your fault, my dear Marquis—entirely your fault;" and the speaker gazed at Teleki as if his look would appal him; but it did not.

"Yes," said the Marquis humbly, "the Government were defeated, I regret to say. Are you going to the Opera to-night?"

"Yes—perhaps. I'm going to dine with Wales at the Bristol this evening. I suppose that we shall go afterwards, but I don't know."

"His Royal Highness arrived last night?" said the Marquis.

"Yes. Edinburgh is coming to-morrow—devilish good fellow, I'm always glad to see him. Well I won't detain you any longer. I'm just off to see Lyons to ask him to put off his ball to Friday week instead of Tuesday, because I'm so fully engaged that evening that I shan't have even time to show myself. Ta! ta! Don't bother Nap much, because, 'pon my life, he is seedy this morning; he really must take care of himself. Adieu!" and the first man of Europe gracefully withdrew.

"A wonderful man that!" said the Marquis; "every day he becomes more wonderful."

A wonderful book that Count Teleki, we may add. Every time we take it up it becomes more wonderful to us how any one should have been found to compose, and still more to publish, it. In the concluding chapter "Eca" observes that "the presence of bridesmaids has always been associated with a certain halo of spooniness." May we venture to assure him, in accordance with his own bright example of enriching the English language, that he will always himself be associated in our recollection with a certain halo of mooniness?

CORRESPONDENCE OF NAPOLEON I.*

(Second Notice.)

IN January, 1813, a Parisian gunsmith named Pauly exhibited to a Commission of artillery officers a new musket capable of firing thirteen shots per minute. Savary, who had first seen it tried, wrote to the Emperor in most laudatory terms of its cheapness, lightness, freedom from possibilities of accident by weather, and general convenience, especially for cavalry. The Commission probably reported unfavourably of the details; but it is curious if the soldiers of the First Empire ran a narrow chance of testing the value of that rapid firing which it has been reserved for the present decad to appreciate as an imperative condition of all future military success. Early in this year Napoleon began to draw largely upon his forces in Spain for drilled and disciplined reinforcements to his Northern army; and even a few weeks before Vittoria he so little anticipated the severity of the blow that Wellington was about to strike as to bid his Minister of War look to the Peninsula as an inexhaustible nursery (pépinière inépuisable) for officers of every grade. He had received some information of a "double projet" or alternative scheme, such as the English Ministry were fond of propounding to Wellington, of a descent of 25,000 men from Lisbon upon some point of the French coast, if the English army did not attempt another advance upon Madrid; but he fatally underrated the strength and capacity of the troops and general who had beaten Masséna and Marmont, and who before the year's end were destined to overwhelm Jourdan and to beat back Soult. He believed, or professed to believe, that Joseph's forces would be strong enough, if properly handled, to check the English at every point; and indeed, after all his drafts to the North, there still remained more than 200,000 veterans in Spain. The paramount object of the moment was to show himself with the earliest spring as powerful as ever upon the side on which the misguided public opinion of the Continent might imagine that he had received a crushing blow. To produce this appearance, and as far as possible to convert the appearance into reality, he used every device with which energy, ingenuity, genius, and mendacity could supply him. To encourage his subjects and friends, he persistently refused to admit the occurrence of an misfortune in Russia, beyond a surprise suffered at the hands of the elements exceptionally conspiring against him. In a circular to Jérôme and the other dependent princes of the German Confederation, written in January, 1813, he boldly stated that the cavalry and the infantry of the Russian army had behaved ill on almost every occasion, and that the Cossacks were the only foes "qui aient bien fait dans le genre de guerre auquel ils sont propres." All Russian accounts of his losses are "a tissue of impostures, platitudes, and follies." The march to Moscow was a complete success; the retreat from Moscow was a complete success till the frost came on—and this is its history:—

Dès que je jugeai le moment opportun pour le mouvement, je marchai sur l'ennemi. Je manœuvrai sur sa gauche, je le poussai à quarante verstes et, profitant de cet avantage, j'appuyai mon mouvement sur Smolensk. J'arrivai, le 5 novembre, à Dorogobouje, par le plus beau temps possible. Je me félicitais de la situation de mes affaires; je n'avais pas laissé dans les hôpitaux plus de 500 hommes hors d'état d'être transportés: je traînais tout avec moi: je n'étais plus qu'à trois petites journées de Smolensk; l'ennemi avait été culbuté à Viazma et dispersé dans le bois. . . Mais du 5 au 7 le froid devint rigoureux: les chemins se couvraient de verglas.

The Emperor's speech to the Corps Législatif, in February, is in the same tone. The excessive and premature rigour of the winter is credited with the entire disaster which broke down a so far uninterrupted triumph:—

En peu de nuits, j'ai vu tout changer. J'ai fait de grandes pertes: elles auraient brisé mon âme si, dans ces grandes circonstances, j'avais dû être accessible à d'autres sentiments qu'à l'intérêt, à la gloire et à l'avenir de mes peuples.

The stubborn defence of the Russian Empire by her armies and her people counts for nothing in connexion with "les malheurs qu'a produits la rigueur des frimas"; and the worst punishment which Napoleon can prophesy for them as the result of the coming campaign is summed up as follows:—"Les Russes rentreront dans leur affreux climat."

Such an angry persistency in ignoring the military merits of his opponents might be called ungenerous, if Napoleon's character had ever shown even a negative relation to the quality of generosity. It may be doubted whether it was politic to lie so extravagantly even to an audience of friends; but these volumes give proof that the Emperor worked to repair his damages as energetically as he lied to conceal them. When the campaign of 1813 began, the real weakness under which he laboured, to an extent unknown in any of his former Imperial campaigns, lay in his want of cavalry. The commanders of his various corps d'armée were enjoined to handle this arm most tenderly, and never to fritter it away in the chances of an unnecessary encounter. A conscript on foot requires a far shorter preparation to become fit food for powder than a conscript centaur, whose quadruped half must be a seasoned five-year-old to stand the hardships of a campaign. The annihilation of the cavalry of the Grand Army in Russia had been testified by the last paragraphs of the 29th bulletin, in the mention of the "escadron sacré" of 600 mounted officers, which at last formed the Emperor's personal escort, and in which generals acted as captains, and colonels as corporals. The French bulletin after Lutzen alleges inferiority of cavalry as the cause why no more prisoners were taken on that day:—

Au commencement de la bataille, l'Empereur avait dit aux troupes: "C'est une bataille d'Égypte. Une bonne infanterie soutenue par de l'artillerie doit savoir se suffire."

The hard-won victories of Bautzen-Wurschen were equally ineffective, from the want of the same arm, or from the stubborn metal of the enemy's troops; and one of the mainsprings of Napoleon's anxiety for a two months' armistice after those battles was his desire to gain time for the re-establishment of his cavalry on an adequate scale, to make the results of a victory as profitable to him as of old. The glancing cannon-ball which mortally wounded Duroc, in Napoleon's presence, on the last of these two bloody days, has brightened this correspondence with one of the most graceful, as it was probably one of the most sincere, expressions of affection ever uttered by Napoleon:—

La mort du duc de Frioul m'a peiné. C'est depuis vingt ans la seule fois qu'il n'ait pas deviné ce qui pouvait me plaire.

Neither anxiety for the armistice or what is to follow, nor the need of gratifying his spleen by abuse of the inconceivable meanness, selfishness, insolence, and perfidy of Austria (now balancing between France and the Allies, until the news of Vittoria startled the ear of Europe) occupy Napoleon too vividly to permit him to keep strict watch over the etiquette of the court of his youthful Empress at Paris. The following peremptory note, enjoining upon her a due maintenance of Imperial state, is curious, and it is odd that any such note should have been necessary:—

Madame et chère amie, j'ai reçu la lettre par laquelle vous m'avez fait connaître que vous avez reçu l'archichancelier étant au lit: mon intention est que, dans aucune circonstance et sous aucun prétexte, vous ne receviez qui que ce soit étant au lit. Cela n'est permis que passé l'âge de trente ans.

Nor is the Empress to make herself too common by indiscriminately assisting at religious functions or thanksgivings for every successive victory. A graceful act of gratitude, for once, is not to be repeated till it becomes an habitual necessity. "Avec un peuple comme le nôtre, il faut plus de tenue que cela." Cambacérès, as Archchancellor, must look to this, and must also see that, when a Te Deum is to be sung, it is sung in due time, lest it should become irrelevant and out of date:—

Je désire qu'en général le Te Deum soit chanté le dimanche qui suit immédiatement la réception de la nouvelle. Le retard n'a que des inconvénients: la guerre a ses chances. Il serait ridicule de chanter un Te Deum pour une victoire, lorsque, dans l'intervalle, on aurait appris une défaite.

Next day this mighty student of effect could find time to write to Cambacérès, at length, an order for the transmission of a select theatrical corps from Paris to Dresden, to impose upon Europe. "Je désire assez que cela fasse du bruit dans Paris, puisque cela ne pourra faire qu'un bon effet à Londres et en Espagne, en y faisant croire que nous nous amusons à Dresde. La saison est peu propre à la comédie"—and amusement in itself is a matter of indifference. The trick is therefore to be done as cheaply, but as noisily and effectively, as can be. We may be permitted to doubt whether the "bon effet" in London or in Spain would ever have been worth the trouble. M. Baussé, the directeur of the French Company which followed Napoleon into Russia, was no doubt there as a make-believe "que nous nous amusions à Moscou"; but he did not stave off the necessity of retreating, nor enliven the miseries of the retreat. It was more to the purpose to direct Augereau and Eugène, who commanded the armies of observation in Bavaria and Italy, to lose no opportunity of publishing exaggerated puffs of the strength of their respective commands:—

Faites mettre dans les journaux de Francfort et autres, à mesure que les bataillons arriveront, que beaucoup de troupes venant d'Espagne passent le Rhin, et que cette armée est encore plus belle et plus vieille que celle qui s'est distinguée à Lützen et à Wurschen; enfin, faites le plus de bruit que vous pourrez. Au lieu de corps d'observation, dites votre armée. Faites mettre dans les journaux le nom du général Pennetz, commandant en chef votre artillerie: faites y mettre le nom du général Dode, qui commande le génie: faites-y mettre aussi le nom des généraux qui commandent vos divisions, afin que dès la fin de juin l'Allemagne ait les yeux fixés sur vous et s'occupe beaucoup de la formation de votre armée.

In fact, both in Lombardy and on the Main, the stage manœuvre of marching the army round and round by the back of the scene was to be practised as extensively as possible during the armistice, to throw dust in the still undecided eyes of Austria. We have already noted the calculated indignation of the most selfish of historical potentates at the so-called selfishness of Austrian policy. Before Bautzen, he would have been ready to make peace with Russia, and even with Prussia, which had already turned against him, so that he might deal with Austria by herself as an intending traitress:—

Si j'ai des sacrifices à faire, j'aime mieux que ce soit au profit de l'empereur russe, qui me fait bonne guerre, et du roi de Prusse, auquel la Russie s'intéresse, qu'au profit de l'Autriche, qui a trahi l'alliance, et qui, sous le titre de médiateur, veut s'arroger le droit de disposer de tout, après avoir fait la part qui lui convient.

The celebrated conversation between Napoleon and Metternich during the negotiations of June, 1813, is reproduced in this correspondence from the report of Fain, the Emperor's secretary. In diplomacy as in war, it was Napoleon's great principle déboucher en masse; and the angry torrent of accusation against Austria for every political step taken by her in any direction but that of servile alliance with France, burst in its whole volume upon Metternich's head before Napoleon would allow him to reply. "Cette attaque était vive"—remarks the recording secretary—"M. de Metternich se jette à la traverse avec un attirail complet de phrases diplomatiques." The Emperor interrupts him with: "How much do you want for neutrality? Will Illyria satisfy you?" and commences a noisy and abusive chaffering, of which this is the peroration:—

Et c'est quand mes drapeaux flottent encore aux bouches de la Vistule et sur les rives de l'Oder, quand mon armée triomphante est aux portes de Berlin et de Breslau, quand de ma personne je suis ici à la tête de trois cent mille hommes, que l'Autriche, sans coup férir, sans même tirer l'épée, se flatte de me faire souscrire à de telles conditions! Sans tirer l'épée! cette prétention est un outrage! Et c'est mon beau-père qui accueille un tel projet! c'est lui qui vous envoie! Dans quel attitude veut-il donc me placer en présence du peuple français? Il s'abuse étrangement s'il croit qu'un trône mutilé puisse être en France un refuge pour sa fille et son petit-fils! Ah! Metternich, combien l'Angleterre vous a-t-elle donné pour vous décider à jouer ce rôle contre moi?

Even the skilled diplomatist could hardly keep his temper at this insolently outspoken personality:—

M. de Metternich a changé de couleur: un profond silence succède, et l'on continue de marcher à grands pas. Le chapeau de l'Empereur est tombé à terre: on passe et repasse plusieurs fois devant. Dans toute autre situation, M. de Metternich se serait empressé de le relever: l'Empereur le ramasse lui-même.

A very pretty touch of the by-play of the scene, which naturally struck the fancy of the courtly secretary. Napoleon's virtuous indignation did not prevent him from playing his last card with his usual coolness:—"En congédiant M. de Metternich, l'Empereur a soin de lui dire que la cession de l'Illyrie n'est pas son dernier mot." But two days before, on the 21st of June, the battle of Vittoria had been fought and won; and the French soldiery were pouring in wild disorder out of Spain, while Napoleon and Metternich were marching up and down by the neglected hat upon the floor. By the 1st of July the news had reached Dresden, and the trusted Duke of Dalmatia was already starting post-haste to cross Germany and France incognito, to assume entire command, as the Emperor's lieutenant-general, of the French armies in Spain and the Pyrenees. To keep the magnitude of the misfortune as secret as possible, Napoleon gave Soult the strictest orders that not a single officer from the beaten French army should be allowed to come north of Bayonne. The fraternal puppet who still wore the crown of Spain was forbidden to interfere in military matters. Pampeluna and St. Sebastian were to be delivered, and the English thrown back across the Ebro. But with unaccustomed sincerity Napoleon avowed that for once he was ignorant how far his fortunes had been damaged, and how soon it might be possible to repair them. "Je suis encore," he writes, rather plaintively, on the 5th of July, to the War-Office in Paris, "dans l'obscur des événements, et je ne sais pas encore bien ce qui s'est passé." The little show of amusements and French comedies at Dresden had decidedly not produced its legitimate effect at London or in Spain, and even Soult was not destined to retrieve the disaster, though Napoleon could have sent no one more likely to do so, except himself.

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.*

NOVELISTS are obviously beginning to experience an increasing scarcity of game in their ancient hunting-grounds. Every rank of English society has been ransacked for new characters; every variety of incident recorded in the Morning Post or the Newgate Calendar has been appropriated; and it is no wonder if authors feel a certain difficulty about serving up once more the dreary old bill of fare. Men of genius have the special prerogative of making old things new; but as, unluckily, very few novelists are men or women of genius, they must for the most part be content with humbler expedients, and try to tempt our appetite by some slight variation on the old-established dishes. The author of the Sacristan's Household has tried the plan of flavouring her pages with sauer-kraut, and, though that excellent vegetable is generally repulsive to English stomachs, we think that on the present occasion the experiment has been very successful. There is, of course, the disadvantage about all novels of foreign life, that it is difficult to establish a perfect sympathy between readers and writers on a ground with which neither can be thoroughly familiar; the writer moves constrainedly, and the reader does not easily seize the force of the situations. A German, too, might detect enough inaccuracies in the local colour to injure his pleasure in the story; especially an inhabitant of Lippe-Detmold—in which little principality the scene is detailed—might be induced to complain of the English lady who has drawn his country from the life without even condescending to throw over it the usual veil of a fictitious name. Speaking, however, as Englishmen comparatively indifferent to the minute accuracy of a portrait of Lippe-Detmold, and not over-anxious that the Fatherland itself should be described with pedantic adherence to facts, we may admit ourselves to be very well satisfied. German life has obvious advantages for a novelist of the domestic order. The quiet old provincial life which supplied some of our most charming writers has become too much a thing of the past. Fielding's country alehouses and Miss Austen's country mansions have been pretty much swept away. George Eliot's descriptions in Silas Marner or the Mill on the Floss refer avowedly to a past generation. But in the German villages past which the British tourist generally hurries at express speed there still lingers a good quiet comfortable life, very picturesque from the outside and incredibly dull within. Phlegmatic farmers, and priggish professors, and intensely stiff gentlemen of any number of quarterings thrive there as placidly as the old carp in the ponds of Fontainebleau. Upon these, and such as these, the author of the Sacristan's Household has cast her net, and has brought up many quaint and picturesque characters.

She sets her actors to work with much quiet humour and great keenness of perception. One of the principal personages in her book is the crabbed old Sacristan who gives his name to the story, and who is the oracle of the nightly club in the speise-saal of the Pied Lamb at the village of Horn. He holds to the simple creed that every change is for the worse, and answers all cavillers by the conclusive argument that he is seventy-nine years of age. Then we have the fat old landlord, whose theory is that all conversation, especially upon politics, is an interruption to good company, and that men should be content with smoking and drinking beer. There is the cunning old Justizrath, who gradually works his way upwards by professing utter absence of mind, and under shelter of his apparent dreaminess sucking into his capacious memory every waif and stray of gossip that floats past him, like some voracious cuttlefish lying half hid in the sand. Then we have glimpses of the sublime society of Detmold, the hochwohlgeborne dignitaries and their wives, who form a little clique of the very purest cream of mankind, guarding more jealously against all intrusion into their sacred circle than the most exclusive set in our "bloated aristocracy." Amongst secondary characters are the well-to-do farmers, with shrewish wives plaguing their souls on washing-days and ruling their households with a rod of iron, and various subsidiary persons—each of whom, however, is skilfully though slightly touched—in the shape of foresters, charcoal-burners, and the various hangers-on of the more important actors. The plot which sets this little world in action centres upon a gallant young forester who takes part in the war of 1866, and a charming German maiden, to whom he is happily united in the last chapter of the story. Before making any criticisms upon the story we may say that the general effect is excellent. It is pleasant when living in London to dwell upon these pictures of sleepy domestic existence. Many people would indeed hold that life in a penal settlement or in Pentonville Penitentiary would be hardly more tiresome in the long run than a banishment to these stagnant backwaters of modern society. German villages may be the homes of every virtue, but they are not attractive places of residence to an Englishman of modern tastes. It is all the more agreeable to read about them, and to realize the fact that there are still places where the inhabitants never read newspapers, and regard the outside world much as a benevolent cow looks at a railway-train. Bread-and-butter is rather an insipid food when it forms our only article of diet; but we are glad to see children enjoying it, and may even fancy at cynical moments that we could be content to limit ourselves to the same innocent mode of satisfying our appetites. Novels which are designed to give us a glimpse of such scenes are a very pleasant interruption to stories of murder and bigamy and fast young ladies and gentlemen. We ought to say that they are more moral; but the question might be raised whether we do not show as sophisticated a taste when we admire pictures of calm repose as when we indulge in a bit of pure excitement. It is a more refined mode of enjoyment, but may possibly resemble the admiration with which a dissolute man of the world sometimes regards the innocence which he certainly does not share. This, however, is merely a hint thrown out for the benefit of philosophical critics. For the present, we are content to say that the Sacristan's Household is really an excellent description of village life in Germany, which may be conscientiously recommended to the lovers of the domestic novel.

We have, however, as yet, said nothing about the story; and this deserves a passing notice, because it illustrates a weak point of most English novelists. The author has set herself, as we have seen, to describe people of the most ordinary type. There is nothing very brave or very eccentric or very startling in any way. It is perfectly possible to compose a thoroughly satisfactory work of art from such materials, and indeed the author has to a great extent succeeded. Her success, however, would have been much less equivocal if she had taken a plot more suitable to the actors. People die and are married and are sent to the wars in real life; and with a few of the incidents which actually occur, a very sufficient machinery for the exhibition of character might have been constructed. We would pass over without opposition a little bit of romance in a German story such as is made out of a deserted lodge in a forest and a half-insane charcoal-burner turning up after an irregular and mysterious fashion. But it is rather too bad to be bothered with one of the very stalest of all the unfortunate plots that have done duty for successive generations of novelists. It was surely unnecessary that the heroine should turn out all of a sudden to be the daughter of a nobleman, and the heiress to a princely fortune. On a moderate computation, this startling incident must have been used some thousands of times within the last half-century. From the very first hint that is given we know all about it, and feel a certain irritation at having so stale an expedient passed off upon us, and that at the very time when we are being introduced to a comparatively new set of scenery and characters. Our objection, however, is not so much that the device is terribly stale, nor that it is wildly improbable, nor even, although this is perfectly true, that it introduces a gratuitous difficulty into the conclusion of the story. The fortune bestowed upon the heroine makes the reconciliation of the hero to his family an apparently mercenary affair on their part, and brings him into awkwardly close connexion with certain dignitaries who have previously treated him with contempt. Nor do we even complain chiefly because it gives a certain vulgarity to the catastrophe, by changing the natural conclusion, and implying that a virtuous pair of peasants could not be happy without a fortune. These objections to a device which, if critics had any legislative authority, would long ago have been forbidden to novelists, are for the most part common to all stories in which it occurs. But in this case there is the special objection that it is entirely out of keeping with the general air of the novel. When we are invited to take an interest in the fortunes of a labouring-man, or of one a few stages above him, we are perfectly willing to do so; and there is the great advantage that, without any strain upon our credulity, he may be exposed to much severer trials than the class from which heroes are generally recruited. But then he must be the labouring-man of real life, not the picturesque peasant of operas and melo-dramas. The condition of success is that the treatment of the story should be thoroughly realistic, and should rely upon touching us by the ordinary joys and sorrows of genuine working-men. So soon as they turn out to be princes in disguise, we feel that the author has shrunk from the self-imposed task, and has endeavoured to impose upon our sympathies. Some of George Sand's stories of peasant life are models of the proper treatment of such a theme, and might be studied with great advantage by English authors who draw from similar models. We feel no doubt that the author of the Sacristan's Household would be capable of doing much better in this respect. The hero of her story distinguishes himself by a feat which was actually performed by a Prussian sentry in the late war, who held his place in a belfry for two days after having been forgotten on the advance of his regiment. For this he is very properly rewarded by a forester's place. If this had been his sole reward, and all the nonsense about his bride's unexpected fortune had been omitted, the end would have been far more satisfactory, and we should have had little fault to find with what, as it is, is a very good story.

CHURCH HISTORY FOR THE YOUNG.*

WE do not profess to have read every word of this book; but we have read enough to be able to say that it is much better than might have been expected from its first sentence. That first sentence did indeed take our breath away:—

* A History of the English Church, from its Foundation to the Reign of Queen Mary. In Two Parts. Addressed to the Young. By M. C. S. Oxford and London: Parker & Co. 1869.

> You know, my dear children, you have read in your History of England that many hundred years ago Julius Cæsar, the great Roman general, came over with his soldiers, and conquered the English people, who, you remember, were then called Britons.

This, in 1869, really was too much, and we were very near going no further. But a strong sense of duty drove us on, and we are bound to say that, especially when we get into the second part, the author shows some degree of knowledge of the subject, enough at least to make so portentous an opening the more amazing. The first part, we are told, is meant for mere children, while the second is for readers a little more advanced in years. But is that any reason why the children should be regaled with nonsense, while the sense is kept back for the elder boys and girls? Now if one wished of set purpose to make a child thoroughly misunderstand all English history, it would be impossible to find a better way and means thereto than the sentence which we have quoted. A child could not be more carefully put on the wrong scent than by being told that "the English people" were, in the time of Cæsar, "called Britons." The same writer would probably be amazed to be told that the Turkish people in the time of Miltiades were called Greeks, and it would be thought not only strange but profane to say that the Hebrews, in the time of Abraham, were called Amorites. Yet, considering that the Canaanites, whatever was their origin, most certainly spoke the same language as the Hebrews, a philologist would think this last proposition far less startling than the identification of Britons with Englishmen. Now in these ecclesiastical books, besides the usual sources of confusion, there is always that special source of confusion, the supposed necessity of saying something about that bugbear and spectre of true historians, the "ancient British Church." English nationality is ruthlessly sacrificed on the altar of a handful of Welsh Bishops, who kept Easter at some fancy time of their own. Our present writer is not quite so grotesque as Mr. O'Dell Travers Hill, who blamed Augustine for seeking consecration in Gaul, and not at the hands of some of "the numerous English Bishops." But such a beginning leads to things which are quite queer enough. We have of course all the usual babble about "Saxons," "Saxon this," "Saxon the other," which people really ought to be beginning to leave off in 1869. We suppose there is no nation but ourselves which takes such infinite pains to prove that it is not itself, but somebody else. And after all, writers of this sort commonly miss the real ecclesiastical link which unites Briton and Englishman. They go chattering about British Bishops of York and London, and, may be, Eldad of Gloucester to boot, but they forget that Glastonbury was a real instance of a British ecclesiastical foundation which lived through the English Conquest.

We have hardly recovered from the shock in the first page when, on getting some way on, we come to the mention of a person whom Alcuin (Ealhwine) met "while travelling in Italy," and who is described as "the celebrated French Emperor Charlemagne." Directly after, we are told that "France had been for a long time in a very unsettled state," and we forgot to say that, some time earlier, Æthelberht was married to "the daughter of a French King." Now this sort of thing sets one thinking. The writer of this book is by no means grossly stupid or grossly ignorant; the book is by no means one of those books which are a mere heap of blunders, for it is written with much more care and much more intelligence than most books for the young. And yet its author first makes Cæsar come against "the English people, who were then called Britons," and then talks about "the celebrated French Emperor Charlemagne." How is it that a person who clearly has a very fair knowledge of the mere facts can be so utterly confused as to the force and bearing of facts? Is it simply that people write without thinking what they are writing, or does the author of this book seriously believe that Charles the Great talked French? For we may mark that the phrase "French Emperor" is bad beyond the average degree of badness. Most of our tormentors are satisfied with turning the great German into a "King of France," and making him, rightly enough, go to Rome to be crowned Emperor of something or other, they are not very clear what, but at least something different from France. But here we see "Charles Augustus crowned by God" distinctly turned into a "French Emperor," as naturally as if he had dissolved a National Assembly, fired his cannon down the streets of Paris, and sent off his surviving enemies to Cayenne. Are we to suppose that there are people who have, in a kind of way, a decent knowledge of the facts of history, who know something about battles and genealogies and religious changes, but who never stop to think about the facts of language, and who never so much as look at a Spruners map? And let us not be met by the ever-recurring cry that the book is a child's book, and that we must not look for minute accuracy of expression in a child's book. In a child's book we certainly do not look for full and exhaustive treatment, but we do look for the minutest accuracy of expression on every point. In truth minute accuracy is nowhere so absolutely necessary as in a child's book, because a child takes the first impressions which are given him; he has no means of correcting them, and, if his first impressions are wrong, all his ideas may be warped for life. A child's book must leave much to be learned, but it ought to leave nothing to be unlearned. And we must again repeat that sound and accurate views of things are not harder to a child than inaccurate ones, but really much simpler and easier. To children of the least intelligence the phenomena of race and language are singularly attractive, and are taken in with the greatest ease. It is simply to the teacher who has to unlearn that they seem hard; to the child who has only to learn they are perfectly easy. The true relation of the English nation and the English language to the cognate nations and languages can be made perfectly clear to a child, while the common confused gabble about the English people in Cæsar's time being called Britons, and about Romans, Britons, Saxons, and Normans, can never be made clear to anybody, because it has no meaning at all.

Yet, as we have already said, the writer of this book has a fair notion of many things, and has evidently taken far greater pains both to be fair and to be accurate than is at all usual in books of this kind. To take one instance out of many, it is a crumb of comfort to find a book of this sort which, while fully awake to the evil deeds of King John, is also fully awake to the fact that he was not a usurper of the Crown. And we take kindly to an ecclesiastical book which does not run off into extravagant partisanship in any direction. Our author honestly tries to be fair to Dunstan and Thomas and other ecclesiastical worthies, and the attempt is not unsuccessful. A very decent mean is kept between depreciation and adoration. And, as with particular persons, so too with the general subject. The mediæval Church is not painted with the colours of Murphy or Mr. Whalley, nor yet is it set up to be worshipped with the frantic worship of the last young curate or young nobleman who has forsaken the communion of Anselm and Winchelsey for the communion of Archbishop Manning. Our author, though incapable of understanding that the English nation has always been the English nation, fully understands that the English Church always has been the English Church. Even the "ancient British Church" is not very offensively dragged in. Though the book does throw off with a flourish about Britons and Druids, yet the author is not so stiff-necked as to deny that the English Church had its origin from Rome, and not from Wales. And our author fully realizes that the Church presided over by Dr. Tait is the same body as the Church which was founded by Augustine. No one ought now to disguise this plain fact, since even the Times has recognised it; we do not mean in its grotesque article on the Archbishop's installation, but in the two really remarkable criticisms which it devoted to Mr. Blunt's History of the Reformation. Yet we were surprised, and, as nothing does a good cause more harm than a bad argument on its behalf, we were sorry to see, not any ordinary babbler, but a scholar and lawyer like Mr. G. O. Morgan, stoop the other night in the House of Commons to talk the exploded conventional sort of talk about mediæval endowments being given not to the Church of England but to the Church of Rome. We suppose that there are people who sincerely fancy that, at the mysterious time called "the Reformation," a mass of property was taken from one religious body and given to another religious body. That anybody should think so is almost more wonderful than that anybody should think that Charles was "a French Emperor," or that Cæsar found the English people in Britain. But it is plain that people do think so; only a man in Mr. Morgan's position should not encourage them in so strange a belief.

Our author is, we need hardly say, High Church in all things, but it is with a hearty Anglican High Churchmanship, which in no way leads to the Pope. Cranmer is let off very favourably; Edward the Sixth is a marked favourite; Henry the Eighth is treated at least with fairness. But the writer should have known better than to fancy that the execution—will Mr. Froude let us call it the murder or the martyrdom?—of Abbot Whiting had anything to do with taking the oath of supremacy. This is one of the queerest delusions that we know, and yet it is very common. The mistake is one much more serious than a mistake about the particular charge brought against a particular person. People who fancy that Whiting was condemned for denying the King's supremacy show that they fancy that the King's supremacy was a matter of dispute as late as 1540. The source of the confusion of course is this; the King's supremacy was established at the Reformation, and the monasteries were destroyed at the Reformation, and the Reformation was an event which happened in some particular year, though what particular year it was is not generally known. When our author calls Calvin a "Swiss Reformer," the modern map is doubtless in fault. Did not Calvin live at Geneva, and is not Geneva in Switzerland? But when we remember that a more famous writer than "M. C. S." thought it possible to become "a Swiss Bishop"—and that at Curia Rhætorum—in the second century, we need not be hard on the belief that Calvin was a Swiss Reformer. Moreover, did not David Hume, finding that Lanfranc came from Pavia, look in his map to see where Pavia was, and, finding that it was in the Duchy of Milan, pronounce Lanfranc to have been "a Milanese monk"? But to go back to earlier times, our author in telling, or rather not telling, the story about Ealdred and his rhymes, > Hightest thou Urse?

> Have thou God's curse, transfers the tale from Worcester to Winchester, a city with which Ealdred never had anything to do. More amazing still is it to read that Ealdred "founded the Bishoprics of Gloucester and Ripon." As for Gloucester, some allowance must be made for the palpable obscurity which seems to enwrap that city—an obscurity which made Mr. Froude confound it with Worcester, and made the Times confound it with Bristol. What Ealdred really did at Gloucester was to rebuild the minster and—scandal said—to filch away some of the estates of the Abbey. As for the

MR. SUMNER ON THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.

MR. SUMNER has, in his elaborate speech in the Senate, recapitulated with fluent acrimony all the accusations and all the pretexts for animosity which have during several years been devised and collected by his countrymen. It would be useless to reiterate, in reply to his indictment against England, the arguments which he leaves absolutely unnoticed. If it were Mr. SUMNER'S object to precipitate a war, he could not be more bitter or more unjust. According to his own paradoxical statement, he desires not to inflame angry passions, but to promote peace and concord by rejecting a treaty which would not satisfy American demands. He argues that it is useless to terminate a quarrel by an arrangement which would not content the offended party. The converse error of imposing intolerable conditions of reconciliation appears not to enter into his consideration. In plain words, he insists that the Americans shall have their own way, with the alternative of implacable hostility to England; nor are the requisitions which he suggests as the basis of future negotiation moderate enough to be seriously proposed. To the total amount of the Alabama claims Mr. SUMNER, in his estimate of damages, adds an arbitrary sum for the loss inflicted generally on American commerce; and, as if he feared that some English Government might be induced to concede both demands, he further asserts that England is liable for the costs incurred by the supposed prolongation of the war during one, two, or three years. In a novel by the late Mr. SAVAGE, a malcontent Irishman demanded the restoration of Stonehenge, which, as he asserted, had in some prehistoric age been transported by lawless invaders from the Curragh of Kildare to Salisbury Plain. The advantage, as he explained to his friends, of his novel grievance was that, since it could never be remedied, it would last for ever. In a similar spirit Mr. SUMNER requires an abject apology from England, to be accompanied by the payment of a sum which may be moderately estimated at two or three hundred millions sterling. It is scarcely possible that a grave and experienced politician can have attached so extravagant a price to the conclusion of the controversy, except with the deliberate purpose of rendering a settlement impossible. In his rhetorical invective Mr. SUMNER exaggerates every element in the dispute, except, indeed, that which is its real origin and motive, the ill-will of his countrymen to England. From first to last, notwithstanding his conventional professions, he seems to be wholly actuated by a spirit of revenge. The absurd charge that the Alabama captures prolonged the war for a year, for a month, or for a day has been but recently invented. It would perhaps have seemed too monstrous, while the great Eastern and Western campaigns were fresh in general memory, to pretend that three or four successive invasions of Virginia were repelled because a solitary cruiser, which had escaped from an English port, was seizing American merchant vessels on different parts of the high seas.

Mr. SUMNER may perhaps believe that the recognition of belligerency was a proof of unfriendly feelings, and yet nothing is more certain than that the English Government issued the proclamation with a genuine and earnest desire to avoid any offence to American susceptibility. As the motives of the act have been not unnaturally misapprehended, it is necessary to rely on the undoubted fact that the English Government was exercising an indisputable right. The blockade which had been previously proclaimed by the President of the UNITED STATES is conclusive evidence of the existence of a war, although Mr. SUMNER misrepresents the argument of his opponents when he affects to believe that their justification rests exclusively on a single admission. It was, according to Mr. SUMNER, a mere verbal mistake to announce a blockade when the Government might have closed the Southern ports by Executive authority; but a decree by which the ports were closed could have created no right to capture on the high seas vessels which might be bringing munitions of war to the Confederates. It was for the purpose of guarding against such a difficulty that Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. SUMNER deliberately proclaimed a blockade, estopping themselves, according to a subsequent judgment of the Supreme Court, from a denial that a state of war actually existed. As might have been expected, Mr. SUMNER leaves unnoticed the unanimous assent of all European Governments to the neutral policy of England. The French recognition of belligerent rights was issued on the same day, in the same words; and within two or three weeks every maritime Power, including Russia, committed in the same form the same wrong which is exclusively imputed to England. At that time there was little difference of opinion on either side of the Atlantic that the disruption of the American Federation was complete and final. It is true that the conclusion was erroneous, but the Confederacy held undisputed possession of its own territory, and it was evident that, according to the universal opinion, State ties were more binding than Federal allegiance. If any kingdom in the civilized world had been split into two parts in similar circumstances, the American Government would have recognised, not only its belligerent rights, but its political independence.

Mr. SUMNER'S fairness in discussing the question of the Alabama is illustrated by his attack on the English Government with reference to the Liverpool steam-rams. The complaint that one cruiser escaped from the Mersey is mixed up with a complaint respecting two vessels which were not allowed to escape. It is notorious that, in its desire to do substantial justice, the Government trespassed beyond the verge of a law which is precisely the same in England and in the United States. The Court of Exchequer had given judgment against the Government in the case of the Alexandra, and it was only in well-founded reliance on the support of Parliament that Lord PALMERSTON and Lord RUSSELL ventured to prevent the despatch of the vessels. As these rams, in fact, neither left the harbour, nor at any time caused any damage to American commerce, it is strange that they should furnish an item to the long list of unfounded accusations against England. The speech itself is from first to last thoroughly consistent in injustice. The secession was, as Mr. SUMNER truly says, in the first instance partly encouraged by the hope that England would recognise the independence of the South. In the cant American phrase, Cotton was King, and England would prove her loyalty to her economic sovereign by employing her fleets and armies in aid of the cotton-growing Confederacy. That the expectation was signally disappointed no ignorant person could learn from Mr. SUMNER. If a man complained that a capitalist whom he regarded as his friend had advanced money to start against him a trading competitor, it would be thought a sufficient defence that the application had been urgently made and positively refused. In controversies with England, American disputants regard fact and logic with impartial contempt.

It was not thought necessary to explain the entire change of American feeling and opinion during the course of a single year. Whatever may have been Mr. SUMNER'S private judgment, he concurred with the rest of the Senate in approving the nomination of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, in the distinct understanding that he was to negotiate a treaty virtually identical with that which has been now rejected. At that time Republicans and Democrats were agreed that the case was proper for arbitration, nor had they dreamed of the outrageous fiction that England had become liable for the evil of one or two years of war. The unwise speeches of the American Minister at English public dinners can scarcely account for the outbreak of hatred which finds an eloquent and sympathetic exponent in Mr. SUMNER; but there is little advantage in attempting to account for a state of things which, however it may have been caused, indisputably exists. In another year the passions which Mr. SUMNER stimulates may have partially subsided, or they may have expanded into a declaration of war and an invasion of Canada. There is perhaps no example of a war undertaken solely for purposes of vengeance, nor would an attempt at territorial conquest be a disinterested expression of sentiment. There is no other quarter in which England is especially vulnerable in a contest with America; but the great resources of the United States, unscrupulously employed, would undoubtedly cause injury and suffering, not without heavy cost to the wrongdoer. If such a result is to be produced, either by design or by the unforeseen operation of hostile feelings, reasoning would have no effect in averting a lamentable crime and misfortune. From the beginning of the discussion the only hope of a solution was to be found in an appeal to the doctrines of international law, or in the discretion of an indifferent arbitrator. Although the arguments which induced Lord RUSSELL to decline a reference have never been confuted it is now generally admitted that the concession which was afterwards made by Lord STANLEY was judicious; but for every step which the English Government has advanced, the Americans have receded to twice the distance. Short of war, it impossible to go further than Mr. SUMNER in a hostile direction.

THE IRISH LAND QUESTION.

THAT astonishing personage the Mayor of CORK continues his official career in a manner which, even in Ireland seems to be recognised as rather unusual. He has been presiding at a parting banquet to two of the silly blustering adventurers whom the misplaced clemency of the Government has recently released from imprisonment. The sentiments of the Mayor on the subject of these popular heroes and of their fellows are startling in an official. He thinks that O'FARRELL was one of the noblest men Ireland ever produced, simply because he tried to kill a son of the QUEEN. When a Mayor has got as far as this, it is no use noticing outpourings of treason in less responsible people. And certainly Ireland is in a most extraordinary state just now. Men of position and character who are not known to have given any offence, and who are respected and liked by their neighbours, are every day shot down at the threshold of their homes. Prince ARTHUR's visit to Londonderry has ended in a fatal riot, and it may be an anxious subject of thought with him that perhaps some great and glorious patriot may be inspired by the Mayor of CORK with the idea that the deed of the high-minded O'FARRELL may be imitated, rivalled, and possibly surpassed in success. Naturally every one is talking of Ireland, and of scarcely anything else, and this week the Lords have had their say on the Irish Land question. The predominant characteristic of the debate, as of most debates in the Upper House, was its singular asperity. The feeling which appears to animate the Peers is not so much one of party violence as of personal bitterness. There is not much done in the Upper House, and not much said. The necessity which the Lords feel of dining punctually at eight precludes long discussion. But the little that is said is hot and strong. Were it not for the unruffled blandness of Lord GRANVILLE the debates in the Lords would present an unbroken flood of acrimony, jealousy, and hostility. Last Session the Lords were furious to a degree that dispelled altogether the popular illusion that the Upper House is the sphere of calm and serene political wisdom. The fires that burnt then can scarcely be said to be smouldering now. They blaze up on the slightest provocation, and we may expect that when the Irish Church Bill reaches the Lords, the Peers will show their volcanic ardour without restraint. They are warming up already under the pretext of discussing the harmless measure proposed by Lord CLANRICARDE for the settlement of Tenant Right. Showers of abuse have been poured upon the Government because they object to committing themselves to support a fragmentary and imperfect mode of dealing with a great, deep, and complex question. On both sides some injustice is displayed, and some weakness of argument is apparent. Lord GRANVILLE gave a long list of the work which the Government has cut out for Parliament this Session, and he asked how it could be said that, with so much before them, the Government could be thought bound to add an Irish Land Bill. This could convince no one. The Government has itself implanted in the public mind the persuasion that there must be a settlement of the standing difficulties regarding Irish land, which shall be much more radical than any hitherto attempted. They have given additional urgency and weight to a question which anyhow must have been of primary importance. If they could have settled the Irish Land question this Session, they cannot excuse themselves for deferring that settlement because they have brought in a variety of Bills on all kinds of subjects. Their real defence is that, in selecting the Irish Church Bill as the main Irish Bill of the Session, they may have made the right selection. On the other hand, nothing can be more unfair than to ask them to commit themselves to a premature exposition of the heads of the Bill which they would bring in for settling the Irish Land question, if they were going to bring in one at all. A Government can only carry a great measure by keeping silence as to all details until they invite the attention of Parliament in a serious manner to a Bill which must be accepted or rejected. Much of the success which has attended the introduction of the Irish Church Bill in the House of Commons is due to the fact that no one knew what Ministers were going to do until they brought forward a measure complete in itself, based throughout on consistent principles, and every clause and detail of which bore the marks of careful thought and nice adjustment. As they are not going to deal with the Irish Land question this year, they necessarily fall back on mere general expressions. They allege that they see the necessity for dealing with Irish land on a scale and in a manner hitherto unattempted. On the other hand, they pledge themselves to propose no scheme inconsistent with what Conservatives and political economists consider to be the legitimate rights of private property. How they are to reconcile what many people consider irreconcileable views is their secret, just as it was their secret how they could create a free ecclesiastical body to deal with the State, and how they could devote the surplus of the Church property to purposes generally recognised as satisfactory. If they have such a secret about the land, it would be in the last degree imprudent to reveal it prematurely; and the success with which they have elaborated a scheme for dealing with the Church raises a presumption that they may be trusted when they say that in due time they are equally prepared to deal with the land.

Meantime it is very natural that Irish landlords should feel a vague alarm, and Irish tenants a vague joy, at the thought that some great measure, of which no accurate conception can be formed, is impending. Whether the brutal, aimless, cold-blooded assassinations that now make Tipperary worse than Calabria or Mexico are due in any degree to the declarations of leading members of the present Government about the land, it is impossible to say. It is easy for Opposition speakers to take one side, and for Government speakers to take the other, but the simple fact is that the very best-informed Irishmen are wholly at a loss to account for the recent burst of agrarian outrage. Anyhow, Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues are responsible for the general expectation, with all its attendant excitement, that the present Government intend to do something as regards, not only the Irish Church, but Irish land and Irish education, such as no Government has wished or dared to do before. They have assigned themselves the task of entirely remoulding the policy of England towards Ireland. Whether this task is beyond their strength, and whether what they may hereafter propose will be wise and acceptable to the country, time alone can show. It is sufficient for the present that the measure with which they have begun is bold, statesmanlike, and successful. That they could have dealt with more than one great Irish question in a Session is quite impossible, and no one except a peer full of the bitterness of Tories in opposition, or of the deeper bitterness of neglected Whigs, can doubt that they were right in dealing first with the Church. The spirit that breathed through the speeches of the Peers on Monday night is the best proof of this, for it is obvious that the Church question excites feelings so keen, and stirs up prejudices so strong, that, until it is got out of the way and done with once for all, no other Irish subject is likely to be discussed with even that feeble amount of impartiality to which it may be conceived the Peers would revert if their religious passions were stilled or assuaged. The course of events precluded the Government from having any choice in the matter. It was on the definite issue of what was to be done with the Irish Church that the appeal to the constituencies was made and the present Government came into office. Lord MAYO's speech led to the Suspensory Bill, and the Suspensory Bill to the elections, and the elections to the creation of a Government pledged before all things to carry out the policy which the Suspensory Bill had typified. But this is by no means all. There is a much deeper reason why the Irish Church should be dealt with before the land is taken in hand. According to the principles of the Liberal party, the existence of the Irish Church in its present form is altogether wrong. It is a thing quite indefensible, and opposed to all the doctrines that the Liberal party spend their lives in asserting, to maintain by the exercise of Imperial power a Church symbolical of hatred for the religion of a conquered people. Until this wrong is remedied, other questions between Ireland and England cannot, from the Liberal point of view, be approached with an easy conscience. We know that we are wrongdoers in one material point, and we cannot discuss other points freely. Some day, perhaps, the discussions between Ireland and England may reach a stage when Ireland will ask what England cannot grant, what her honour or her care for her own safety will forbid her to conceive. Irishmen must then be made to understand clearly that they are not going to get what they ask. Firmness, and, if necessary, the extreme of firmness, must be shown. To yield out of lazy goodhumour, or under the influence of a dreamy sentimentalism, everything that cliques of noisy, ignorant, fanatical Irishmen choose to ask, would be equally degrading and disastrous to England. But how should we have the heart to be firm, how could we feel comfortable in putting forth the strength of England, if we knew that at the time we were doing a wrong to the Irish people? The great use of settling the Irish Church question at the outset is that the Liberal party will then have qualified itself to discuss, without fear or self-reproach, all other Irish questions, or to consult the interests of the Empire rather than to earn the fleeting gratitude of insatiable Irishmen.

Among the Opposition speakers none was more bitter than Lord WESTBURY. The elevation of Lord HATHERLEY has, perhaps, naturally induced Lord WESTBURY to see Irish matters, and possibly some other matters, in a new light. The Suspensory Bill was a very good Bill, for there was no saying to what it might lead; but as a matter of fact it did lead to giving the Chancellorship to the present amiable holder of the Seals, and Lord WESTBURY now proposes that the Lords shall neither adopt nor reject the Irish Church Bill, but shelve it in a grand airy way to another Session. He complained in a most feeling way of the general depression of spirit that has followed on the proceedings of the present Government. This, and not agrarian outrages, is, he said, the real evil, and it was to be expected that he himself would feel this depression much more keenly than the murder of a few magistrates in Tipperary. The readers of Lord CAMPBELL's recent volume will observe with some amazement how history repeats itself, and will remember how the promotion of the excellent Lord COTTENHAM stung Lord BROUGHAM into a pertinacious hostility towards all his former colleagues. Lord WESTBURY is as yet only in the stage of a gloomy Toryism, but there are signs that he is fast ripening into a stage of ardent Protestantism. He may view what escaped him a year ago, that the Suspensory Bill was the beginning of a universal depreciation of property, and he is haunted with misgivings that worse things lie before us, and that in a few years Ireland will become a mere province of Rome. Of course Lord WESTBURY's sincerity cannot be questioned, and if disappointment has acted on him, it has acted on him imperceptibly to himself; but still the world will notice with a smile that Lord HATHERLEY has apparently been the innocent instrument of converting him to the political creed of Mr. HARDY and Mr. NEWDEGATE. It is with great regret that those who know Lord WESTBURY's high intellectual gifts and wide grasp of legal principles have seen him condemned to inaction, and the country deprived of the services he could have rendered it as the head of the Law. But it will be with much greater and profounder regret that they will see him betrayed by waywardness or pique into hostility towards the party with which he has so long acted. The history of Lord BROUGHAM's life was not, we should have thought, very encouraging to ex-Chancellors who might feel disposed to follow in his path. How much higher would Lord BROUGHAM's memory now stand if, during the MELBOURNE Ministry, he had borne with patience and dignity what he considered unmerited neglect, and had devoted himself with singleness of purpose to the great task of Law Reform and to his judicial duties. Lord WESTBURY's career has certainly not fulfilled all that he might reasonably have hoped, but he has still an opportunity of being most useful to his country; and if he neglects this opportunity, he will find a very poor compensation in the pleasure of inflicting a little annoyance and awakening a little surprise by his speeches in the House of Lords.

PARTY GOVERNMENT.

WHILE the German Liberals are struggling to introduce a responsible Ministry, while the educated minority in France is hopelessly protesting against personal government, while Austria, Italy, and Spain are labouring through various stages of approximation to Parliamentary freedom, a querulous essay on Parliamentary Government in the last number of the Quarterly Review repeats for the hundredth time the old and true proposition that the English Constitution is not absolutely perfect. The writer has not considered it a part of his task to suggest any preferable alternative; but if the nation could be induced to submit to the government of the permanent Under-Secretaries of the various departments, the evil results which are attributed to political party would either disappear or require some new explanation. A more ambitious and more practical remedy would consist in the adoption of the French or Prussian system of centralized administration under a King or Emperor, surrounded by Ministers of his choice. The author of the essay is chiefly troubled by the frequent political changes which in his opinion render it impossible for English statesmen to prosecute far-seeing and consistent designs. As he truly remarks, Lord LIVERPOOL reigned for fifteen or sixteen years, while more recent Prime Ministers have been restricted to a shorter tenure of office. The vigour and originality of old-fashioned Administrations are not illustrated by any record of Lord LIVERPOOL's extraordinary achievements. It happens that, during Lord GREY's four years' term of office, the Reform Bill was passed, West Indian slavery was abolished, and the difficult and unpopular reform of the old Poor-law was accomplished. Sir ROBERT PEEL, in five years from 1841 to 1846, entirely remodelled financial and commercial legislation; and Mr. GLADSTONE has since brought the doctrine of Free-trade to such practical perfection that, after the repeal of the duty on corn, not a single relic of Protection is retained in the fiscal system. Political critics of the feebler sort are always impatient of the fitfulness and irregularity which undoubtedly attend Parliamentary government, and they wholly overlook the force which is on occasion derived from popular sympathy and co-operation. The disciplined and irresistible majorities with which Mr. GLADSTONE is now battering down the Irish Establishment ought to have suggested the advantages which a Parliamentary leader may sometimes possess as compared with a clerk. It happens that within the present generation all parts of Europe have enjoyed the ideal perfection which excites the envy of English pessimists; and nevertheless one State after another has found it expedient to modify or abandon the despotic or bureaucratic form of government. The Continental Parliaments owe their existence to a general conviction that Kings, Ministers, and Under-Secretaries are not to be trusted with the exclusive control of the destiny of nations. At the present moment educated Frenchmen are almost unanimously hostile to the distribution of power which would probably satisfy the Quarterly Reviewer.

It would be surprising if any trite and plausible remark on the superficial aspect of politics had not been anticipated by Lord MACAULAY, who, in reviewing Mr. GLADSTONE's well-known ecclesiastical prolusion, observed that a country apothecary or a Scotch minister was more likely to produce an original work on politics than a statesman who, ever since he was one-and-twenty, had been a distinguished debater in the House of Commons. The implied ridicule of Mr. GLADSTONE's cumbrous paradoxes was sufficiently just for the purposes of an epigrammatic sentence; nor was it necessary for the satirist to reconcile his disparagement of Parliamentary orators with the genuine and manly love of constitutional freedom which MACAULAY habitually cherished. In the particular instance the fallacy has been historically confuted. It is not the business of statesmen to write books on political questions, but to apply political principles to practice. Mr. GLADSTONE in his youth wrote a dull and confused book in defence of the Irish Church, and in his maturity he confutes Lord MACAULAY's prophecy by destroying, as a Minister, the abuse which he had formerly vindicated as a theorist. The art of legislation and of government is best learned by practice, and the advantage which the gift of eloquence bestows in the competition for political rank ensures the possession, by successful statesmen, of intellectual power. It is a mistake to suppose that rhetorical facility, unaccompanied by more solid qualities, will raise any man to the rank of a Parliamentary leader. When the apologists of absolutism complain that orators in England are preferred to posts where no oratory is needed, they denounce an imaginary Cabinet composed of empty declaimers. If they would take the trouble to examine the past or present working of the system, they would scarcely deny the pre-eminent ability which has been brought forward by Parliamentary contests. Since the days of ancient Rome no country has succeeded equally with England in discovering statesmen who were acknowledged by universal consent as the most capable men of their time. The Administration of Lord LIVERPOOL, which the Quarterly Reviewer naturally regards with fond regret, was exceptional in the mediocrity of its members, although Lord CASTLEREAGH rose above the ordinary level of politicians. WALPOLE and CHATHAM, PITT and FOX, CANNING and BROUGHAM, GREY, LYNDHURST, and PEEL, owed their fame and their ascendency to their eloquence; but no enemy ever imputed to them shallowness, or deficiency of general ability. Lord PALMERSTON, who was not an orator, and Lord MELBOURNE, who owed his advancement to qualities unconnected with Parliamentary eloquence, would have been conspicuous in any assemblage of statesmen. Mr. GLADSTONE is not only great as an orator, but unequalled in his knowledge of public business. Mr. COBDEN, and his more brilliant friend and successor, rose by their gift of eloquence to be accepted as natural chiefs by the large portion of the community which shared their opinions. The principal members of the permanent Civil Service are able, meritorious, and useful; but it would be absurd to assert that they are ordinarily superior in ability to the leaders of the Ministry or the Opposition. A competitive examination extending over twenty or thirty years of Parliamentary life seldom results in the triumph of idlers or of fools. It is true that the process of natural selection is not infallible, but the assumption that, in default of contest and victory, a higher perfection would be attainable by some unassigned method, might seem worthy only of otiose pedants if it were not constantly made by dissatisfied politicians and administrators. The terror of Parliamentary discussion which deters heads of departments from effecting practical improvements indicates their timidity rather than the amount of risk which might be incurred. Under a different form of government, the same functionaries would shrink from a responsibility which could no longer be covered by Parliamentary sanction.

If the Quarterly Reviewer has any definite theory to support, he would probably desire that a Government formed of the existing materials should be secured against political changes. It appears that he would reinstate Lord STANLEY in the Foreign Office; and perhaps he would entrust the management of the finances to Mr. GLADSTONE; while the remaining offices would be filled by the principal members of both the great parties. It would not be difficult to construct in this way a respectable Cabinet; and some time might elapse before the effect of the constitutional change was completely understood. By the severance of political union with the majority of the House of Commons and with the nation, the working machinery would be disconnected from the driving power; and it would become necessary to supply, by the aid of an absolute ruler, the loss of popular authority. As the Ministers who had been originally raised to eminence by their Parliamentary qualities retired or died out, their places would be supplied by official veterans, or perhaps in some instances by speculative amateurs. After a time there would be a Government of clerks, influenced by philanthropists and projectors, so far as they might be tempted to deviate from established traditions. The experiment has been often tried, and it has failed as often, while the advantages, not unmixed with inconvenience, of Parliamentary government have never been fully attained but in England. There are undoubtedly many improvements still to be effected, although nearly all the items in the Quarterly Reviewer's plaintive catalogue of grievances are questionable and open to controversy. It is not certain that a single municipal government for London is desirable, and the establishment of a local democracy would be a singular accompaniment of the abolition of Parliament. If any person can divine a poor-law which would abolish pauperism, and a scheme of education satisfactory to all sects and parties, he is perfectly at liberty to publish his discoveries without waiting for a beneficent despotism; and if the conditions are fulfilled, even a Parliamentary Government will receive his suggestions with gratitude. As might be expected, the Reviewer asserts, without the slightest regard to facts, that half the English railways are insolvent, and that many are "in abeyance." Whatever may be the meaning of a phrase which would probably become still less intelligible if it were explained, no Emperor or head clerk could remedy the evil of insolvency and abeyance if it were not happily fictitious. The Crédit Mobilier of France, which is really insolvent, was the peculiar object of Imperial favour; and yet the Government has not either averted its collapse, or satisfied the demands of its creditors. It is perhaps a waste of time to discuss plans for abolishing the English Constitution with a view to the removal of some alleged defects in its working. Once for all, it may be admitted that Parliament is not infallible, omnipotent, or divine. If any other form of Government is faultless, it will nevertheless be unattainable, until it becomes possible to effect a sweeping revolution in spite of the opinions, prejudices, and associations of all classes of the community.

THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

THE debates on the Irish Church Bill have this week turned on the very difficult and important point whether the principle of religious equality and of total disendowment is rigidly carried out by the Government proposals, and, if not, whether the amount of departure involved in these proposals from the strict theoretical standard is justifiable. This point has been raised during the discussion of the proposals with regard to those churches which in the Bill were called national monuments, with regard to glebe-houses and lands, and with regard to private endowments. On each of these heads the Government obviously departs in its scheme from the rigid theory of total disendowment. The churches now used by the Protestant Episcopal Church are to be given back to it free from all payment; the glebes and glebe-houses are to be surrendered at a price much below their real value; private endowments since 1660 are to be respected. In each case property which is within the scope of the general principles of the Bill is made over to the new ecclesiastical body as a gift. Disendowment has not been pushed to its extreme theoretical limits, and in each case the Government had to show that it was right in making some departure from the general principles of the Bill, and that it had not departed from those principles either too little or too much. The churches are given back to the Protestant Episcopalians on the convenient theory that they have no marketable value. No one can believe this for a moment. They have a marketable value, but the feeling of Englishmen of all parties and creeds is against seeing churches set up for sale merely as so much old rubbish. If the churches are to be kept as churches some religious worship must go on in them, and the Government has wisely decided that the least shock to religious sentiment will be caused by letting that particular form of worship go on in them for which they are now used. Some of these churches, however, are more than mere places of religious worship; they are what is called national monuments, appealing to the feelings of all Irishmen by their architectural merit, or by their great antiquity and size, or by their association with the history of Ireland for centuries. As the Irish nation was interested in the preservation of these monuments, the Government at first proposed that a special sum should be granted by the State out of the surplus obtained by disendowment, and handed over to the new ecclesiastical body, in order that the buildings might never go into decay. But objections were made to this seemingly innocent proposal. If the buildings themselves are national monuments, it might be thought natural that they should be handed over to the custody of the Church, not of the minority, but of the majority, of the nation. If the mass of the Irish people are pleased with thinking these buildings beautiful or interesting, they are pained by thinking that they are in the possession of heretics. The Roman Catholics therefore argued, that if these churches must for the sake of peace be left in Protestant hands, it was at least unnecessary for the State to recognise them as national monuments, and, by the appropriation of a special fund, entrust their preservation as a national duty to a body of persons whom the mass of the Irish nation wish to see in charge of them. On the other hand, some of the shrewder Irish Protestants saw how much more precarious their tenure of these churches would be hereafter if they were marked off from other churches as buildings not appropriated to the use of a religious community so much as held in trust for the Irish nation. Worldly wisdom prompted them also to concur with the Catholics in rejecting the grant of a special fund for the preservation of these churches. There can be no doubt that they were right, and that the new ecclesiastical body will have a much safer position with regard to these churches if, in taking care of them, it does not hold itself out as a trustee for the Irish nation, which would be exceedingly apt to say that it would rather discharge the duty in its own way and through its own agents.

The proposal of the Government as to the glebes rests on no assignable basis. It is avowedly a compromise. Originally Mr. GLADSTONE thought that the glebes and the churches would go, as a matter of course, to the disestablished Church; but, when he came to reason out the principles on which his Bill was to be framed, he found that it was difficult to say why the glebes should be handed over. There is nothing shocking to religious sentiment in a glebe-house being put up for sale; and there is nothing in the position of the Established Church which irritates the members of the Church of the majority so much as the sight of the comfortable houses in which Protestant incumbents live, as contrasted with the humble dwellings of the priests. If the glebes and glebe-houses had been sold, there would have been plenty of Catholic bidders for them. But the Government hesitated to push disendowment so far as to put the glebe-houses up for sale; while, on the other hand, they thought it would be departing too widely from the principles of the Bill to let the new ecclesiastical body have them for nothing. They therefore determined to sell them, but to give the Episcopalian Protestants the right of pre-emption. Where there is a building charge on the glebe-house, they are to get the glebe on paying off the charge; but where there is no building charge, they are to get the glebe-house by merely paying ten times the value of the site on which the house stands. This does not in any way represent the market value of the property; it is a mere nominal sum which the Government exacts in order to keep up, as it says, the principle of disendowment. If this is keeping it up, no principle was ever kept up more easily. The glebe-house is taken away from the Irish Church because it is property which it ought not to have, and is sold back to it for a mere song. Why are the Episcopalian Protestants to have this advantage? Because it seems too hard upon them to take away their glebe-houses. There is, not a religious, but a semi-religious, sentiment attaching to the homes of parsons, and this sentiment is to be satisfied by letting the new ecclesiastical body get these glebe-houses, where there is a charge on them, for next to nothing but not quite for nothing, out of compliment to the principle of disendowment. Where there is a building-charge, the ecclesiastical body will decide whether it will take the glebe-house and pay off the charge, or not. The building-charge may be very small, and then it will make a most excellent bargain; or the building-charge may exceed the value of the building, and then the ecclesiastical body will be at liberty to decline the house, and the State will sell it, and will lose the difference between what it has advanced and what the house fetches at a sale. This permission given to the new ecclesiastical body to make smart bargains with the State seems to us, we confess, a blot on the Bill, and a departure from the principle of total disendowment which is not easily defensible. Either the glebes and glebe-houses should have been really thrown on the market, or only handed over to the new ecclesiastical body on payment of their estimated value; or, if it was thought preferable, as on the whole we think it preferable, that the glebe-houses should have been given over with the churches, then the whole mass of glebe-houses should have been handed over on payment to the State of its total advance for building-charges.

In theory it is impossible to distinguish between private and public endowments. If private persons have given money and lands to keep up the Irish Church, and if the purpose for which they gave their wealth is in the eyes of the State a bad one, the State must give their wealth a new and better destination. All donations made to the Irish Church since it has been established are tainted with a vicious origin, inasmuch as they were given to support an institution which, in the opinion of this generation, was created and supported on wrong principles. But then it may be argued, that whereas the Irish Church has a double character, as an embodiment of Protestant ascendency and also as a Protestant religious body, the donors may be supposed to have given their wealth to the Irish Church in the latter aspect, which is a perfectly harmless one in the opinion of the State, as is shown by the recognition of the new ecclesiastical body. In recent times it is certain that benefactors of the Irish Church have thought more of the religious community to which they belonged than of the secular purposes to which their Church had been made to minister. Why, then, should gifts made by Churchmen to their Church be taken away from that Church, any more than gifts made by Catholics or Presbyterians to trustees for the benefit of the body to which the donors belonged? But, if private endowments are to be respected, from what date are they to be recognised? Politicians of all parties agreed that those endowments only could be taken into consideration which had been given since the Irish Church was Protestant, and was substantially the same religious body that it is now. The theory that Saint PATRICK was a Protestant, and that the Irish Church of the sixth and of the nineteenth centuries is the same, would land the Commissioners charged with investigating private endowments in insuperable difficulties. But when did the Irish Church become a religious body such as it is now? Mr. GLADSTONE takes 1660 as the date, for reasons which, now that he has explained them, seem very insufficient. He wishes to make out that the Irish Church had not arrived previously at a perfect harmony in theological opinion with the English Church. But the reply of Sir ROUNDELL PALMER appears conclusive. A religious body does not begin a new existence on every occasion when it fixes, or adds to, or takes away from, the body of its doctrines. The Irish Protestant Episcopal Church existed long before 1660, and the continuity of its existence was not broken by the fact that about that time its creed became a little less Calvinistic. It is quite true that the Reformation was a gradual process, and that to take 1560, as Sir ROUNDELL PALMER proposed, would have sanctioned the historical error that in a given year Catholicism ended and Protestantism began in the Church; but still, if a date is to be taken, 1560 would be much nearer the mark than 1660. But the date selected by Mr. GLADSTONE, if it cannot be defended on the grounds he has adopted, has really very much to recommend it, as was shown by Dr. BALL when speaking against it. For, if Dr. BALL is right, there are no private endowments of an earlier date except those derived from Archbishop BRAMHALL and from the Ulster grants. The endowments given by Archbishop BRAMHALL consisted almost entirely of ecclesiastical possessions which, without the least pretence of right, had been usurped by powerful landowners, and which the Archbishop wrung out of the spoilers by the strong arm of STRAFFORD. The Ulster grants were given, not to Irish Protestant Episcopalians, but to Presbyterians, who were simply robbed of them by the Episcopalians. Therefore, if private endowments before 1660 were to be looked into, the only result would be to raise the question whether Archbishop BRAMHALL's endowments were not all public endowments, and whether the Ulster grants of the London Companies ought not to enure for the benefit of the Presbyterians. It is quite worth while to avoid as many vexatious and irritating discussions as possible; and, if Dr. BALL is right, the Church might lose more than it would gain by carrying back its investigation into the origin of endowments before the date fixed by the Government.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS.

THE French elections are fixed for the 23rd of May, so that although, under the rule requiring an absolute majority for a valid return, many of the most important contests must be renewed on the following Sunday, the complexion of the new Corps Législatif will be determined by the end of this month. That the Government will command a large, though perhaps a decreased, majority may be taken for granted. The most sanguine of Opposition prophets does not predict more than a series of local successes. Even these threaten to be fewer than at one time seemed probable, since, as the day of polling draws nearer, the disputes between the different sections of the Opposition do but grow more bitter. That sense of the nearness and strength of the enemy which sometimes supplies the place of union and discipline seems to be terribly wanting. This is the more singular because the rule which requires an absolute majority affords an unerring means of ascertaining which of the Opposition candidates has the best chance of victory, and thus enables each elector to do his best to return his favourite, without precluding himself from doing his best, at the last moment, to inflict a joint blow on the Government. In some cases, however, even this concession seems too great for one section of the Opposition to accord to another. Though it may be obvious on the evening of the 23rd, that if Orleanists, Legitimists, and Republicans agree to give all their votes to the candidate of whichever section is most strongly represented in the constituency, they can beat the Government, it is by no means certain that the fractional parts will coalesce even for the next Sunday only. Their mutual hatreds are too bitter to be laid aside, even when the reward of the sacrifice is the gratification of their common hatred against the Government. It is not altogether wonderful that this should be the case. The object of returning an Opposition candidate, no matter what may be his particular hue, is too remote and subtle to be apparent to an average elector. He understands supporting and voting for his own candidate, because by this he does what in him lies to promote the triumph of a cause in which he has faith, and the votes given to a Republican or an Orleanist express so many aspirations after a Republic or a bourgeois Restoration. But to sink sectional differences in a united struggle against the official candidate is to express a preference for Parliamentary over personal government, without regard to the manner in which this government, if secured, would be exercised. It is not as though the difference between the Opposition candidates were merely one of popularity. Probably, to many electors, it seems absolutely greater than the difference which divides their own candidate from the nominee of the Administration. The Republican would rather see a NAPOLEON III. on the throne than a descendant of the BOURBONS; the Orleanist, though he prefers a King to an Emperor, thinks either infinitely better than a Republic. To expect one or the other to put aside these alternative preferences, and to vote for the man who has the best chance of exercising some check upon the action of the Government, is to assume an intelligence which must be the product either of considerable political education or of stringent party principle.

Even the candidates themselves are not always willing to make the sacrifice which this plan involves. They like, naturally enough, to form some estimate of their chances beforehand, and to measure the precise strength which they can command in their fight with the Government. The system of scattering support at the first ballot, and concentrating it at the second, deprives them of this foreknowledge. It becomes a positive advantage for the Opposition to run as many candidates as possible, because every fresh appearance in the field may subtract a few stray votes from the official candidate, and so deprive him of the absolute majority. Old politicians do not always care to stand under these circumstances. They think the chance of getting a few votes more than some unknown man of more advanced principles too problematical or too levelling to be worth fighting for. It must be owned that their case is a hard one. An Englishman in a corresponding position has, at the worst, to make up his mind to retire from Parliamentary life. He can always claim a certain credit for declining to divide the party, and can abandon the contest with a lurking belief that it was chiefly his own magnanimity which stood in the way of his being returned again. But a Frenchman best consults the interests of the Opposition by coming forward, no matter how small may be his chance, or how convinced he may feel that he is only used as a medium of securing votes for some more popular candidate. Occasionally the irritation incidental to such a position breaks out, and some candidate of more than common mark declines to play the part assigned him. M. DUFAURE's withdrawal from the contest at Toulon seems to be due to this cause. The staunch old Orleanist represents irreconcileable hostility to personal government, but with that exception he has probably little in common with the democratic masses of the great French arsenal. At all events, the electors "have called to mind "that he does not share other opinions which they profess," and two other candidates "already dispute their suffrages." "I," says M. DUFAURE, "will certainly not be the third. "I lent my name in order to rally divergent opinions; it "shall not serve to create a new division in the Opposi-"tion." He has either forgotten, or not chosen to remember, that from the Opposition point of view a new division is not necessarily an evil. Indeed, provided that it is not so radical as to prevent a subsequent coalition, it may even be a disadvantage to the Government. It is doubtful, therefore, whether M. DUFAURE's act can be attributed to any higher motive than excusable pique. The circumstances under which, at a critical time like this, a candidate may be allowed to subordinate the public good to his own sense of what is due to his personal dignity, would furnish a fine field for political casuistry.

The closing days of the Corps Législatif have not presented the Government in any new light to the country. The EMPEROR has evidently determined that it is either needless or useless to hold out any further hopes of liberal reforms. He rests his title to popular support on the material advantages which France has derived from his rule. If we remember rightly, Mr. DISRAELI once hinted that an unusually abundant harvest was not quite unconnected with the existence of a Conservative Ministry, and in the statistical pamphlet which has just issued from the Imperial press, the natural advantages and commercial progress of the country are attributed, on a similar principle, to the providential superintendence of NAPOLEON III. The Opposition contrived, with some ingenuity, that an exposure of the two leading weaknesses of the Empire—its arbitrariness and its extravagance—should be among the last incidents of the Session. The lavish expenditure on the new Opera House supplied an opportunity on Monday for reproducing some of the criticisms which had been called forth by Baron HAUSSMANN's administration of Paris, and the best defence the Government seemed able to make was that it would be no real economy to allow the building to remain unfinished after so much money had been already laid out on it. A day or two earlier the despotism which is inherent in the Imperial system had been defended by the customary fallacies on the occasion of a motion to extend trial by jury to political trials. Certainly it seems an almost needless excess of precaution to deny this right to Frenchmen, when we remember the extraordinary timidity which characterizes the middle classes whenever any fear of revolution is entertained. It is not impossible that the real motive for this and similar measures is rather the wish to create an idea of danger than any distinct theory of guarding against it. In answering M. PELLETAN, M. ROUHER lamented the sad necessity of suppressing anarchy under which the Government so often laboured. He did not deny that the suspension of constitutional guarantees was in itself an evil; he only pleaded that, in a country harassed by so many recollections of civil war, the public welfare occasionally demanded the sacrifice. It is by these vague warnings, which seem to imply the existence of mysterious dangers seen only by the watchful eye of a paternal Government, that the EMPEROR has gained much of his influence. There is just that mixture of truth in them that no one can quite satisfy himself how much credit ought to be accorded to them. Just when the sky seems most unclouded, and the hold of the Government on the country most unquestioned, M. ROUHER takes care to hint that there may be workings beneath this smiling surface that demand the maintenance of those stringent safeguards all need for which may seem, to an unthinking public, to have passed away long since. Some day, we suppose, it may turn out that he has cried "wolf" too often, but in the meantime there is always a possibility that some sudden catastrophe may give an unexpected significance to his warnings.

THE LIFE PEERAGE BILL.

THE debate on the second reading of the Life Peerage Bill, if it threw little additional light on the question, displayed an unexpected unanimity or acquiescence on the part of the House of Lords. Lord DERBY, the habitual opponent of all changes for good or for evil, consents to a constitutional innovation which would in former times have been considered impossible; and Lord CAIRNS, in the name of the Conservative party, abstains from all direct opposition. In deference to general opinion, Lord RUSSELL withdrew the limitations which he had previously desired to impose on the choice of the Crown. It was generally felt that the express mention of the claims of literature and science might probably be understood as a direction to the Minister of the day. Lord RUSSELL characteristically remarked that MILTON was a man of business as well as a poet; and he might have added that CHAUCER was a county member, ADDISON a Secretary of State, PRIOR a Minister Plenipotentiary, and FIELDING a police magistrate. On the other hand, many great writers have been exceptionally unfit for public life; and many writers have attained a popularity which may easily be mistaken for greatness. It is desirable that an honour which will involve powers and duties should not be regarded as a mere decoration. If Lord RUSSELL's original list of qualifications had been adopted, the illiterate section of men of letters would have pestered the Minister of the day with demands for the promotion of their chief representatives to the peerage. It is enough that poets or historians are eligible if they are otherwise likely to adorn or to strengthen the House of Lords; and the honour would be less acceptable if it were professedly conferred with reference to special qualifications. The category of worn-out members of the House of Commons is more comprehensive; and, if Lord RUSSELL's Bill passes, Prime Ministers engaged in the formation of Cabinets will probably console supporters, for whom they can find no official provision, with peerages for life. As no person will be promoted unless he has either personal merit or political claims, old Parliamentary partisans will obtain at least their fair share of honours. From time to time a Minister will ennoble a successful physician, if he is willing to accept the compliment; but a great merchant or banker will naturally regard the offer of a life-peerage as an imputation on his success in making his fortune.

Lord DERBY's proposal that life-peerages, like official pensions, should be stamped with an eleemosynary character, would be in the highest degree invidious. It may be proper that an ex-Secretary of State should declare that he is unable to maintain his station out of his private means; but it is evident that a needy man can live without a seat in the House of Lords. It is one of the principal drawbacks to the measure that Lord DERBY's object will be indirectly attained. It will be perhaps impossible to persuade a man of fortune to accept a peerage of an inferior class when the only assignable reason for withholding a limitation to his heirs must consist in the inferiority of his pretensions; or, if the delights of a title and a seat in the House of Lords prevail over feelings of vanity or susceptibility, the life-peers will be regarded as a secondary class, like the Irish peers in the time of PITT. It is a humorous exaggeration to say that moderate means are infamous in England; but there is no doubt that wealth constitutes, however unworthily, a title to a certain popular respect. The social pre-eminence of peers depends partly on the permanent elevation of their families above the ordinary level, and partly on the enormous possessions of the collective body. When the advantage of hereditary rank is withdrawn, it will be necessary to compensate for the defect of a modest economical condition by extraordinary personal qualities. Mere observers of social life, who have not the smallest disposition to become satirists, recognise the undoubted fact of the deference which is paid in England to those who are favoured by fortune. Any man would rather wear a blue ribbon than a red, for the simple reason that the Order of the Bath is bestowed in return for supposed public services, while the most noble Order of the Garter is never prostituted to the purpose of rewarding merit. There are few things more puzzling at first sight than the value attached to a distinction which indicates only the notorious fact that its possessor is a duke or an earl, commanding a certain political influence; but those who are sufficiently well placed in the world to have few objects of ambition above them take a certain pleasure in notifying to all whom it may concern that they are men of consequence. If they also possess industry and ability, they probably become comparatively indifferent to superfluous tickets and labels. It is not impossible that life-peers may bear to their hereditary colleagues something of the relation of the Bath to the Garter. It is useless to blame an aristocracy for cherishing the prejudices inseparable from its position. The experiment may now be tried under favourable conditions; but, if Law Lords half a century ago had held their peerages only for life, public opinion, both within and without the House of Lords, would have refused to recognise their equality. When Lord PALMERSTON and Lord CRANWORTH made their abortive attempt to give a life-peer a seat in the House of Lords, they had no more strenuous opponents than the great lawyers, who suspected that they were to be deprived of the honours bestowed on their predecessors.

Although there may be many obstacles to the complete success of Lord RUSSELL's scheme, it is well that the plan should be tried. If hereditary estates are hereafter broken up by changes in the law of inheritance, life-peerages may facilitate the transition to some new constitutional arrangement. In the meanwhile an eminent soldier or lawyer, or a meritorious public servant from India, may from time to time add to the lustre of a House which he could perhaps not have afforded to enter with an hereditary title. It seems impossible to gratify Lord SALISBURY's wish to give the House of Lords a representative character, except as far as it actually represents wealth, birth, and refinement; but life-peers of conspicuous merit who possess no landed estates will, to a certain extent, introduce a novel and perhaps valuable element.

The readiness with which Lord RUSSELL's proposal is received is one of several indications that thoughtful peers are becoming, not without reason, anxious and uneasy. A tree which stands alone as the last relic of a wood is exposed to obvious danger. The House of Lords is the only remnant of a system which was once universal, and it is in the highest degree obnoxious to all revolutionary theorists. The arguments which may be urged to prove its utility are perfectly sound, but it is impossible that they should be popular. The defenders of an alleged anomaly show but doubtful prudence when they call attention to subordinate paradoxes or eccentricities in the constitution of an assembly which rests solely on an historical basis. It is not impossible that Lord GREY's proposed changes in the representation of the Scotch peers might correct some existing inequalities; but there is no use in reminding unfriendly critics of the oddities which are involved in the distinctions between several sets of peers. It was unavoidable that both at the Scotch and the Irish Union a reasonable proportion should be established between the numbers of Parliamentary peers in either kingdom and the population of which they formed a part. It was accordingly arranged that the whole body should elect a certain number to represent them, and it was not foreseen that the majority would exclude the weaker party from all Parliamentary power. In the last century the Scotch peers gave their votes to the Crown, or rather to the Ministry in power. For one or two generations they have swelled the numbers of the Conservative party. The representative peers of Ireland have for a long time been practically appointed by one English nobleman; but their constituents are not, as in Scotland, excluded from all share of political life. The number of Scotch peers cannot be increased, nor can they sit in the House of Commons, while an Irish peerage may be created as often as three become extinct, and Irish peers may represent Scotch or English constituencies. There are therefore two sets of hereditary peers suffering under two distinct sets of disabilities, although their rank and precedence is equal to that of peers of England or of the United Kingdom. It is scarcely possible to reconcile the exceptional position of a Scotch or Irish peer with any kind of constitutional symmetry, nor is it worth while to complicate this difficulty by introducing at their elections the newfangled device of representation of minorities. Lord GREY's proposal will scarcely pass the House of Commons, as that body is indifferent to the whole question. The most remarkable incident in the debate was Lord CAIRNS's avowal that the minority clause which he introduced into the Reform Bill, against the wish of the House of Commons, has proved a failure. Disingenuous critics might suggest that he refused to apply the plan to Scotch peers because the change would benefit Liberals, as he had forced it upon boroughs and counties in the hope of strengthening Conservatives; but it is fairer to assume that he is really led by experience and further reflection to adopt a conclusion which is perfectly sound. Life-peerages will at least for one Session be a sufficient change in the form of an institution which has grown up and flourished independently of theories.

THE NIGHT-HOUSES.

WE certainly have not acquired the decent and useful art of washing our dirty linen in private. On the contrary, the dirtier our domestic habits are, the more we seem to delight in exposing them. Monday's newspapers displayed a choice collection of nastinesses to the public gaze. First there appeared the report of another razzia of the police on the Holywell Street nuisance. Ever since we have known London and its ways, Holywell Street has been a filthy byword and public scandal; and, as it seems, Holywell Street is for all practical purposes much as it was. We have been cleansing and harrying, and convicting and imprisoning—performing autos da fé; or, if not of faith, of decency. We have burned and destroyed printed and pictorial nastiness by the ton. Nay, we have given a late most respectable Chancellor a sort of immortality by connecting Lord CAMPBELL's name with our supposed successes in putting down these particular immoralities and obscenities. But, somehow or other, it all seems to come to nothing. There must be something, we suppose, in the soil or air of the place which produces nastiness, just as certain ground produces certain weeds. You may pare, and burn, and dig, and work away with plough and scarifier, but the irrepressible thistles and tares defy the skill of the extirpator. To common eyes Holywell Street is much as though our CAMPBELL had never legislated; as though we had never convicted and imprisoned DUGDALE and his gang. And now it comes out that there is a brotherhood in this trade; a guild of vendors of obscenities, a craft and mystery of these dealers in the curious arts of vice, who have a close and compact alliance, offensive and defensive, common funds with which to defy the law, and common interests dedicated to the pollution of the public mind. Their trade is as hazardous, but as lucrative, as that of blockade-runners or smugglers or slave-dealers in the old time. For one cargo that they can run, they make their calculations for losing six cargoes to the blockade squadron or coastguardsmen of the police. One book of dirt which they sell covers the loss of six books confiscated or burned. One might have thought that it would not have taken the police magistrates twenty years to discover this peculiarity of the trade, or the Legislature the same time to allow this combat with the law to go on without interfering with so insolent and profitable a traffic. But so it is. It now appears that the business is so lucrative—a guinea a volume being the ordinary price of these pornographic productions—that the trade is worked scientifically. When one dealer is committed for trial, he absconds, and his "pals" pay his forfeited bail, and the case comes to an end. Something was done last week, when one of these fellows had to enter into recognizances to the amount of 600*l*. But it is obvious that what we want is a remedy much more "sweeping and severe" than the present tardy and polite processes of the law. Holywell Street and Wych Street will not be disinfected by rose-water, and if the law will not reach the nuisance, the law must be strengthened. When "the trade" declares war against society, society must accept the challenge, and stamp out the pest.

But, after all, Holywell Street and its wares are a nuisance of a different character from that of the night-houses, as by an ugly emphasis they are called. What Holywell Street is everybody knows; what a night-house is, is left in some obscurity, except to those who frequent them. All great capitals possess in some form or other this vicious form of civilization; and it would be as futile in this as in other kindred forms of vice to pretend to suppress a certain kind of abominable living and turpitude. The trade of harlotry cannot be suppressed; our English mistake, so characteristic of the national temper, is in affecting not to see a vice, lest we should be thought to legalize because we recognise it. Night-houses cannot be suppressed; and though we pretend to regulate them, we do it with such gentle and paternal deference to the rights of our citizens and citizenesses of the demi-monde that perhaps we had better not interfere at all. The law punishes with some severity the keepers of all houses that harbour prostitutes. The history of our recent dealings with this particular form of public decency is curious and instructive. Some years ago the whole Haymarket quartier presented a spectacle of which no words could express the grossness and abomination. Whole streets were given up to public indecency and to the open exhibition of vice in its most shameless and insolent guise. At last public opinion revolted, and an Act was passed which, among other things, compelled the night-houses to be closed at one o'clock. The proverb was fulfilled—sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus. Prostitution, cut off from its stimulants, was forced to leave even the Haymarket a desert. The Act at last was very fairly worked; the night-houses were regularly entered by the police, and these domiciliary visits sent the customers home; and fines, levied with exemplary regularity and strictness, were doing their work. Mr. KNOX, a magistrate among magistrates, a very king of men, and to whom the public is deeply indebted for his resolute determination to put down this social evil, was conspicuous in his success against these houses. There is no success like that of success; and it cannot be doubted that the night-houses were doomed. Every blow told. Of course the trade, like that of their brethren in Wych Street and Holywell Street, made a good fight of it. They organized every device to avoid detection; by a neat system of telegraphy the approach of the police was notified to the denizens of the place; a bell was rung, and when the police entered only a few smartly-dressed young people were found, engaged apparently in polite, if easy, conversation, if found at all. But this was enough; the young ladies were recognised as what used to be called dashing Cyprians, and their kind hosts and hostesses, the KATES and ROSES, who were dispensing this nocturnal hospitality, were heavily fined. But they still maintained the fight, and appealed to the Middlesex Justices in Quarter Sessions.

This right of appeal against the decision of a single police magistrate is, no doubt, a palladium; Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, and everything that we hold to be most precious, would no doubt be imperilled were we to hold our liberties and our fortunes at the mercy of a KNOX and his myrmidons. No doubt of it. It is quite right that there should be an appeal from the ordinary police court. But an appeal to an appellate court, and to a superior magistrate, must be a very seductive thing. What may be the case with judicial nature it is not for us to say, but as regards human nature we are rather inclined to believe that the opportunity to reverse and contradict somebody else's conclusion does present special attractions to most minds. It is a chance not willingly to be lost to show off one's superior acuteness, to display one's peculiar subtlety of intellect, to find out a point in a case which had escaped the rough-and-ready judgment of our inferior or our predecessor. Far be it from us to say that any such motive actuated Sir WILLIAM BODKIN when it came before him and his obedient Bench to review Mr. KNOX's convictions of the keepers of the night-houses. But Sir WILLIAM BODKIN made a point—whether it was a point of law or a mere point of Bodkinism that he made, we know not—which had escaped Mr. KNOX. The point was that there was "no overt act committed"; by which—we speak doubtfully and with hesitation on so very awkward a subject as an overt act proving that a woman is a prostitute—we are, we believe, to understand that it was not proved that the women found in the night-houses were seen to have entered or quitted them in the company of men. True, that certain women were harboured in certain night-houses; true, that they were notorious prostitutes; non constat, that they visited KATE HAMILTON's hostelry for professional purposes. They might—so Sir WILLIAM BODKIN is acute enough to see that the law might charitably presume—be merely paying a late evening visit, and taking chaste refreshment at their own expense, while discussing the Irish Church Bill or the Spanish Revolution. There was nothing to show that these gaudily attired young females had not dropped in promiscuously for innocent or even improving purposes. They might be, for aught that was proved by an overt act, assembled for tea and Bible-reading. And on this view Sir WILLIAM BODKIN quashed Mr. KNOX's convictions. The view is ingenious, subtle, new, and may be true. But at any rate the BODKIN judgment stands; unless, indeed, while we write, some fresh magisterial decision may, as Mr. BRUCE seems to hope, have reversed it. Mr. KNOX is reasonably indignant, and so are other people besides Mr. KNOX. At first that excellent magistrate was disposed to try another conviction. But at last he threw up the cards in despair. The phalanx of Middlesex magistrates, with their tender regard for the feelings of these wretched prostitutes, was too much for the solitary defender of public order and decency. "There was no help "for it; he was powerless; the Quarter Sessions were too "much for him; what had for seven years been thought to "be the law, was now said by Sir WILLIAM BODKIN not to be "the law; he was overruled; the night-houses must go on "in their own way; the police were superseded"; riot must reign, and there is an end of it. Such was Mr. KNOX's plaintive but somewhat indignant farewell to his successful work. The law was just getting the upper hand; the police were everywhere triumphant; the night-house keepers were every week fined; complete success was actually within our grasp; when enters Sir WILLIAM BODKIN, and we are all in chaos.

Were not all this very disheartening, and a public scandal of the worst character, it would be very ludicrous. We very much question—and so, apparently, does the HOME SECRETARY—the validity of Sir WILLIAM BODKIN's dictum; it looks a deal too ingenious to be true, and anyhow it is directly opposed, not only to public policy, but to the plain intention and spirit of the law. The law declared against harbouring prostitutes; to say that this intention was grounded upon the necessity of proof of an overt act—whatever that may be—is perfectly childish. Mr. KNOX seems disposed, as we are, to treat the Middlesex interpretation as simply ludicrous, and he was at first inclined to give Sir WILLIAM a place, not for penitence, but for the return of common sense; or, failing that, he was prepared to ask Mr. BRUCE to introduce a new law. It now only remains to be seen whether, failing the possible counter-decision hinted at by Mr. BRUCE on Thursday evening, the Home Office and the House of Commons will come to the rescue of public decency. Meanwhile high revelry reigns in the night-houses, and Sir WILLIAM BODKIN's name is precious to the chaste sisterhood which patronizes, or is patronized by, them. Oh Justice, as Madame ROLAND remarked when speaking of the sister virtue, Liberty; oh Justice, what very remarkable things are done in thy

VOLUNTEER DISCIPLINE.

THERE has been a second edition on a small scale of the Easter Monday review, and this time we observe that the Times has judiciously not sent down its slashing Military Critic, and that, consequently, the Volunteers have not been attacked for the blunders, real or imaginary, of those who were set over them. The muster at Portsmouth, including a force of Royal and Marine Artillery, three battalions of the Line, Colonel BOWER's splendid mounted rifles, and some three or four thousand Volunteer infantry, made up a force in many respects better suited for purposes of instruction than the rather unwieldy body which is generally collected on Easter Monday. It is vastly easier to find a suitable ground for manœuvring seven or eight thousand men than to accommodate two or three times as many. Indeed, if all the requirements which are sometimes insisted on were absolutely essential, there would be no possibility of working effectually with twenty thousand troops anywhere in England, except perhaps amid the dust-heaps which the wisdom of our army rulers has manufactured at Aldershot. For a Volunteer review on a large scale, you need accessibility, especially from London, a considerable area of land without much cultivation to suffer, a town capable of housing a certain proportion of the men, and, according to Military Critics, fortifications of such moderate strength as not to render a direct assault palpably and ludicrously hopeless. These conditions scarcely exist anywhere. At Dover and Portsmouth the defences are, as they ought to be, a good deal too strong to be subdued by field artillery, backed by two or three gun-boats; and the sticklers for a sham reality will always be able to charge the Volunteers at these favourite review grounds with want of discipline for advancing, according to orders, under the crushing fire of an impregnable fort. Perhaps, after all, the method which would succeed against a work of moderate strength may be taught, by generals capable of teaching it, in the face of a fortress like Dover Castle, as well as in front of a less pretending work; and we do not know that the lesson intended to be conveyed by a sham fight is very seriously impaired by the circumstance that the attacking army is supposed to have miscalculated the number of great guns it had to face. However, this little departure from reality, whether important or not, is unavoidable, and even on the less pretentious ground selected for the Portsmouth review a vigorous Military Critic would have found ample opportunity for proving the ill discipline of the citizen troops from the overwhelming strength of the works which they assaulted. Happily, on this occasion the irrepressible critic was absent or silent, though we hope there were good and experienced soldiers enough on the ground to assist, by genuine instructive criticism, the efforts at self-improvement which the Volunteers have always shown themselves so eager to make.

The programme on Monday, whether strictly real or not in its character, seems to have given opportunity for a good many instructive manœuvres, and, until we are officially informed to the contrary, we shall credit the newspaper reports that the Volunteers acquitted themselves creditably, and behaved with all due subordination and discipline. It is astonishing, however, to notice the discrepancies which appear between different accounts of the same review. The Dover reports have now been wound up by the official document addressed by General Sir Hope Grant to the Adjutant-General at the Horse Guards, and duly forwarded to the War Office by direction of the Duke of Cambridge. It is remarkable that this document does not tally at all well with the report of the Military Critic. According to the latter gentleman, it will be remembered that the programme was absurd, and the movements ridiculous. In particular he considered the attack under the guns of the Castle to be supremely ludicrous, which perhaps it was. Sir Hope Grant, however, says that "the "attacking force, under a heavy fire from the Castle, formed "under shelter covered by the right brigade, and then pro-"ceeded to attack some outworks, which they did in excellent "form." Which of these accounts is correct is not very material to inquire, so far, at any rate, as the Volunteers are concerned, for they were probably right in thinking it no very serious offence against discipline to perform the movements which were ordered, even though some of them might provoke a smile.

On another point the General seems to differ from the Critic. He acknowledges that the movements were very creditable to the Volunteers, and speaks of their willingness and promptitude in carrying out all the orders which he had occasion to give. In these days, the poor Volunteers may be thankful for any crumb of comfort, and it will be soothing to them to find that, in the judgment of the General in command of them, they executed the movements required of them in a creditable manner, and carried out all the orders they received with great willingness and promptitude. What more, one would ask, could be expected or desired from a civilian, or indeed from any, force? To execute every order willingly, promptly, and creditably seems about all that need be done. But there is, it appears, still something lacking, and after so much eulogy we may be sure that the Volunteers will, with all meekness and humility, take to heart every hint of a defect, and profit by the words of instruction which their General has to bestow upon them. Unfortunately, what the General has to say is so wholly unintelligible that no Volunteer, however greedy for instruction, can derive the smallest information or guidance from it. The General says, or rather insinuates, that the Volunteers, as a body, are "not amenable to any military discipline," and require, while under arms, "more stringent military control." Every Volunteer who is anxious to improve himself and to be a credit to the force must wish to know what were these breaches of discipline which call for more stringent control, and which, though present at the Review, he may have wholly failed to observe. We would gladly expound Sir Hope Grant's homily and improve the occasion for the good of the Volunteers, but we confess that the task is very difficult. The General does not refer in the faintest way to any specific offences against discipline; and, although it is true that the Military Critic mentioned offences enough, we have already discussed them and found that, with the exception of the crime of the unlucky man who was turned out of his corps for his attack upon the hare, every recorded error was the act of some general officer or ill-behaved spectator. We are compelled, therefore, in the absence of evidence, to read Sir Hope Grant's words by the light of the context; and though this does not help us to say what the supposed breaches of discipline were, it does teach us what they were not. In the first place, it is clear that mere isolated acts of individual members of the force are not what was in the General's mind, for the whole force is referred to as "not amenable to military "discipline." In the next place, the breaches complained of are not disobedience to orders, or even sluggishness in executing them, but something quite different—something consistent with willing and prompt execution of all orders. This will relieve anxious Volunteers a good deal, for it is obvious that willing and prompt obedience to orders is not one of the worst forms of undisciplined license. Neglect of orders being then clearly out of the question, we have considered whether the words "want of discipline" may not have been used, perhaps a little inaccurately, to signify inefficiency from lack of drill and knowledge; but this solution is almost as inadmissible as the other, for how can it be consistent with the fact that the movements executed were "very creditable to the "Volunteers"? At this point we must confess ourselves puzzled, and the only other things we can think of which in any sense can be called want of discipline are those minor, but not wholly unimportant, irregularities which are met with a good deal in the Line and a good deal more among the Volunteers, such as occasional talking in the ranks, errors of an inch or two in dressing, and the whole class of sins which are sometimes irreverently called offences against pipe-clay. We have no reason to suppose that even in these matters the General had anything serious to complain of; for, if he had, an old soldier would have thought it fairer to tell the Volunteers exactly what their faults were, and so assist them in curing them, than to put into a report a disparaging insinuation inconsistent with the immediate context, and not supported by a single circumstance which he reports as having come under his own observation. If such things were not impossible, we should be inclined from internal evidence to consider the passage an interpolation suggested from without, rather than the spontaneous production of a veteran who, if he had any faults to find with the Volunteers whom he commanded, would prefer speaking out like a man to stabbing in the dark with vague insinuations. However this may be, the Volunteers may (now that they are under their cloud) be tolerably content to be told that they have disgraced themselves by a want of discipline which is consistent with creditable manœuvring and prompt and willing obedience.

GERMAN CATHOLICISM AND THE COUNCIL.

I.

FROM the beginning of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century France was at the head of the theological science of Catholic Europe. No other nation had such names to show as Fleury, Tillemont, Bossuet, "the last of the Fathers," Petavius, and the great Port-Royalist divines. But the gradual decay which began with the persecution of Jansenism reached its crisis in the storms of the Revolution and the fall of the Sorbonne, which for six centuries had been the pride and glory of the Gallican Church. Since then France has had, and still possesses, many distinguished theological writers; and she stands in this respect far above Italy, which has had very few, and those few under the cold shade of Roman censure, and still further above Spain, which has had none. But her old glory has departed, and it is to Germany that men have had to look, for the last generation or two, for the ablest and most influential works, whether in Protestant or Catholic theology. The historical and scientific genius of the nation has conspired with its peculiar circumstances to bring about this result. Elsewhere the line of demarcation is broadly drawn, and the antipathies of rival Churches are accentuated by national jealousies, while their conflicting jurisdictions are to a great extent defined by national boundaries. In Germany the two religions stand everywhere face to face. Catholic and Protestant students and professors meet in the same University, and the teaching of the lecture-room and press is carried on, not under the withering shadow of an Index Expurgatorius, but in the full blaze of public criticism; and, we may add, not in a dead, but a national and living, tongue. And while this habitual contact and collision has purified and quickened both the rival theologies, putting out of court alike the pious imbecilities of Exeter Hall and of the Roman Seminary, it has naturally impressed on the leaders of Catholic thought the conviction, publicly expressed not long ago by the chief among them, that "the mission of German theology is to reconcile the divided confessions in a higher unity." It becomes, therefore, an important inquiry how the prospects of the coming Œcumenical Council are regarded in Germany, and the more so as the interest it excites is by no means confined to the twenty-five million German Catholics, for, in that country of divided faiths, what seriously affects either communion is felt to have a national significance. Religious, and especially Catholic, questions are discussed in the Allgemeine Zeitung, the leading German newspaper, not with the lofty unconcern or minute ignorance of "Our Own Correspondent" in the Times, but with gravity, learning, and a profound appreciation of their real bearings. And, generally speaking, articles on Catholic questions are written by Roman Catholics. Whether this is the case with the remarkable series of papers on "The Council and the Civiltà," which appeared last month in that journal, and to which we propose to call the attention of our readers, we are not able to say. But, whatever be their authorship, there cannot be two opinions of their value. And we conceive that we shall be doing a service to our readers, few of whom comparatively are likely to fall in with the originals, in giving some account of the present crisis of Catholicism as it presents itself to the mind of religious thinkers in Germany.

The series opens with an extract from the Civiltà Cattolica of February 6, which forms the text of the whole disquisition, and is itself of such momentous import that we shall give it with very slight abridgment here, merely premising that the Civiltà is not only the accredited organ of the Roman Jesuits, but was some years ago constituted by a Papal Brief, wholly without precedent, the official organ of the Holy See itself, so that it has something at least of the flavour of infallibility about its utterances. And it speaks, accordingly, in a tone of lofty dogmatism more resembling the language of a Bull than of a newspaper. No surer or more authentic testimony could be desired of what are the views and designs of the Curia as to the Council of December next. And thus the oracle proclaims them. After observing that "the Liberal Catholics," whom it abhors, are afraid of the Council promulgating the doctrines of the Syllabus and of Papal infallibility, though they still entertain hopes of such a fatal blunder being avoided, the journal proceeds to state that "the true Catholics"—that is, the Jesuits and the Gesuitanti, or Romanizers, as they are called in Germany—"hope, on the contrary, that the Council will promulgate affirmatively the doctrines the denial of which is condemned in the Syllabus, and that they will receive with delight the proclamation of Papal infallibility. The Pope will naturally shrink from taking the initiative in this matter himself, but it is to be hoped that, by a unanimous inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the assembled fathers will proclaim it by acclamation"—in other words, that it will be carried by a coup d'état; "and it is further to be hoped that the Council will raise the Assumption of the Virgin into a dogma. Catholics expect," it is added, "that the Council will be a very short one, like the Council of Chalcedon"—which lasted only three weeks—"and that the Bishops will be so unanimous in all important questions that the minority will not be able to offer any serious opposition." That is to say, they hope that the faith and discipline of eighteen centuries will be quietly revolutionized in three weeks—it might as well be three days—by an assemblage convened to register obediently the decrees of the junta of Roman Jesuits who virtually manage the machine of Papal infallibility. The allusion to the inspiration of the Holy Ghost reminds one irresistibly of what Ranke relates of the French bishops at Trent, who openly "jested at the Holy Ghost arriving in a mail-bag;" and the cool proposal for swamping the recalcitrant minority is ominous when we recollect that many points of the Papal programme were frustrated at Trent by the opposition of a very small minority—some by the resistance of two bishops, or even one only. But our immediate business is with the view taken of this contemplated ecclesiastical revolution in Germany. And it may be well here to recall briefly the present state of parties in the German Catholic Church. With the suppression of the Jesuits, a century ago, all traces of the Ultramontane system rapidly died out of the Seminaries and theological text-books; and the clergy, both regular and secular, betook themselves to the system of the Council of Constance, or what has since been called Gallicanism, in its doctrinal, of course not its political, sense. This tendency was promoted by the revival of historical study, of which Germany became the home, and at the beginning of the present century there was not left a single German theologian of any mark who did not see the hollowness of the Roman theory. But with the ill-omened restoration of the Jesuit Order there came a certain change in Germany, as in France, though far less than in the latter country. From some States, both Catholic and Protestant—as, for instance, Bavaria—the Jesuits are excluded by law, and their footing is everywhere a precarious one, besides the fact of the essential antagonism of their whole intellectual and moral system to the deepest instincts of the Teutonic race. They have, however, during the last twenty years attained a certain influence, and some of the younger German Bishops, who have been trained in their colleges, are strenuous propagandists of Ultramontanism. The bitterness of feeling between the two parties is far greater than that between Catholics and Protestants, and is embittered by the constant meddling of the Roman Court, which has an active centre of espionage in the Nunciature of Munich. Hence the public snubbing administered five years ago to all the most distinguished theologians of Germany assembled at the Munich Congress. Hence, too, the intrigue which has been carried on for the last twelve months against the Bishop of Rottenberg—an opponent of the Jesuit clique—by Dr. Mart, the head of his theological college, whom he was at last obliged to deprive for insubordination; and who betook himself first to the Nuncio at Munich and then to Rome, where his secret accusations against his Bishop were received with open ears, and all attempt at defence was rudely repulsed, first by the officials, and finally by the Pope in person. It is sufficient to refer in passing to the virulent malignity with which the leading divine of Catholic Germany, Dr. Döllinger, has been pursued for years past by this party throughout Europe. They know that he is the one living Roman Catholic theologian besides Dr. Newman who enjoys and deserves a European reputation, and they can never forgive the vast learning, the scrupulous candour, and the unimpeachable orthodoxy of a writer whose Christian moderation is a reproach to their policy, while his whole intellectual attitude is a standing refutation of their professed belief. And now to return to the Allgemeine Zeitung and the Civiltà.

The proclamation of Papal infallibility may seem at first sight a matter of little moment, as a considerable school in the Church has for the last three centuries maintained it, and to a superficial view it may appear immaterial where the seat of infallibility is placed if it is recognised as residing anywhere. But a very little consideration will show how erroneous such an idea would be. The infallibility of the Church has never been defined at all, still less the proper organ of its utterance. But it has been the traditional belief that a bonâ fide Œcumenical Council, received by the whole of Christendom, was the ultimate authority in all controversies of faith, and on this principle the creeds and other dogmatic statements of the seven General Councils before the separation of East and West have been accepted. The notion of the Pope being infallible is coeval with the Reformation. And when it is looked on in all its historical, social, and political, as well as its directly religious, bearings, it will be seen at once that to fix it as an article of faith would be "to affirm a new principle of immeasurable moment both in its retrospective and prospective aspects, a principle compassing the whole life of man and of society, for there could no longer be any question of the Pope going beyond his proper sphere. Infallibility must define its own limits." The old rule of St. Vincent, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus, would be obsolete, and the testimony of Fathers and of history would be reduced to so much waste paper. Any Pope, learned or ignorant, could impose any article of belief he pleased on the faithful, and on any subject—for all subjects, except mathematics, may be said to have some sort of relation to religion—and "whosoever should reject the last new dogma coined in the Vatican mint would incur excommunication in this world, and eternal perdition in the next." All Councils would for the future be superfluous. The Bishops might from time to time be summoned to Rome, as they have been summoned twice already by Pius IX., to swell the pomp of some grand Pontifical function; but with doctrine they would have no further right to trouble themselves; "to presume to confirm the utterances flowing by Divine inspiration from the Papal lips would be to bring lanterns to aid the light of the noon-day sun." To write definiens subscripsi, as at the old Councils, would be nothing short of blasphemy. Who shall dare to sanction, any more than to question, the accuracy of the teaching of the Holy Ghost? Once for all, at the three weeks' Council of the Vatican, and for the last time, the Bishops will have used their powers to commit with due solemnity an act of perpetual suicide. "When we speak of the Church," says the Jesuit Gretser, "we mean the Pope." Or, as Cajetan says, "the Church is the slave of the Pope." National Churches can have no mind or will but his, and the Clerico-Italian way of looking at things is the only true one. "The Italians, according to the Jesuit theory"—we may just pause to observe how consistently this view is carried out by the Ultramontane English converts—"are the chosen people of the New Covenant." More than nine-tenths of the functionaries and members of Congregations who form the Roman Court, and shape the decisions which are to rule the faith and devotion of the Catholic world, are Italians; and to be "a good Catholic" is to conform oneself in all respects—in despite of one's French or English or German nationality, which is a carnal hindrance—to Italian habits of speech and prayer and thought. Let no one say this is an exaggerated picture, for the Civiltà expressly insists that "it is not enough for men to know that the Pope is head of the Church. They must understand that their own faith and religious life must flow out of the Pope, and that in him lies the bond which links Catholics to one another, and the power which strengthens them, that he is the dispenser of the gifts of the Spirit and of all the benefits of religion, the upholder of righteousness and the protector of the oppressed, and that is not enough." St. Paul's words, "in him we live and move and have our being," are applied to the Pope, and as Tacitus says, the only form of flattery remaining is openly to proclaim his divinity during life. In short it is simply Llamaism under the outward forms of Christianity.

With one friendly suggestion to the zealous conductors of the Civiltà we must conclude for the present, hoping to return to the subject shortly. It strikes us that they might most appropriately stereotype the reform which they are labouring to effect by inducing the Council to accept one very simple alteration in the language of the Creeds. Let the word Papam be substituted throughout for the word Deum, and they will have expressed all that they can desire.

APRON-STRINGS.

AMONG other classifications, the world of men and women may be divided into those who wear aprons and those who are tied to the strings thereof, those who determine the length of the tether and those who are bound to browse within its circuit, those who hold the reins and those who go bitted. All men and women are fond of power, but there is a wide difference in the ways in which they use it. To men belong the grave political tyrannies at which nations revolt and history is outraged, to women the small conventional laws framed against individual liberty by Mrs. Grundy and society; men rule with rods of iron and drive with whips of steel, women shorten the tether and tie up close to apron-strings; men coerce, women forbid. In fact, the difference is just that which lies between action and negation, compulsion and restraint; between the masculine jealousy of equality and the feminine fear of excess. If men debar women from all entrance into their larger sphere, women try to dwarf men's lives to their own measure, and not a few hold themselves aggrieved when they fail. They think that everything which is impossible to them should be forbidden to others, and they maintain that to be a lamentable extreme which is simply in excess of their own powers. Not content with supremacy in the home which is their own undisputed domain, nor satisfied with binding on men the various rules distinguishing life in the drawing-room, the dining-room, and the breakfast-parlour, they would, if they could, carry their code outside, and sweep into its narrow net the club-house and the mess-table, the billiard-room and the race-course, and wherever else men congregate together, delivered from the bondage of feminine conventionalities. For almost all women have an uneasy feeling when their men are out of sight, enjoying themselves in their own way. They fear on all sides—both bodily harm and moral evil; and regard men's rougher sports and freer thoughts as a hen regards her wilful ducklings when they take to the water in which she would be drowned, and leave her high and dry lamenting their danger and self-destruction. The man they love best for his manliness they would, in their loving cowardice, do their utmost to make effeminate; and while adoring him for all that makes him bold and strong in thought as well as in frame, would tie him up to their apron-strings, and keep him there till he became as soft and narrow as themselves. Not that they would wish to do so; if you asked them they would tell you quite the contrary; but this would be the result if they had their own way, their love being at all times more timid than confident.

To home-staying women, a brilliant husband courted by the world, and loving what courts him, is a painful cross to bear, however much beloved—the pain, in fact, being proportionate to the love. Perhaps no life exemplifies this so much as Moore's. Poor "Bessy" suffered many things because of the looseness of the apron-string by which her roving husband was tied, and the length of the tether which he allowed himself. Farfallone amoroso as he was, his incessant flutterings out of range and reach caused her many a sad hour; and in after years she was often heard to say that the happiest time of her life was when his mind had begun to fail, for then she had him all to herself, and no one came in between them—no great world swept him away to be the idol of a salon, and left her alone at home casting up her accounts with life, and quaking at the result that came out. When the brilliancy and the idolatry came to an end, then her turn began; and she tied up her dulled and faltering idol close to her side for ever after, and was happier to have him there than when he was at his brightest, and a rover. Many a wife has felt the same when sickness has broken down the strong man's power to a weakness below her own, and made her, so long the inferior, now the more powerful of the two, and the supreme. She gathers up the reins with that firm, tight hand peculiar to women, and ties him to her apron-string so that he cannot escape. It is quite a matter of pride with her that she has got him into such good order. He obeys her so implicitly about his medicines, and going to bed early, and wrapping himself up, and avoidance of draughts and night air, that she feels all the reflected glory of one who has conquered a hero. The Samson who used to defy the elements, and break her careful strings like bands of tow, has at last laid his head in her lap, and suffered himself to be covered by her apron. It is worth while to have had the anxiety and loss of his illness for the sake of the submission resulting; and she generally ends by gaining a hold over him which he can never shake off again. It is pitiful though to see the stronger life thus dwarfed and bound; but women like it, and while the need for it lasts men must submit. The danger is lest the habit of the apron-string should become permanent; for it is so perilously pleasant to be petted and made much of by women, that few men can resist the temptation when it offers; and many have been ruined for the remainder of their days by an illness which gave them up into the keeping of wife and sisters—those fireside Armidas who will coddle all the real manliness out of their finest heroes, if they are let. If this kind of thing occurs at the break of life, the mezzo cammino between maturity and age, it is doubly difficult to throw off; and many a man who had good years of vigour and strength before him if he had been kept up to the mark, sinks all at once into effete senility because his womankind got frightened at that last small attack of his, and thought the best way to preserve him from another was to weaken him by over care.

Perhaps the greatest misfortune that can befall a man is to have been an only son, brought up by a tender and timid widow mother. It is easy to see at a glance, among a crowd of boys, who has been educated under exclusively feminine influence. The long curled shining hair, the fantastic tunic—generally a kind of hybrid between a tunic and a frock—the lavish use of embroidery, the soft pretty-behaved manner, the clean unroughened hands, all mark the boy of whom his mother has so often wished that he had been a girl, and whom she has made as like a girl as possible. His intellectual education has been as unboylike as his daily breeding. Mothers' boys are taught to play the piano, to amuse themselves with painting, or netting, or perhaps a little woolwork in the evenings—anything to keep them quietly seated by the family table, without an outbreak of boyish restlessness or inconvenient energy; but they are never taught to ride, to hunt, to shoot, to swim, to play at cricket, football, or billiards, unless there is a stalwart uncle about who takes the reins in his own hand at times, and insists on having a word to say about his nephew's education. There is danger in all, and evil in some, of these things; and women cannot bear that those they love should run the risk of either. Wherefore their boys are modest and virtuous truly, but they are not manly; and when they go out into the world, as they must sooner or later, they are either laughed at for their priggishness, or they go to the bad by the very force of reaction. The mother has allowed them to learn nothing that will be of any use to them, and they enter the great arena wholly unprepared either to fight or to resist, to push their own way or to take their own part. They have been kept tied up to the apron-string to the last moment, and only when absolutely forced by the necessity of events will she cut the knot and let them go free. But she holds on to the last moment. Even when the time comes for college life and learning, she often goes with her darling, and takes lodgings in the town, that she may be near at hand to watch over his health and morals, and continue her careful labours for his destruction. The chances are that a youth so brought up never becomes a real man, or worth his salt anyhow. He is a prig if he is good, a debauchee of the worst kind if he kicks over the traces at all. He is more likely the first, carrying the mark of the apron-string round his wrist for life. Like a tame falcon used to the hood and the perch and the lure home, no matter what the temptation of the quarry afield, he is essentially a domestic man, at ease only in the society of women; a fussy man, a small man, delicate in health, and with a dread of strong measures, physical, political, or mental; a crotchety man, and given to passing quackeries, but not a man fit for man's society, or for a man's work. When there are many boys, instead of only one, in a widow's family, the opposite of all this is the case. As soon as they have escaped from the nursery, they have escaped from all control whatsoever; and if one wants to realize a puerile pandemonium of dirt, discomfort, noise, and general disorganization, the best place in the world is the household of a feeble-spirited mother of many sons, where there is no controlling masculine influence.

Daughters, who are naturally and necessarily tied up to the mother's apron-string, suffer occasionally from too tight a strain; though certainly it is not the fault of the present day that girls are too closely fettered, too home-staying or subdued. Still, every now and then one comes across a matron who has crushed all individuality out of her family, and whose grown-up daughters are still children to her in go-carts and leading-strings. They may be the least attractive of their sex, but a mother of this kind has one fixed delusion respecting them—namely, that the world is full of wolves eager to devour her lambs, and that they are only safe when close to her maternal apron and browsing within an inch of the tether stake. These are the girls who become hopeless old maids. Men have an instinctive dread of the maternal apron-string. They do not want to marry a mother as well as a wife, and to live under a double dominion and a reduplicated opposition. It is all very well to say that a girl so brought up is broken in already, and therefore more likely to make a good wife than many others, seeing that it is only a transfer of obedience. That may do for slaves, who cannot be other than slaves whoever is the master; but it does not do for women who see their friends freer than themselves, and who might, if fate had so ordered it, been free too. The chances here are, as with the mothers' boys, that the girl kept too close to the apron-string during her spinsterhood goes all abroad so soon as she gets on the free ground of matrimony, and lets her liberty run into license. Or she keeps her old allegiance to her mother intact, and her husband is never more than the younger branch at best. Most likely he is a usurper, whom it is her duty to disobey in favour of the rightful ruler when they chance to come into collision.

If women had their will, all national enterprise would be at an end. There would be no Arctic Expeditions, no Alpine Clubs, no dangerous experiments in science, no firearms at home, no volunteering—in their own family at least. All the danger would be done by the husbands and brothers and sons of other women, but each would guard her own. For women cannot go beyond the individual, and the loss of one of their own, by misadventure, weighs more with them than the necessity of keeping up the courage and hardihood of the nation. Nor do they see the difference between care and coddling, refinement and effeminacy; consequently, men are obliged to resist their influence, and many cut the apron-string altogether, because delicate fingers will tie the knots too tight. They do not remember that the influence to which men yield as a voluntary act of their own grace is a very different thing from obedience to the open denial, the undisguised interference and restraint, which some women like to show. Men respect the higher standard of morality kept up by women, and they obey the major and the minor laws of refinement which are framed for home life and for society; and they confess that, without woman's influence, they would soon degenerate into mere savages, and be no better than so many Choctaws before a generation was over; but they do not like being pulled up short especially in public, and hounded into the safe sheepfold. And they resent the endeavour. And the world resents it too, and feels that something is wrong when a woman shows that she has the whip hand, and that she can treat her husband like a petted child or bully him like a refractory one; that she has him tied to her apron-strings, and tethered to the stake of her will. But there is more of this kind of thing in families than the world at large always knows of; and many a fine, stalwart fellow who holds his own among men, and is looked up to and respected for his courage, decision, and self-reliance, sinks into mere poodledom at home, where his wife has somehow managed to get hold of the leading-strings, and has taught him that the only way to peace is by submission and obedience.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION.

II.

THE history of Law well exemplifies an axiom which is of wider application—namely, that the tendency of a high state of civilization is towards simplicity. We now know that the golden age of shepherds and shepherdesses has existed only in the dreams of poets, and that the remote past was in reality the age of the most burdensome customs and the most intricate formalities. To do what one has to do in the most straightforward manner, amazing as the statement may appear, is a modern invention. There is, indeed, a simplicity of a certain kind in early times, but it is the simplicity of rudeness, and the result merely of the small scale upon which everything is done. Then come the ages of activity and progress, during which, as wants increase and society develops in many new directions, there springs up a luxuriant and tangled growth of forms and institutions, in which the perpetually renewed state of things finds expression. Afterwards comes the era when nations consciously review their institutions, and rejecting those which have been practically superseded or are circuitous in their working, rearrange those which are retained with sole and simple reference to the purpose which they are intended to serve.

This era seems at last to have arrived in the history of the judicial system of England. As it stands, it is just one of those wild growths of the middle ages which it is the aim of the present time to prune and replant in accordance with a definite conception. Courts have sprung up where they were wanted and where they were not wanted, interfering with and dwarfing one another, and accompanied always with a rank and various vegetation of practice and procedure. Of late years the Legislature has by fits and starts turned its attention to the subject. It has abolished a number of local jurisdictions, imperia in imperiis, such as the great Sessions of Wales and the Court of the Franchise of Ely, which tended only to complication. It has superseded the multiform Courts of Request for the recovery of small debts by a uniform system of new County Courts, and it has thrown difficulties in the way of the resort to those obsolete tribunals which it did not care expressly to annihilate. With the "Superior Courts at Westminster," as they are called, it has however dealt very tenderly, and as yet, entirely in the way of patching and repair. It has left to them all those divergencies of form, contortions of growth, and quaintnesses of aspect, which are due to the accidents of their eventful history rather than to any necessity arising from the purpose for which they exist. The rise of these several Courts out of the one simple Court in which the King and his great officers administered justice, is one of the commonplaces of constitutional history. It is well known that the Court of Common Pleas between subject and subject was finally severed from the rest of the aula regia in the reign of John, and that the Exchequer, for the trial of the Crown's claims of revenue, and the Queen's Bench, for the determination of other cases in which the Crown is interested, acquired a similar independent existence in the time of Edward I. As the process of specialization proceeded, several of the high officials of the King's Court, such as the Earl Marshal, the Lord High Admiral, and, above all, the Lord High Chancellor, came to have Courts of their own, while the residue of the aula regia has continued to exercise judicial functions as the House of Lords. The first stage, therefore, in the history of the superior Courts was their acquisition, one by one, of an existence independent of the aula regia, to which they all owed their origin. The next stage was the long period during which each Court pursued its own path, grasping at all the jurisdiction within its reach. When the nation at length arrived at the stage of deliberately examining its systems of judicature, the state of things which awaited its consideration was as follows:—The three Courts of Common Law had come to possess nearly similar powers; the Queen's Bench having extended its jurisdiction by a fiction that every defendant had been arrested for some imaginary trespass, and the Exchequer by a fiction that every plaintiff was a debtor to the King. The system of pleading in all three Courts was in the highest degree artificial. The Chancellor, as Keeper of the King's Conscience, had succeeded in establishing a system of rules radically opposed to the law as laid down in the older Courts, and had thus reared up the gigantic system of Equity, with its own modes of pleading and procedure, which he administered very dilatorily, with the aid of a Master of the Rolls and other "Masters in Chancery." A similar system was also dispensed by what was called the "Equity side" of the Court of Exchequer. The Chancellor had assumed a power of interfering with actions in the Common Law Courts. Then there was the Court of Admiralty, which proceeded in accordance with the rules of the Roman law, while testamentary and matrimonial questions were decided by the rules of Canon law in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The practitioners in most Courts were barristers, but the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts would hear only doctors-of-law, and the Common Pleas was closed to all but serjeants. The Legislature, on awaking to a consciousness of these things, took much pains to assimilate the procedure of the three Common Law Courts, rendering unnecessary the fictions by means of which they had filched their jurisdiction, and relaxed to some extent their technical strictness in pleading. It created new lay tribunals, to which it confided testamentary and matrimonial causes, leaving, however, the procedure in such causes much as it was before. It threw open all Courts, of whatever kind, to all barristers. It strengthened the Court of Chancery by adding to it Vice-Chancellors and Lords Justices, and endeavoured to make certain modes of procedure which had hitherto been peculiar to Courts of Law or of Equity respectively the common property of both. It abolished the Equity side of the Exchequer. We have purposely left out of consideration the Appellate Courts and their history.

But all these repairs done to the old institutions have failed to produce satisfactory results. The Common Law Courts have lost their scientific system of pleading, but have not been able to adopt the equitable expedients which were placed at their disposal. The Courts of Equity, on the other hand, have not made much of the new weapon, trial by jury, with which they were entrusted. The enlarged powers given to the Judge of the Admiralty threaten to bring him into collision with other jurisdictions; while the Courts of Divorce and Probate, great as has been their success, still occupy a somewhat anomalous position in our judicial system. And this is the verdict of the Judicature Commissioners. "The alterations," they say, "to which we have referred have, no doubt, introduced considerable improvements into the procedure both of the Common Law and Equity Courts; but after a careful consideration of the subject, and judging now with the advantage of many years' experience of the practical working of the systems actually in force, we are of opinion that the 'transfer or blending of jurisdiction,' attempted to be carried out by recent Acts of Parliament, is not a sufficient or adequate remedy for the evils complained of, and would at best have mitigated, but not removed, the most prominent of those evils."

In illustration of the injurious results of the distinction between Courts of Law and of Equity, the Commissioners instance the late dispute between the sellers of railway shares and the jobbers on the Stock Exchange, where "the defendants were subjected to litigation (at the instance, no doubt, of different parties), carried on at the same time in different Courts, and exposed to the risk of conflicting decisions, those Courts operating under different forms of procedure, and being controlled by different Courts of Appeal." And they point out that the effect of the acts and representations of Directors of Joint Stock Companies, who fill the double character of agents and trustees for the Companies and shareholders, has frequently been brought into question in both jurisdictions, and sometimes with opposite results, to the great expense and perplexity of suitors. The inference which they draw is that there is a necessity for "a tribunal invested with full power of dealing with all the complicated rights and obligations springing out of such transactions, and of administering complete and appropriate relief, no matter whether the rights and obligations involved are what are called legal or equitable."

Nor would the difficulty be met by allowing each Court to administer full relief under several systems of law and procedure. This is actually attempted in the County Courts, on which, in many cases, a limited jurisdiction has been conferred, not only in Common Law, but also in Equity and in Admiralty. The ridiculous result is aptly described by the Report as follows:—"But these jurisdictions, though conferred on the same Court and the same Judge, still remain (like the Common Law and Equity sides of the old Court of Exchequer) quite distinct and separate. The Judge has no power to administer in one and the same suit any combination of the different remedies which belong to his three jurisdictions, however convenient or appropriate such redress may be. That can only be accomplished, under the County Court system, by three distinct suits brought in the same Court and before the same Judge, carried on under three different forms of procedure, and controlled by three different Courts of Appeal. In this case, therefore, although we appear at first sight to have obtained that great desideratum which the Common Law Commissioners call the 'consolidation of all the elements of a complete remedy in the same Court,' yet as that remedy can only be had in three separate suits, the evil is equally great." The Commissioners see that this confusion can never be radically cured till there is but one rule of law and one mode of procedure applicable to each case; and, as the only sure means of attaining the result, they have had the courage to recommend that there should be but one Superior Court of the first instance. This proposal is startling from its very simplicity. The new "Supreme Court," which is to supersede all the superior Courts now in existence, is to put an end at once to all conflicts of jurisdiction. "No suitor could be defeated because he commenced his suit in the wrong Court, and sending the suitor from equity to law, or from law to equity, to begin his suit over again, in order to obtain redress, will be no longer possible."

The Court will be divided into as many chambers or divisions as the nature or extent or the convenient despatch of business may require. "All suits, however, should be instituted in the Supreme Court, and not in any particular chamber or division of it; and each chamber or division should possess all the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with respect to the subject-matter of the suit, and with respect to every defence which may be made thereto, whether on legal or equitable grounds, and should be enabled to grant such relief, or to apply such remedy or combination of remedies, as may be appropriate or necessary in order to do complete justice between the parties in the case before the Court, or, in other words, such remedies as all the present Courts combined have now jurisdiction to administer." The procedure is to be as uniform in all the divisions of the Supreme Court as is consistent with the principle of making the procedure in each division appropriate to the nature of the cases which will be assigned to each. The system of pleading recommended is one which would combine "the comparative brevity of the simpler forms of Common Law pleading with the principle of stating intelligibly, and not technically, the substance of the facts relied upon as constituting the plaintiff's or defendant's case, as distinguished from his evidence." Questions of law will be argued before a divisional Court or a judge; and questions of fact will be triable by a judge alone, by a judge and jury, or by an "official referee," who would be a functionary of the Court, and whose services would of course not have to be paid for by the suitors themselves, as is the case when causes are referred to a private arbitrator.

Such is, in outline, the leading recommendation of the Commissioners, and it contains their answer to the most important of the questions which were put to them. They deal also, more or less in detail, with other points upon which their opinion was requested, reserving, however, some for future consideration. Several topics which seem intimately related to the questions discussed were not within the scope of the Commission, and the Report is therefore silent about them. In order, however, to make the investigation theoretically complete, it would obviously be necessary to empower the Commissioners to inquire into the working of the County Courts and Quarter Sessions at one extremity of the judicial scale, and of the House of Lords and the Privy Council at the other. The last-named inquiry may, however, stand over for the present. It is quite possible to reconstruct our whole system of judicature up to the Court of Appeal, without at present determining whether the decisions of that court are to be final, or whether they are to be reviewed by the House of Lords, or the Privy Council, or some combination of those bodies; and the question is one which it might be undesirable to open at this moment when it would be complicated by the proposal for the creation of life peers. The County Courts and Courts of Quarter Session should, however, at once be brought within the scope of the Commission; for the Supreme Court can hardly be satisfactorily constituted till some decision has been arrived at as to the relation which is to be borne to it by the local tribunals.

The Commissioners have issued their Report without evidence or appendix of any kind. It might perhaps have been as well if they had supported their conclusions by some statement of the working of judicial reforms in other countries. Had they chosen to do so, they might have fortified their proposal for the erection of one Supreme Court by the successful precedents of several Continental States, of New York and other States of America, of most of the British colonies, and of India; and they might have shown how America adopted precisely the means recommended in the Report for getting rid of the distinction between Law and Equity—namely, an amalgamation of procedure and a fusion of Courts. And this, indeed, would be the best reply to objections which are sure to be raised to the new scheme. We shall of course be told that for one Court administering the law under one system of procedure we must wait till we have a code; that before putting Equity and Common Law judges to sit upon the same bench, we must remove the substantive distinction between Equity and Common Law. The fact is that the complication is now so great that we have no choice but to cut the knot; and experience has shown that the simplest mode of cutting it is to throw the Courts into one, and to empower the new Court to give such redress in every case as could previously have been given in all the old Courts combined.

THE GREAT HIGGS.

In investigating the accounts of the Great Central Gas Company it is made to appear, as in such cases it always is, that an elaborate system of control existed for the purpose of preventing that fraud which, unfortunately, was perpetrated in spite of it. Every collector of gas-rents employed by the Company was required to pay daily the amount received by him to the Company's bankers, and to deliver at the Company's office the bankers' slip of the amount paid in, and a list of names of customers, and amounts received from them. The total of this list would be the amount paid to the bankers. It then became the duty of the Company's accountant to see that this amount was credited to the Company in the bankers' pass-book, and entered in the cash-book. It will be seen that, under this admirable arrangement, neither the accountant nor any of the clerks had anything to do with the cash, and the collectors had no control over the books. The collectors, however, instead of observing the rule of paying all their receipts into the bank, left, in many instances, both the money and the lists at the Company's office, and Higgs got possession of both. Thus the excellent system of control was frustrated by the circumstance that both the cash and the books came into the same hands. Sometimes Higgs took all the cash brought by a particular collector, and in this case he made away with the collector's list altogether. At other times he took only part of the cash, and in that case he substituted a list of his own preparation, showing as received only the amount which he allowed to go into the bank. If it had ever happened that a consumer had been called upon to pay over again a sum appropriated by Higgs, the fraud of Higgs would, in the ordinary course of business, have been discovered. We say the ordinary course of business, because the course of business in the office of the Great Central Gas Company was very extraordinary. But Higgs did not venture to run this risk. He preferred to give credit to the consumers, in what is called the "rental," for the sums actually paid by them. The Company's domain was divided into districts, and an account for each district was kept in the Company's ledger. The amounts appearing by the bankers' book to have been paid in by the collectors on account of each district would be credited to that district in the ledger. It is evident that the amounts of these credits would be less than the total of the amounts for which Higgs had caused credit to be given to the consumers in the rental. Then how could it possibly happen that the ledger account was not compared with the rental? The frauds of Higgs extended over seven years, and amounted to upwards of seventy thousand pounds, and they caused the amount of pretended arrears of gas-rents to become portentous, and compelled the Directors to borrow money to pay the usual dividend; and yet it neither occurred to the accountant, nor was suggested to him by his superiors, that he ought even to look at the consumers' accounts in the rental. Our wonder at the accountant's easiness may be mitigated by observing that he is the person to whom Higgs stated that his wife was shortly coming into a fortune of 180,000*l.*, being more than a thousand years' purchase of Higgs's salary. The accountant has been examined before a Parliamentary Committee, and he said that "he had no reason to doubt the truth of Higgs's statement"—an answer which perhaps indicates sufficiently the character of the man, and goes far to explain how it happened that the admirable system of controlling accounts over which he presided has been found practically useless. He stated, in answer to another question, that he had never seen Mrs. Higgs, and we may admit that, if he did not see her, he could not be expected to have an opinion as to whether she looked like a person who was going to come into 180,000*l.* We may admit further, that if Mr. Wyld, accountant of the Great Central Gas Company, is possible, nothing is impossible; and if he believed in his own existence he was warranted in believing also in the existence of a Providence which poured 180,000*l.* into the lap of Mrs. Higgs.

But more wonderful even than the credulity of Mr. Wyld, or the supposed fortune of Mrs. Higgs, was the charity of the Directors of the Company, who went on year after year borrowing money to pay dividend rather than exert any gentle pressure on their customers. We used to believe that a collector, either of gas or water-rate, was the modern embodiment of the classical idea of hard, inexorable necessity. We never even ventured to have any belief as to the nature of the Directors by whom these collectors were controlled, but if we might attempt to put a dim and awful conception into words, we would call both classical and mathematical illustrations to our aid, and say that we should conceive the Board of Directors of a Gas Company to be Fate raised to the n^{th} power. And now the veil is drawn aside, and we behold these Directors sitting at their Board, and we find that they are men of like weaknesses with ourselves. They could not find in their gentle hearts resolution to cut off anybody's gas, and still less could they reconcile it to their feelings to deprive their shareholders of dividend, or themselves of their moderate remuneration of 1,000*l.* a year; and so they made everything pleasant all round by borrowing where they should have dunned. We have heard of nothing like the conduct of these Directors since the time of the speculator who declared that, as in previous bankruptcies he had always paid his creditors 5*s.* in the pound, he preferred on the bankruptcy then pending to adhere to the same rule, even although he should be obliged to pay the amount of composition out of his own pocket. Mr. Wyld's own existence is the greatest wonder to be seen under the sun, or even by the light of gas, and therefore he cannot be expected to be surprised at anything which occurs in the world around him. He was aware that the Company had to borrow money to pay their dividend, because they could not get in their outstanding accounts, but he was not aware that any inquiry was made as to the reason why these accounts were not collected.

It used to be said that nothing was certain except death and quarter-day, but it appears that within the dominions of the Great Central Gas Company quarter-day stood indefinitely postponed so long as the Company could borrow money. For the year 1868 the rental of the Company was 85,000*l.* and the arrears 65,000*l.* The amount of arrears had more than doubled since the year 1862, when Higgs commenced his operations. This Company, like all other companies, had auditors, and it may be remarked in the history of fraudulent accounts that, whenever there is anything not to be found out, auditors are brought into activity. Mr. Chatteris, an auditor of the Company, did not consider it any part of his business to question the judgment of the Directors in giving such largely increased credits. The frauds arose from the mani-
